(62) Thus the devil leads men by the nose, so that they do not look at the main thing, want to go above, and bring forth something special, and thereby lose the highest and only treasure. Behold, it is most plainly spoken of, that the simple may well know how to use it, and also the fruit, that they may see whether they have used it aright. Let every man see what he lacks, and let others speak and talk as they will.

The third part. 1)

From confession.

63. about this also confession is to be preached, to teach the simple again, because one knows how we have let ourselves be tortured and disgraced with confession up to now, with such trouble that there has been no severe commandment, because the world has confessed. First, I think the word "confess" comes from the little word jehen, from which is made confess, besähet, that is, confessed; hence we have made it into one syllable, and call it confession, that is, a confession. As some saints were also called in Latin: Confessores, in German: Beichtiger; as Beichter, that is, Bekenner.

But, as I have said before, there are three kinds of confession. One before God. For first of all, it is necessary that I recognize myself as a sinner before God, as the Gospel reveals, Rom. 3, 23; and Joh. 3, 5: "Unless one is born again, he cannot see the Kingdom of God. He who confesses that he is born of woman must give glory to God and say, "I am nothing but a sinner," as David sings in Psalm 51:7: "Behold, I was brought forth in sins, and in sins did my mother conceive me." As if to say, I must be a sinner, it is inborn in me; as soon as I was made in my mother's womb, I was a sinner, for flesh and blood, of which I was made, was sin; as it is said, Where skin and hair are evil, there is no good fur. So is

The clay of which we are made is not good; what mother and father do and bring to it is already sin.

Whoever does not want to confess this, nor be a sinner, but still have a free will that something good should still be in him, blasphemes and punishes God with lies, and must be eternally damned; how just. For he wants to be right and not suffer God's judgment. Therefore the prophet says again, Ps. 51:6: "Against you alone have I sinned, and done evil in your sight; therefore you will remain right in your words, and be found pure when you are judged." As if to say, "I will not quarrel with you, but let your word be right, and confess me wrong, that you are true; but those who punish you want to have a reasonable light, and something by which they may obtain mercy; before them you will be found pure.

Now this confession we must make forever, 2) as long as we live, that we may always say, Lord, before thee I am a knave in skin. But there is a difference. For even a knave and an unchristian can say this, but he certainly denies it. No one speaks it from the heart but a true Christian, as the 32nd Psalm v. 5 says: "I said, I will confess my transgression against me unto the Lord; and thou forgavest me the iniquity of my sin: for this shall all the saints pray before thee in due time." All the saints, as much as they are, have the virtue in them that they confess their sin to God and ask for it. Therefore, no one makes such a confession except the Christians, who are holy.

Now it is a strange thing that he who is pious before God and has the Holy Spirit should say that he is a sinner. But it is right; he confesses what he has been, and what he still is. He has the Holy Spirit, but is still a sinner because of the flesh; therefore all the saints cry out against the flesh. Nor is the devil far from it, who stirs up that he may bring the flesh into sin; therefore it is a high and great confession.

68. others also say they are sinners; but when other people say it of them, 2) "immerdar thun" put by us instead of: immer darthun. Latin: eitra Lutsrnüssionsua taeisnäs. est.

1) This third part is missing in the Wittenberg edition; however, it is in the Latin.

they do not want to hear it. But the saints, when it is said to them, or when God punishes them for sin, they say: Yes, it is right. Those hypocrites can well deceive themselves, but stop when they want to: but from other people they want to be unpunished and unlearned 1); as now clergymen and monks do, they also say they are sinners, but do not want to hear that we say it. Therefore God does not ask for such confession. This confession is now commanded and necessary, and the whole world is obliged to do it; but no one does it except the Christians.

69 The other confession is that which is made not to God but to one's neighbor, of which Christ speaks in Matthew 5 and 6; Jacob also writes of it in the epistle, chapter 5, 16: "One confesses his sin to another," that is, keep yourselves thus, that each one may humble himself before the other, and confess his guilt where he has offended someone. Offense, however, is of various kinds, common and special.

We are all in the community (I am concerned), and the Lord's Prayer interjects into us. This is that we do not help our neighbor as much as we owe to help him, with words, preaching, advice, comfort, money, goods, honor, life and limb; this is so high that no one is so holy, he remains in debt; therefore we must all say among ourselves: I am indebted to you, you are indebted to me, but especially to whom God has given much, he is also indebted much. I also owe more than perhaps twenty or even a hundred; he will also demand it of me, nothing else will come of it, it will count to the last penny, as I have invested it and advertised it. This debt now passes through in general, that it affects no one in particular: I am indebted to everyone; so everyone is indebted to me again for comfort and assistance where I suffer hardship and need help. But we are not diligent enough to seek out the people who need us; and offering service is also too much for us.

71. now when we look at the register how much we owe, we have to fidget

1) So taken over by us from the old edition of Walch; Erlanger: "and honored". Latin: nolunt oulpari st rexrekendi.

And we are afraid, and we find no counsel, because we say, One is indebted to me again, I have to reckon with others also, I want to give them all that; therefore I ask, Lord, that you also forgive me; so I make a line through it, and erase it. If we did not have this advice, we would be in a bad way; therefore it remains with this. Our Father, it is also necessary that we forgive our debtors, so that our guilt may be forgiven us; as Christ teaches in the Gospel Matth. 18, 22. ff. This is the one confession, that one must confess publicly before the people and confess the guilt; before God I am not pious, before the world, also after the common guilt, there each one has to promise the other, no one does enough. Therefore, one must ask the other to forgive him.

Now no other man than a Christian makes this confession. For the unbelievers do not suffer this, that they reckon such things to be sin; they lead the spiritual law, which says: To each his own is due; they think that they have the goods they have for their own sake, therefore they also need all kinds of goods only for their honor and pleasure, as Solomon says in Proverbs: "The wicked has food only for sin, but the righteous is mild. The wicked needs his goods, wisdom, art, honor, that he may have pleasure and use thereof; all this is sin, and so sin that he still thinks it is not sin, but right.

God created us for this reason, that we should be our neighbor's caretakers; but we are all guilty of this. But this we have before, that we recognize it and are sorry for it, striving to do more and more every day, fearing God, doing as much as we can and Adam allows; what we do not do about it, God puts a stop to it, as I said; not daring to pay it, it is too much, so we say: Forgive me, I will forgive again.

(74) Over and above this common guilt there is also a special guilt, as Christ speaks of it in Matt. 5:25. If a special person is insulted, lied to, damaged, scolded, or defiled by rumor, one should also confess and say that one has done wrong, and apologize to one's neighbor. Oh, that also hurts, the

To break Adam in this way, and to lower oneself against a poor man whom one despises, and to give him justice and the highest honor, and himself the greatest disgrace. This was also the custom in monasteries in former times, that the monks were forced to do this; but it was evil.

A wicked man does not humble himself so deeply that he disgraces himself, does not see that he would be greatly honored before God and before pious people. Christians can protect themselves from this guilt to some extent, both for themselves and for others, by covering it up and punishing it when one hears and sees it from others. But no one can defend against the common guilt. But we do not speak here of the two confessions; for these go on all the year round, and not only when you want to go to the sacrament.

(76) But here we speak of secret confession, which I consider to have come from public confession, which happened in this way: that the Christians made the previous two confessions together, so that each one confessed publicly before he went to the sacrament, before God and man. When the Christians were few, each one told it to the other. After this, it was decided that sins should be counted and numbered, but they will remain uncounted; you will never count how much you should do that you neglect.

Of this we now say thus: If these two are done publicly, one is not guilty of doing them. God knows your sin well; if you confess it to Him and then to your neighbor, your sins are forgiven. But it is by no means to be rejected for the sake of those who want to use it gladly; for in secret confession there is much that is useful and delicious. First of all, absolution, that your neighbor absolves you in God's stead, which is as much as God Himself would say; that should be comforting to us. If I knew that God was in one place, and wanted to absolve myself, I would not go there once, nor in one place, but as often as I could. This is what he has put into the mouth of man, so it is very comforting, especially to the afflicted spirit.

know to get such" there. Secondly, it serves for the simple-minded children. For because the common people are industrious, they always listen to sermons and learn nothing, and even in houses they do not stop anyone from doing it; therefore, even if it is not good for anything, it is good for instructing people and hearing them believe, pray, learn, etc.; otherwise they go like cattle. That is why I said that the sacrament should not be given to anyone, so that he knows what he is getting and why he is going. This can be done most easily in confession.

78 Thirdly, there is comfort in the fact that anyone who has an evil conscience or any other concern or need would like to have counsel, so that he can ask for it. Therefore, we cannot despise confession, for it is God's word that comforts and strengthens us in faith, teaches us what we lack, and gives us counsel in our needs. That is why no one does this confession properly except devout Christians. For it must be such people who feel that they would like to get advice and comfort. But this is the mistake, that one did not pay attention to the absolution, but to our work, how well and purely one confessed; in addition, one wanted to count the sin, which one cannot do, is also too much and great work with listening.

Therefore, this would be the best way to get away with it briefly: Dear brother, I come to lament my sin, that I am a sinner before God and man, especially I care about this and that piece 2c. Will you say it or not, is up to you. Then decided: Therefore I pray, give me good comfort, and strengthen my soul 2c. So it would have no trouble and work, without it being delicious work, which no one does, but a devout Christian.

80. From all this you see that the devil's commandment is that he presses everyone into obedience and mortal sin, and that those who do not do it give it to the devil, since it is not in our power either to take or to give, but it is a gift from heaven, Jac. 1. If I drive all to it, how many are they who gladly confess that they are driven to it?

without all distress? Not one in twenty thousand. With the others they do no more than mock God and blaspheme abominably. For the priest pronounces a judgment in God's stead, which is lacking and does not come true. For he does not like to confess and to hear absolution, nor does he believe in it. The fault is not in the priest, but in the one who confesses, who confesses and does not desire absolution from the heart.

Now God is not pleased that one should keep His word in vain, Exodus 20:7. If you do not desire it, let it stand, even all three confessions. It belongs only to pious people; otherwise it is better to leave it pending; it is not righteous, but damnable. So far we have only confessed to the pope for his service, not to our souls, and that is rightly called the pope's or the church's obedience; he has had benefit and honor from it, but the others have had their souls condemned.

So you have a short and clear instruction of the two, sacrament and confession, so that it all happens willingly and out of desire, so that you come from yourself, and present your sin, get comfort and strength, so it is useful and blessed. And it is necessary that the children and the simple people be taught and instructed in this way, not by force, but with good words. For it is especially, as has been said, also for this purpose, and for this reason it should be done in pregnancy. Amen.

20 D. Martin Luther's writing: That these words of Christ: "this is my body" 2c., still stand firm against the swarming spirits. *)

About April 1527.

(1) How true the proverb is that it is said: The devil is a thousandfold. Which he proves mightily in all other things, so that he rules his world, as in bodily outward lusts, deceits, sins, mischievousness, murders, destruction, etc., but he proves it especially and beyond measure in spiritual, inward things, which concern God's honor and the conscience. How can he turn, drag, steer and turn on all sides, and at all ends block himself and put himself in the way, so that no one should be saved and remain with the Christian truth!

Let us take the history of the Christians (the old fathers and the Jews will remain silent) as an example. In the beginning of the

Since the first Gospel, when the Word of God was preached by the apostles in a pure and clear way, and no commandments of men were presented, but only holy Scripture, it was as if there should never be any need, because the holy Scripture would be the empress among Christians. But what could the devil not do? In the end he allowed only the Scriptures to be valid, 1) and no Pharisaic, Jewish commandment or value law should be valid any longer, and he also had some of his own in the Christian schools,' through which he secretly crept and crawled into the fierce Scriptures.

003 And when he was come in, and was sure of the things, he brake out, and went forth unto

1) In the old editions: gölte.

*) This writing appeared in 1527 (first probably in April, because on March 21 Luther wrote to Clemens Ursinus: "Auch ich mache jetzt ein deutsches Buch wider sie (Zwingli und Oecolampads fertig ssksolvos) in several individual editions (the Erlangen edition lists their five), of which two with Melchior Lottber in Wittenberg, one with Friedrich Peipus in Nuremberg, one at Wittenberg without indication of the printer and one with Gabriel Kantz without indication of the place. In the collections: in the Wittenberg (1551), vol. II, p. 119k; in the Jena (1556), vol. III, p. 375; in the Altenburg, vol. III, p. 691; in the Leipzig, vol. XIX, p. 388 and in the Erlangen, vol. 30, p. 14. Matthäus Judex, professor in Jena, translated this script into Latin. This translation first appeared at Nuremberg in 1556 and was incorporated into the Latin Wittenberg edition, Dona. VII (1558), fol. 379k. We reproduce the text according to the Erlangen edition, which printed the text of the first-mentioned original edition, comparing the Wittenberg and Jena editions.

He made such a mess of the Scriptures, and created many sects, heresies and sects among the Christians. And because every sect took the Scriptures for itself and interpreted them according to its meaning, the Scriptures began to be worthless and were finally called a book of heresy, because all heresies make use of the Scriptures. Thus the devil was able to drain the Christians of their weapons, their defenses, and their fortress (that is, the Scriptures), so that they not only became weak and ineffective against him, but also had to fight against the Christians themselves, and made them so suspicious of the Christians as if they were poison against which they should defend themselves. Tell me, was this not a trick of the devil?

When the Scriptures had become such a torn net that no one could be held with it, but every man bored a hole in it where his snout was, and followed his own mind, interpreting and turning it as he pleased, the Christians knew how to do things no differently than to make many concilia, in which they made many outward commandments and orders beside the Scriptures, to keep the multitude together, against such divisions. From this presumption (even though they meant well) flowed that it was said that the Scriptures were not enough, that one should also have the Conciliation and the Fathers' commandment and interpretation, that the Holy Spirit had not revealed everything to the apostles, but had saved some things for the Fathers, until in the end the papacy came out of it, in which nothing is valid but the commandment and glosses of men according to the shrine of the Holy Father's heart.

When the devil saw this, he sneered and thought: Now won! the writing lies, the castle is destroyed, the weapons are down, for this they now weave stout walls, and make weapons of hay, that is, they now want to set themselves against me with human commandments; there, there it is serious! What shall I do? I will not fight against them, but I will help them to build with confidence, so that they may be fine, and gather straw and hay enough. It serves me well that they do not quarrel in the Scriptures, and walk idly on the word, but are content with the same piece.

stand, and believe what Concilia and Fathers say.

(6) In such peace and unity, I will cause other disputes and quarrels, so that popes will strive against emperors and kings, bishops against princes and lords, scholars against scholars, clergy against clergy, and always one against the other, for the sake of temporal honor, good and pleasure, but the unity of faith in the holy fathers will remain intact. The fools, what do they want to do with bickering in the Scriptures and God's things, which they do not understand? It is better that they quarrel about honor, kingdoms, principedoms, goods, pleasures and the thirst of the flesh, which they understand, yet remain devout Christians in unity in the faith of the Fathers, 1) that is, in loose faith.

(7) Thus was the counsel of the fathers: when they thought to have the Scriptures without strife and discord, they were caused thereby, that they came wholly from the Scriptures into pure man's hand. There had to stop discord and strife in the Scriptures, which is a divine strife, that is, since God is at odds with the devil, as St. Paul says Eph. 6, 12: "We do not have to fight with flesh and blood, but with the spiritual wickedness in the air" 2c. But for this, human discord for honor and good on earth has broken down, and yet united blindness and ignorance of the Scriptures remained, with loss of the right Christian faith, that is, unanimous obedience of the Fathers and the Holy See at Rome. Is this not also a piece of devilish art? How one starts it, he is a master and squire in the game.

(8) Now in our day, when we saw that the Scriptures were under the bank, and that the devil held us captive and deceived us with the straw and hay of human commandments, we also, by the grace of God, sought counsel in the matter, and indeed with great sour labor brought forth the Scriptures again, and gave leave to the commandments of men, and set ourselves free, and escaped from the devil, though he honestly resisted and still resists; but

1) In the old editions a play on words: "glosen Glauben" - "loose faith".

But because he has to let us go, he still does not forget his art, has also secretly mixed his seed among us, who should grasp our doctrine and words, not that they should assist us and help to drive the Scriptures, but because we fight against humanity in front, they invaded our army behind us, caused turmoil and raged against us, so that we perished the easier between two enemies. That is (I mean) mercury thrown into the pond.

(9) But he will not leave it at that, but begins with the least, with the sacraments; although in the same piece he has already torn the Scripture into ten holes and evasions, that I have never read more shameful heresy, which in the beginning has among itself so many heads, so many factions and disagreements, although they are united in the main matter of persecuting Christ. But he will continue and attack more articles, as he already sparkles with the eyes that baptism, original sin, Christ is nothing 1). Then again there will be a jumble in the Scriptures and such discord, so many groups, that we may well say with St. Paul: "The mystery of wickedness is already stirring", just as he also saw that after him many more groups would come. And where the world should stand longer, one will again, as the ancients have done, for the sake of such 2) discord, also seek human suggestions, and again make laws and commandments, which will unite people in the faith. This will then also succeed, as it succeeded before.

(10) In sum, the devil is too clever and too powerful for us; he blocks and hinders everywhere. If we want to enter the Scriptures, he creates so much discord and strife in them that we grow weary of the Scriptures and stupid to trust them, and must lie at loggerheads with him and wrestle with him. If we want to rely on human concilia and advice, we lose the Scriptures altogether and remain the devil's own with our skin on.

and hair. He is Satan and is called Satan, that is, an adversary; he must resist and cause misfortune, otherwise he cannot do it. For this he is a prince and god of the world, that he has power enough and can do it. Because he can and will do it, it is not to be thought that we may have peace before him; he neither feasts nor sleeps. So choose whether you would rather fight with the devil or be his own. If thou wilt be his own, then thou shalt have his company, that he may leave thee well satisfied with the scripture. If you do not want to be his own, fight him, grab his hair, he will not miss you; he will cause discord and riots in the Scriptures so that you will not know where Scripture, faith, Christ and yourself remain.

11. Alas, alas, alas to all our teachers and scribes, who are so sure of themselves and spit out everything that falls into their mouths, and do not first look at a thought ten times to see if it is right before God; who think that the devil is now in Babylon, or sleeps next to them like a dog on a cushion, and do not think that he is around them with poisonous fiery arrows that he shoots, which are the most beautiful thoughts, adorned with scripture, so that they cannot notice it. But no admonition, no warning, no warning helps here, the devil is a thousand artists; where God does not defend and help, our actions and advice are nothing; turn it back and forth, and he is the ruler of the world. He who does not know, let him try; I have learned something of it, but no one will believe me until he also learns it.

(12) It is the same devil who now attacks us through the devils with blasphemy of the holy and reverend Sacrament of our Lord Jesus Christ, from which they want to make vain bread and wine the sign or emblem of the Christians, as they dream and like; and the body and blood of the Lord shall not be there, as yet the thin and bright words stand there and say: "Effet, das ist mein Leib" ("Effet, this is my body"), which words still stand there, firm and un[b]iffened by them. I have indeed against the Carlstadt the things with diligence acted, and so that who would not have desire to err, should

1) Thus the Wittenberg and the Jena editions. The old edition of Walch and the Erlangen edition: "not". Also Zwingli (in the writing No. 83 in this volume, § 10) has read "nothing".

2) In the Wittenberg and Jena: "such". In the old edition of Walch and Erlangen: "such".

I think I can make do with it against such a devilish specter. But my dear enthusiasts despise me so magnificently that they do not consider me worthy to answer with diligence; it is enough for them that they look at the book and turn up their noses at it, and say: There is no spirit there. What does it help that I write a lot? They despise it, and if they only chatter a little on it and don't really touch an argument, then they call it answered, and only put their things on a lot of book writing and paper clicking.

13 And this is also one of the causes that I have hitherto refrained from writing further against them, because I have sensed such arrogance and contempt under their highly famous humility. The other, that their rapture is a loud loose talk, that I wonder how such fine learned people might be caught with it. And they also act with such a stupid, despondent conscience that I think they want the beer to be back in the barrel. And if they hadn't started it, I think they should leave it in the queue.

I see nothing else in the matter, but God's wrath, which leaves the devil the bridle to cause such gross foolishness and tangible darkness, to punish our shameful ingratitude, which we have so miserably despised and worthless the holy gospel, so that, as St. Paul says, we believe the wrong, because we have not accepted the love of the truth. There is also nothing lacking in this enthusiasm, except that it is new; for we Germans are such fellows: what is new, we fall on it and hang on to it like fools, and whoever resists us only makes us madder about it; but if no one resists, we soon get tired of it ourselves and gape at it for another new thing. Thus the devil has the advantage that no doctrine nor dream can arise so clumsily; he finds disciples for it, and the more clumsy, the sooner.

15 But God's word alone endures forever; error always rises and falls beside it. For this reason, I am not worried that this fanaticism will stand for long; it is too coarse and insolent, and does not fight against arrogance or uncertain Scripture, but against the light and dry Scriptures, as we shall hear. But now I will set myself against the devil and his enthusiasts, not for their sake, but for the sake of the weak and simple. For I have no hope that the teachers of a heresy or a fancy will be converted; indeed, where that would be possible, so much has already been written that they would be converted. It has never been heard that he who has invented false doctrine has been converted; for such sin is too great, because it blasphemes God's word and sins against the Holy Spirit; therefore God makes them obdurate, so that it goes according to the saying of Isaiah 6:10: 1) "With seeing eyes you shall not see, and with hearing ears you shall not hear. For this people's heart is hardened."

16 Christ did not convert a high priest, but their disciples were converted, as Nicodemus, Joseph, Paul and the like. The prophets of old did not convert a false prophet. Paul also could not convert a false apostle, but gave the teaching: "if one is admonished two or three times, he should be shunned and let go, as a perverse one". Thus the holy doctors have never converted any heretics; not because all of them had not sufficiently denied and convinced all of that error with the truth, but because their hearts were possessed with their own conceit, and they were as 2) he who sees through a painted glass: You put before it what color you want, and it sees no other color than its glass has. But it is not lacking that one does not put the right color before him; it is lacking that his glass is colored differently, as the same saying of Isaiah Cap. 6, 9. f. also gives 3): "You will see it (he says), and yet you will not see it." What else is this said, but: It will come before your eyes enough and well that you will see it, and others will also see it; but you will not see it? This is the reason (John 12:40) that such people cannot be converted: the truth presented does not do it; God must take away the painted glass, but we cannot do that.

(17) Even if I do not convert a master blasphemer, I shall not fail (if God wills) to place the truth brightly enough and dryly enough before their eyes, and to tear down some of their disciples, or to strengthen the simple and weak, and to protect them from their poison. Even if this is not possible (since God is in favor), I hereby testify and confess before God and all the world that I do not hold with these blasphemers of the sacraments 1) and enthusiasts, nor have I ever held, nor do I ever want to hold (whether God wills it,²⁾) and I will have washed my hands of all the blood of the souls who 3) steal, seduce and murder them with such poison from Christ. For I am innocent of it, and have done what is mine. For my sake, I may not write against them, but their own writing is my strength. When I read them, they make me strong and full of joy, because I see that the devil rages against God's word with such earnestness, and yet God does not allow him to do more than slander lame, stale, rotten things, so that I must speak: You would like to, but you cannot. So now, again, to despise the devil, I will take no more than Christ's one saying before me: "This is my body," and see what the devotees have broken off from him so far. Mostly because they are slippery and inoffensive, twisting and turning in a thousand directions, whether I would ask them in God's name to stand on the one saying and answer me correctly. I will save the other sayings for another time.

(18) And I have asked them kindly not to be angry with me for condemning their doctrine and ascribing it to the devil; I cannot do it or call it anything else than what I believe in my heart. Because they call us the

If they think that they are unbelievers and that the spirit of God has left them, they should be patient according to their spirit and their glory, and prove by deed the patience of which they click so many books full. For there is no end nor measure of praise in their writing, how holy martyrs they are, how much they suffer, how temperate and patient they are, how they seek glory in Christ alone. And yet they always cry out and complain with them, how they revile the servants of Christ, and thus give offence to the common people, and desire that they should be badly praised, and say: Vain spirit, vain spirit you are; vain truth, vain truth you teach; then they would be patient.

19. Because we godless unbelievers and impatient ones must suffer from such holy, moderate teachers that they blaspheme us idolatrously, and call our God the baked God, the gluttonous and boozy God, the brooding God, the weeping God, and us the denied Christians and the like, such thoroughly poisonous, devilish disgrace and blasphemy that is beyond measure; For one would rather be scolded full of devils than to have a baked God, and yet we must not be patiently or moderately praised above such suffering. Our servants of Christ are not reviled with it, and our people are not given any trouble with it; it must be called vain praise and correction, pleasure and joy, as they revile us.

020 But if they be but looked on crookedly, or not fallen to: o that is Christ's glory hindered, Christ's servants profaned, the whole world vexed; there is suffering, there is patience, there are all the martyrs' crowns in one heap. And where they are not publicly scolded, they martyred about a word, about written, and picked out a complaint about their suffering, as one breaks a thing from a fence; as Oecolampad does against the Pirkheimer at Nuremberg, that they may boast of their patience, that one may not speak to them. They make a howling and complaining out of it, without doubt before great patience and holiness.

than the holy Christians, even though they do not want to They say that one should have peace, and they suffer as much as we do. For they have to consider that themselves do not stop increasing such discord, as our conscience and faith is as serious about God's word everyone sees and hears. They say that one should have as theirs can be about their faith, because we also peace, and do not stop themselves to increase such wanted to be saved and come to God, and we also hope discord, as everyone sees and hears, is also their joy, the that we have done as much as they have, and before further it goes. They say that it is a small matter, and yet them. Thus says St. Paul: "We do not fight with flesh and there is not a single piece that they so nearly drive, worry blood" 2c., Eph. 6, 12. Therefore I do not look almost at about and stop; the other pieces all lie still. Here they them, but at the one who speaks through them, the devil become martyrs and saints; whoever does not rave here I mean, just as they also consider me full of devils. But is no Christian, and can do nothing in the Scriptures nor in we would gladly be the Kerich and Shabab 1) that they the Spirit, so excellent is the great art who can say bread may reign; only that we may be free to confess our faith, and wine; in the art the Holy Spirit alone now works. 22 First of all, when they write and make books and unhappiness and disunity by deed, and then wipe his exhort that Christian unity, love and peace should not be mouth and say with words: I seek and desire love and torn apart for the sake of these things, for it is a small unity; as the Psalter also says: "They speak of peace with thing (they say) and a small quarrel, for which Christian 3) their neighbor, but they have evil in their hearts", Ps. love should not be hindered, they reproach us for being 28, 3.

so stiff and hard about it, and for making disagreements. (24) Now then, because they are so wicked, and mock Behold, dear man, what is there to saw? We are like the all the world, I will add a Lutheran warning, and say thus: sheep that went with the wolf to the watering place. The Cursed be such love and unity in the abyss of hell, the wolf stepped above, the sheep stepped below into the because such unity not only miserably divides the water. Then the wolf scolded the sheep for making the Christendom, but also, after the devil's manner, mocks the water murky. The sheep said, "How can I make it cloudy and teases it to such its misery. Now, I will not interpret it for you? You are above me, and you make it cloudy for so badly that they do it out of malice, but are thus blinded me. In short, the sheep had to be used, it must have by Satan, and perhaps make such a conscience among made the water murky for the wolf. So my enthusiasts themselves that bites them, namely, "We have truly also, they have lit the fire, as they themselves gloriously caused great trouble and set fire to it, so let us now paste boast, as a blessing, and now they want to shift the blame and cover it up with words, and pretend to find happiness, of the disagreement from themselves to us. Who called it is not a big thing. And even if we lost the matter, we D. Carlstadt? Who called Zwingel and Oecolampad to would have prevented ourselves from losing great things, and we would have put in a little disgrace, and, as they write? Did they not do it themselves? We would have say of singers, when they are missing, they have only liked to have peace and still do; but they would not admit made a piglet.

23. but I would still like, if such enthusiasts do not want No, not to me, dear sirs, of peace and love. If I strangle to fear God. a man's father and mother, wife and child,

2) "one" is missing in the Erlanger.

3) Erlanger: under.

1) Shabab - the scraped off, the waste, sweepings.

And I would choke him, and then say, "Peace, dear friend, let us love one another; the matter is not so great that we should disagree about it; what should he say to me? Oh, how he should love me! So, the fervent ones strangle Christ, my Lord, and God the Father in his words, as well as my mother, Christianity, and my brothers, and want to have me dead, too, and then they say: I should have peace, they want to cultivate love with me. But I want to expose the fools here, so that everyone can see what kind of spirit is in them, 1) so that those who follow them will know whom they believe and follow.

(26) This is a public thing in the day, that we are in dispute about the words of Christ concerning the Lord's Supper, and it is known by both parts that they are the words of Christ or of God. This is one. So we say on our part that, according to the words, Christ's true body and blood are there, when he says: "Take, eat, this is my body" 2c. We believe and teach in the unrighteous; counsel, what do we do? We lie to God, and preach "that which he hath not spoken, but hath spoken the contrary," we are surely blasphemers and liars against the Holy Spirit, betrayers of Christ, and murderers and deceivers of the world.

(27) Our testimony says, "That there is bread and wine, not the body and blood of the Lord. If they believe and teach therein unrighteously, they blaspheme God, and reproach the Holy Ghost, and betray Christ, and deceive the world. One part must be the devil's enemy and God's enemy; there is no remedy. Now let every devout Christian see whether this thing is small, as they say, or whether God's word is to be joked with. There you have the enthusiasts and their spirit, as I have often said that no godless person can esteem God's word great. This is what these fanatics honestly prove, how they consider the words and works of Christ to be nothing but human gossip, like the school bullies are conceited, which should give way to love and unity. But a devout Christian holds and knows that God's word concerns God's glory, Spirit, Christ, grace, eternal life, death, sin, and all Things. But these are not small things. Behold, this is how they seek God's glory, as they boast everywhere.

28 It does not help them to say that they have always thought much and greatly of God's words and the whole Gospel, but only in this piece. Dear, God's Word is God's Word, that must not be much of a problem. Whoever blasphemes and blasphemes God in one word, or says that it is a small thing that he is blasphemed and blasphemed, blasphemes the whole of God, and despises all blasphemy against God. It is One God who cannot be divided, or praised in one place, blasphemed in another, honored in one place, 2) despised in another. The Jews believe the Old Testament, and because they do not believe in 3) Christ, it does not help them. Behold, the circumcision of Abraham is now an old, dead thing, and neither necessary nor useful; nor would it help me to say that God had not commanded it at that time, even though I believed the Gospel. This is what St. James means: "He that believeth in one thing is guilty of all things," Jac. 2, 10. He may have heard from the apostles that all the words of God must be believed, or none; although he refers to the works of the law.

29) What wonder is it, then, that frivolous enthusiasts, with the words of the Lord's Supper, fool with their own conceit, and even deceive, 4) because in this little piece they are convinced that they hold God's word and things in low esteem, and put them under human love; just as if God should have to give way to men, and allow His word to be valid according to it, after which men would be at one or at odds with one another about it? How can one believe such enthusiasts that they teach well and rightly, who are publicly found to be dealing with such devilish thoughts, and advise such things that are enough for God's contempt, blasphemy, disgrace, and for us eternal death and destruction, and yet think that they have done well and given a wholesome Christian teaching with it?

2) Thus the Wittenbergers and the Jenaers. Erlanger: word. Latin: loco.

3) "an" is missing in the Erlanger.

4) "ebentheuern" - to sail into the unknown.

1) Thus the Wittenberg, Jenaer and Erlanger: stickt.

(30) But we poor sinners, who are without spirit, say against such holy Christians from the holy Gospel: "He that loveth father and mother, wife and child, house and home, and his soul more than me, is not worthy of me," Matt. 10:37, and again v. 34: "I am not come to give peace on earth, but the sword"; and Paul: "How rhyme Christ and Belial together?" Now if we are to be Christianly one with them and have Christian love for them, we must also love their doctrine and actions, and put up with them, or at least tolerate them. Let him do this who will; I will not. For Christian unity is in the Spirit, "since we are of one faith, one mind, and one courage," Eph. 4:4, 5.

(31) But this we will gladly do; worldly we will be one with them, that is, keep physical, temporal peace. But spiritually we will avoid them, condemn and punish them, because we have breath, as idolaters, transgressors of God's word, blasphemers and liars; besides suffering from them, as from enemies, their persecution and separation, as far and as long as God suffers, and praying for them, also admonishing them to desist; but we will not and cannot consent to their blasphemy, be silent or approve of it.

32 I have revealed all these things so that one may see how the devil can adorn himself with false humility, peace and patience, as a warning to all who do not humble themselves from the heart, so that they may beware both of the devil and of themselves. For God will not be deceived or fooled; He would take a donkey and condemn great prophets with her mouth, as He did Balaam, Numbers 22:28 ff. Therefore we may well say to such gushers and spirits who offer us such peace, as Christ said to his betrayer Judah in the garden: "O Judah, dost thou thus betray the child of man with the kiss?" Luc. 22, 48. Yes, indeed, a Jewish peace and treacherous kiss is this, since they want to be friendly to us, and obtain from us that we should be silent and watch their burning and murder, so that they bring so many souls into the hellish fire eternally, and have thought it small and nothing.

God warns us with this against the spirits, that he lets them go out like this and betray themselves and show how they deal with lies and falsehood. And whom such a little piece does not frighten nor warn, let him go, he will be lost. The Holy Spirit does not speak and preach such things through his poor sinners, as the devil does through his saints.

33) Now that we have come to the meeting, let us take before us the saying of Christ, of which Matthew and Mark write: "He took bread, gave thanks and broke it, and gave it to his disciples, saying, 'Receive, eat; this is my body which is given for you,'" Matth. 26, 26. 14:22 For I said that this time I would do this saying alone, in defiance of the devil and his spirits, that I might prove how this one saying is strong and powerful enough against all their idle babblings; and the other sayings shall find their time. There now stands the saying, sounding clear and bright, that Christ giveth his body to eat, when he giveth the bread. On this we also stand, believe and teach that in the Lord's Supper one truly and bodily eats and partakes of Christ's body. But how this happens, or how he is in the bread, we do not know, nor should we know. We are to believe God's word, and not set a way or measure to it. We see bread with our eyes, but we hear with our ears that the body is there.

(34) Against this saying they have not yet brought up anything in so many writings that has even a semblance, let alone a reason. I will let them boast and boast, and also swear confidently by God's judgment and wrath, that they are sure of things and have grasped the truth: but these are words so that they would gladly cover and adorn their uncertain conscience, so that no one should notice how their heart inwardly wavers and weaves, like a reed moved by the wind, before the great uncertainty of their conceit and madness. For I may well swear that this saying of Christ, "This is my body," is in their hearts like an eternal pen, which they cannot get rid of unless they are completely wicked, who no longer feel anything, Eph. 4:17, 18. I know well how wicked spirits are.

They do not know when they begin to wrap themselves in fig leaves and want to hide themselves. For because they lack God's word and follow their own conceit, it is easy to judge their heart from Scripture, which teaches us that "the wicked has no rest, but his heart is like a wave of the sea that cannot stand still," Isa. 57:20.

35 Their writings also prove how anxiously they write. Here they boast once, there they complain; here they ask for peace, there they desire instruction; here they shun trouble, there they seek the glory of Christ, and there is so much unnecessary fuss and fuss 1) that they seldom come to the point and write very little about it. And when they have to come to it, they tread as softly as if they were walking on eggshells, wipe over it afterwards as if the devil were chasing them, and fear that they will have to fall down their necks in all letters. When they are over, they wipe away the sweat and the fear, and thank God for the truth; and there is such a teaching and praising of the spiritual food of the body of Christ and of his memorial, 2c., about which no one disputes with them, and we have known it so well and before than they; that one grasps how they do not know what they are saying, or how they should make a nose at people. Rather, a sure conscience, which is certain of the matter, does not tatter and shred in this way, it says it dryly and freshly, as it is in itself; therefore only no one believes their swearing and boasting, they are certainly lying.

(36) Nevertheless let us hear how they take away our understanding from this saying of Christ, and put theirs into it. They say that the little word "is" is to be considered as much as the word "indicates," as Zwingel writes, and the word "my body" is to be considered as much as the word "my body's sign," as Oecolampad writes; that Christ's word and opinion, according to Zwingel's text, is thus: Take, eat, that is my body. Or, according to Oecolampad's text, thus: Take and eat, this is my body's sign. Oh, they are so sure of this opinion, and they also stand so firm in their heart, like a reed that the wind blows away.

and strikes back and forth, as has been said. They then quickly boast that we have no Scripture that says that Christ's body is in the Lord's Supper. Then they humble themselves again, wanting to be informed and to follow where we can prove with Scripture that Christ's body is there.

37 And this is indeed an excellent thing, just as if I had denied beforehand that God had created the heavens and the earth, and said with Aristotle and Pliny and other pagans that the world was from eternity. But someone would come and hold Moses up to me, Genesis 1: "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth"; would I make the text thus: God, which should be called so much as "cuckoo"; but created so much as "ate"; heaven and earth so much as "the warbler with feathers and with everything"; that Mosi's word according to Luther's text thus reads: In the beginning the cuckoo ate the warbler with feathers and with everything; and should not be called: In the beginning God created heaven and earth. That would be excellent art, which even the lottery boys could do. Or if I denied that God's Son had become man, and someone held up to me in front of John 1: "The Word became flesh", I would say: Word means a crooked piece of wood; flesh means a piece of meat; and the text would now have to read like this: The crooked wood has become a hay 2); and where my conscience would punish me here and say: You point freely there, Squire Martin, but, but 2c., then I would press until I became red, and say: Silence, you traitor, with your but, so that people do not notice that I have such an evil conscience; then I would boast and clap my hands and say: The Christians have no scripture that proves that God's word has become flesh; but again I would also humble myself and be gladly instructed, where they would do it with the scripture; which I would have turned thus before. Oh how I would rumble both among Jews and Christians, both in the New and Old Testament, if I were allowed such thirst!

38 Thus you speak: What devil do you want

2) Heie - mallet, wooden hammer, pile driver (Grimm). In Latin: miluus. The translator misunderstood "Heie" - "Stößer" i.e. pile-driver and substituted "Weihe" - "Stößer" i.e. bird of impact.

1) Geplätz - patching.

allow you to do this? Answer: Which devil should do it, because he allows Zwingel and Oecolampad? Otherwise I also know no one. Who has ever read in the Scriptures that "body" should mean as much as "body's sign", and "is" should mean as much as "interprets"? Yes, what language in all the world has ever spoken like that? It is only the arrogance and idle malice of the wicked devil, who mocks us with such enthusiasts, in this great matter, that he pretends to be instructed by Scripture, so far from first putting Scripture out of the way, or making his conceit of it.

39 As if I were to strip a man of his weapons with cunning words, and in exchange give him painted weapons made of paper like his own, and then offer him defiance, so that he would strike me with them or defend himself against me. O that would be a bold hero, whom one should spit at and throw out with lungs to the village, 1) where he would do it seriously, or would only be a good carnival laughter, where it would be shame 2). These enthusiasts do the same to us, wanting to change the Scriptures from natural words and meaning into their words and meaning, and then boast that we have no Scriptures, so that the devil may have his laughter at us, or rather, as the defenseless, may surely strangle us. But against this only one little word, that is no, serves from the measure; then they stand like butter in the sun.

(40) Now let us be judges between us, not only Christians, but also pagans, Turks, Tatters, Jews, idols, and all the world, to whom it should be due that he prove his text, whether Luther should do it, who says: Moses says: In the beginning the cuckoo ate the warbler, or whether he should do it, who says: Moses says: In the beginning God created heaven and earth? I hope that it will be judged that Luther should prove his text, because in no language does God mean so much as cuckoo. Well, Luther crept to the Crosses, he is sorry, he can not prove that God is called cuckoo. For whoever dares to interpret the words in Scripture differently than they read, is guilty of proving the same from the text of the same place, or from an article of faith.

But who will be able to make the enthusiasts prove that "body" is as much as "sign of the body" and that "is" is as much as "interprets"? So far no one has been able to get them to do so. They scream and rave: Where is Scripture? Where is Scripture? and urge us to prove that in the Gospel it says, "This is my body," as the whole world reads and must read. But that it is written, "This signifies my body," or "This is the sign of my body," is so certain that they defy God's judgment, even though no one has ever read it in the Gospel, nor can read it.

God knows that I do not want to speak too close to the Zwingel with such crude parables, especially not to Oecolampad, to whom God has bestowed many gifts before many others, and I am heartily sorry for the man. I also do not look at them in such speeches, but only at the hopeful mocking devil, who has thus deceived and seduced them, 3) so that I in turn also atone for my pleasure in him, in honor of God, and mock him again in such his foolish jokes. For he shall and must be subject to God's words. And this year, if it pleases God, I will dare the devil, 4) that, if God wills, he should also come on a day that prevents me from doing other necessary things; God grant that he tie a rod over his butt, and wake up a slumbering dog, amen. For I write these things so that our people may have the opportunity to answer the ravishers. When they so mockingly ask where it is written that bread is Christ's body, and act so foolishly as if they had never read it, they should be asked again where it is written that "body" is the sign of the body. It is written in the smoke hole, there is their Bible.

1) The expression: "to throw out with lungs," that is, to chase away with disgrace, is also found in the Hauspostille. Walch, St. Louis edition, vol. XIII, 1224, § 9. Latin: pi1lis ex stercore gHuino oonl66ti8 iZuominio8i88lrl6 6 xaZo ejieiatu.

2) Rant - Joke.

3) Erlanger: umführt. Latin: eireumvenit 6t 86-cluxit.

4) Here is "to dare" - to take on. Latin: äsMnabo.

(43) This is the sum of it, that we have for ourselves the light and dry scripture, which saith, Take, eat; this is my body; and it is not necessary for us, neither shall it be enjoined upon us, to write over such a text (though we may do it abundantly), but let them bring up scripture, which saith, This signifieth my body, or this is the sign of my body. For this time we do not want to do the devil the honor of leading more scripture than this saying, "This is my body"; for if we set aside all the glasses that are in the world, we do not find it written in any evangelist: Take, eat, this is the sign of my body, or, this means my body; but we find this without all glasses, so that even young children could read, "Take, eat, this is my body."

. 44 Therefore we ask the enthusiasts not to desire from us to prove this text: "this is my body. For they may ask boys of seven years old to learn such words in school, because the Bible is available in Greek, Latin and German. But they wanted to do that, to show a Bible, in which it was written: this is my body's sign. If they cannot do this, 2) that they will put their mouths and feathers in obedience for a while until they produce such a Bible, or else prove with good reason that such a text can thus be made; but keep silent and do not boast: Where is Scripture? Where is Scripture? for they would cry out such words to themselves, and not to us. For they act against their own conscience.

Here one defies me out of all measure: Oh dear Luther, how easily they will show you the cause and prove their cuckoo. But I am also truly so eager to hear them (believe me), if they are willing to do the same. Well, whistle up and don't spoil the round; let's see whether we should kick or jump. Against the mocking devil I speak thus, not against flesh and blood.

46 First of all, it is certain that Zwingli and Oekolampad are united in mind, as in-

1) letters - spelling.

2) Erlanger: "künnten". Latin: possunt.

the words are different. For the Zwingli says: "this means my body", is just as much as the Oecolampad says: "this is my body's sign"; the German language also gives it and all language, that it is the same, if I say: laughter means joy, and laughter is a sign of joy; that no question still has doubt, "to mean" and "to be a sign" is one and the same. But because here the power lies in whether the word "is" must apply as much in Scripture as the word "signifies," the Zwingli is obliged to prove this from Scripture. If he does not do this, his thing is dirt. Similarly, Oekolampad is also obliged to prove from Scripture that this word "body" must be as valid as the word "sign of the body"; if he does not, he is also dirt, and our text, "this is my body," remains like a rock. 3)

(47) Yes, that it may be seen how far they fall short of the truth, they are not alone guilty of proving from Scripture that "body" is so much as "sign of the body," and that "essence" 4) is so much as "to interpret," but one more thing. Even if they were to find this in one place in Scripture, which is not possible, they are nevertheless also obliged to prove that here in the Lord's Supper it must also be so, that "body" is "sign of the body. And it would be of no use at all if the whole of Scripture were to contain the same sign of the body in other places, and if it were not also contained in this place in the Lord's Supper. For now we are not primarily wondering whether in Scripture "body" is called "sign of the body"; but whether it is so called in this place of the Lord's Supper. The consciences want to be sure and certain in this matter. Therefore, whether you prove that in Genesis "body" is so much as "sign of the body," they are not satisfied with it, but mumble and say: Yes, dear, who knows whether it should therefore also be called so in the Lord's Supper? We must also be assured of this by God's word; otherwise the words stand there for us, and saw us with dry bright text: "This is my body.

3) The Erlanger edition has the words: "das ist mein Leiv" last.

4) Being - to be. In the old edition Walch erroneously: the being.

O how the devil's pants stink here! how he feels so well that he is guilty of this, and does it so sincerely. For we demand both and defy him in both. That is why the enthusiasts shun this debt more than any devil ever shied away from the cross; you must not hope that they will stand here and meet you face to face, or hear what you ask them; it is just a matter of escaping and rushing past; no one wants to bite the piece. Our pastor, Johann Pommer, once reproached the Zwingel in writing that he should prove how in the Lord's Supper "to be" means as much as "to interpret. Yes, the Zwingel, that he would have answered; he sang him a little song about his great suffering in return, and tried to find out whether it was called that way in other places of Scripture, and did not find it either. But that it should be so called in the Lord's Supper he would not touch. He would also have been a fool, and was not to be advised.

49 For thus he proves his interpretation. St. Paul says 1 Cor. 10, 4: "The rock was Christ," that is, the rock signified Christ, therefore it should also apply here "this is my body," and say: this signifies my body. Item, Genesis 2, Mos. 12, 11: "Effet das Osterlamm eiligend, denn es ist des HErrn Passah", that is, it means the Lord's Passover; therefore, "das ist mein Leib" should also read like this here: that means my body.

50 If I now asked Zwingel: Does St. Paul not say thus: the rock means Christ, but thus: "The rock was Christ"; how can you then prove that in the Lord's Supper there is interpretation, which is also not in Paul, by which you want to prove it? but just as you dream it in the Lord's Supper, so you seal it also in Paul. In the same way Moses does not say: "Eat quickly, it means the Lord's Passover," but thus: "Eat quickly, it is the Lord's Passover.^ It is just as necessary for the oppressor to prove his interpretation in Paul and Moses as in the Lord's Supper: for it is not evident in any place. Such an argument is taught to boys in school, that it is called kstitio prinoipii, ivosrtum per inesrtum prodara, and such high spirits do not yet know it. What does Zwingel want to say here to such a hole-laden matter? His

He should not confess error, for it would be shameful; he would much rather say that he is full of the Spirit and must suffer much, and boast until we believe him willingly that there is interpretation in Paul and Moses that no one sees in them.

51 Now I suppose it is true that in Paul and Moses there is interpretation, and we believed it to be his service: what did he accomplish with it? Let us see how he so finely and masterfully casts: Paul says, "The rock was Christ," that is, the rock signified Christ; therefore here also, since Christ says, "This is my body," it must be as much as, "This signifies my body. Dear, let us conclude in the same way, according to the beautiful art. Well, I will prove that Sarah, the holy archmother, remained a virgin, in the Zwinglian way, thus: Lucas writes that Mary remained a virgin, therefore Sarah must also have remained a virgin. Is it not well concluded and well proven? Item, I want to prove that Pilate was an apostle of Christ, thus: The evangelist Matthew writes that Peter was Christ's apostle, therefore this Pilate must also be Christ's apostle, and so on. What I want should and must be concluded from such art for articles of faith.

(52) Yes, you say, it is not true; you must prove each one in particular, how Sarah was a virgin and Pilate an apostle. Why is that? Zwingel is not allowed to prove that there is divination in the Lord's Supper: if it is only in one place in Paul or Moses, then it is enough. The children know it in school, that Partibus ex puris sequitur ml, atHua nsZatis. Nor is the highest art of our spirits to make such "argument" ex partieularidus without Scripture in such high articles of faith.

(53) Then we must conclude that it is a very arrogant mockery of the devil, who, with great certainty, fools us and mimics us with such lazy deception and jugglery. How else would it be possible that such learned men, without the effect of Satan, should be so blind, and praise such loose dreams so highly and propel them into the world for the very strongest reasons of faith? Surely it is not human to have such great thick darkness. So the Zwingel lies in the ashes with his interpretation, just as it has fallen before.

D. Carlstadt with his Tuto. For Zwingel can prove none, namely no interpretation in any place of Scripture, much less that it must be in the Lord's Supper, and does not do so, as he is nevertheless guilty of doing both.

54 For the interpretation in Paul and Moses is soon taken away from him, because Paul says: "They drank from the spiritual rock, but the rock was Christ. Here St. Paul himself shows that he is speaking of a spiritual rock. Now the spiritual rock does not signify Christ, but the rock was Christ Himself with the Jews; just as our rock now signifies nothing, but is nothing else but Christ, as all this also the preachers in Swabia, and I also before against D. Carlstadt have abundantly convinced. But the high spirits do not respect our Scripture, run over it, and only grumble a little about it; so we have answered enough.

55 Similarly, when Moses says: "Hurry up, it is the Lord's Passover", Zwingel cannot prove that it means the paschal lamb. Because one answered soon, thus: "Effet hurry, it is the HErrn Passah", as we say in German: Eat meat, because it is Sunday; drink water, it is Friday. Here no one will force out of me that meat means Sunday, or water means Friday. So also here: "Make haste, for it is the Lord's Passover," that is, it is the day when the Lord went into Egypt 2c.

(56) So also, what more of the sayings they use, in which there is interpretation, none is proven. As when Christ says, "I am a true vine," John 15:1, for he speaks of the true spiritual vine, which he was, and did not signify. How should it read: I signify the right vine; or: I am signified by the right vine? Who then should be the right vine without interpretation? Item: "I am the shepherd", "I am the door", "I am the life and resurrection" 2c., and what are the more. Everything is spoken and understood from the "being," not from the "interpreting," and will never consistently indicate any interpretation; it is vain reverie and one's own conceit. In addition, as I have said, if they already find some interpretation, they can nevertheless use it to

They cannot prove that this is also the case in the Lord's Supper, and all the effort and diligence they have put into it is vain labor.

You still give me so much credit for Carlstadt that I knocked down his tuto, and that there was no solid reason. But if I were to judge between Carlstadt and Zwingel, I would say that D. Carlstadt's "Tuto" would be better suited 1) to such an error than Zwingel's interpretation; it has nothing at all that 2) might adorn it, because he 3) wants to prove his thing out of vain ignotis, incertis, et particularibus. Which, for all reason, is mocking and ridiculous.

58 Oecolampad also wanted to help this insinuation, and since the preachers in Swabia had put it down with a mighty writing, that he himself could not deny that Paul spoke of the spiritual rock, and that there was no insinuation, he did not honor the truth, but rebelled a little against it and said: Paul had nevertheless thought of the physical rock in such speech and had looked there, which means Christ. It is as if we were asking here what Paul had thought or where he had seen, and not rather whether there was interpretation in Paul's words. We know almost well that the physical rock means Christ, and therefore Christ is and is called a spiritual rock, which they must not teach us; but whether there is interpretation in Paul's words, as Zwingel dreams. Then they are silent and rush on, and in their way they let us ask of God, and answer us from their cuckoo; then they boast that no scripture is brought against them. If it is true that one does not have to answer a scripture that has been brought forward, and may speak something else instead, then one does not bring a scripture against them, even if the world were brought against them full of scripture.

59 Now D. Oecolampad is to prove his body sign also from the scripture. Our scripture says: "Take, eat, this is my body"; and it does not say: this is my body's sign. But it is also impossible for him to find a place in the Scriptures where the body

1) i.e. was good.

2) Erlanger: that.

3) In all German editions "es" instead of: "er", namely Zwingli, as must be read according to the Latin.

so much as a sign of the body, let it not be said that he should prove it in the Lord's Supper; and for the sake of proof it lies as deep in ashes as Carlstadt and Zwingel. Nor do they confess so much to God's honor that it is true, and boast as no scripture is brought against them. But if they were not so careless despisers of the Scriptures, a clear saying from the Scriptures should move them as much as if the world were full of Scriptures; as it is true. For it is so to me that every saying makes the world too narrow for me. But if they flutter about and think it is the word of men, it is easy for them not to be forced by the Scriptures.

60 And even if Oecolampad wants to be of the opinion that there is all bread and wine, he still cannot conclude with certainty that "body" must mean "sign of the body"; that is, his reason is not consistent, since the word "body" may be interpreted differently from "sign of the body," and his interpretation cannot be certain or unanimous, as it should be if it were consistent. There are already many others who are of the same opinion with them, and yet accept neither the interpretation nor the sign. Carlstadt lets Leib Leib remain Leib, and stands on Tuto. Some martyr the text thus: Take and eat, "my body is given for you," hear, a spiritual food. These also let the body be the body, and yet are of one faith with him. Some crucify the dear words thus: "Receive and eat; that is given for you is my body." This is how many sects and heads this certain sect has, which in the main are one, and yet the Holy Spirit must be in all of them, as they all boast, and he must, to show evidence and reason in this, not only be diverse, but also repugnant to himself and at odds with himself. But he certainly testifies that one is as well mistaken as the other, because no one can hold the Scripture as it reads, nor prove that it is to be understood differently than it reads.

61 Yes, if swarming were an art, I would certainly want to be as swarming here as they are, and also keep that there would be all bread and wine, and yet raise a new one against them all, and be in harmony with none of them, and bring forward my conceit, thus. D. Carlstadt in this sacred text, "this is my body," martens the little word "that"; Zwingel martens the little word "is"; Oecolampad martens the little word "body": the others martens the whole text, and reverse the little word "that," and put it behind, and thus say: Take, eat; my body, which is given for you, is this. Some half martyr the text, and put the little word "that" in the middle, and say: Take, eat; that which is given for you is my body. Some torture the text thus: This is my body for my memory, that is, it should not be my body here of course, but only for the memory of my body, so that the text reads thus: Take, eat, this is my body's memory, which is given for you.

62 Above all of these are the seventh, who say: It is not an article of faith, therefore one should not quarrel about it, and may well believe here whoever wants what he wants. These even trample it underfoot. Now the Holy Spirit is here in them all, and no one wants to err in such repugnant proofs and orders of the text, 1) and after all only one order of the text must be right. So grossly does the devil fool us. Well then, there is nothing left to martyr in the text, except the little word "my", which I want to pull through the swarms' hackles, so that no leg of your text remains whole and unmarred, and 2) want to leave no one anything more to swarm in it. But I will be the best of enthusiasts, and neither distort nor reverse the text, and not interpret any word differently than it reads in Scripture, but leave each one as it stands, so that Oecolampad may see that "body" need not necessarily be called "body's sign.

(63) And my enthusiasm is most simple. Since Christ says, "Take, eat; this is my body, which is given for you," let it be understood that Moses commanded in the Old Testament to sacrifice the body of the unreasonable beast, that is, the paschal lamb; but I will give you another body for the paschal feast, that is, the bread; on which I will give you the bread.

1) "Proofs" and "orders" set by us according to the Latin, instead of "proof" and "order".

2) "want" is missing in the Erlanger.

that it would be easy for anyone to have it, because you Christians must be poor, and only my memory is driven. But that bread may be Christ's body and be called, I will prove from the Scriptures exceedingly, because Oecolampad his body sign. For thus speaketh the Scriptures, that all things are and are called of God, as he called the Jewish land his land in Moses, and our good works his work, our word his word. Item, in Hosea Cap. 2, 8, he speaks of the Jews: "They took my gold, my silver, my grain, my oil, my wine, and gave it to their Baal" 2c. So here Paul 1 Cor. 15, 38. tells me that every gross thing is called corpus or body, since he says: "God gives to every seed its body, and other bodies are the heavenly ones" 2c.

(64) From this I can easily and delicately deduce that Christ is of the opinion that this bread in the Lord's Supper is His body, which He made as a God who makes all bodies, and calls them His bodies. In addition, he ordained the same his body to be his body in a new way, namely, to eat at his memorial. So that the bread is called his body for two reasons; first, because of creation; second, because of order; contrary to Moses and the body of the paschal lamb in the Old Testament, in which he calls the same bread his body, that is, a body for his use; as I call a knife my iron, a skirt my cloth, for the sake of custom, whether I have not made it according to the essence, but God alone, or according to the form, but the smith and tailor. So Christ can call the bread his body, because he needs and has made such a body for his will.

(65) For this I am helped by St. Paul's saying, "Take, eat; this is my body, which is broken for you. Which, according to the Greek language, may well be understood to mean: which is broken among you and divided or given, as the Scripture calls "breaking bread" distributing bread 2c. Likewise, the words of the cup may well be understood from the Greek and Hebrew: This is the cup, a new testament, which is poured out among you, as wine is poured out of a pitcher for the guests.

How I would like to make a greater impression here, if I were as bold and nimble as my dear enthusiasts.

66) But that in the words of the cup it is written, "A cup in my blood," but that the wine may not be called Christ's blood, I answer, O almost well, and yet may not tut, nor interpret, nor sign, but will lead Scripture to the fact that red wine is called blood in Scripture, Gen 49:11: "He shall wash his robe in the blood of grapes," that is, in red wine; and Deut 32:14: "That they may drink well of the blood of grapes. Now if red wine is blood, but Christ used wine of the same land, which is red, and all wine is his wine, as he made it and now needs it here for his supper, it must be understood in this way. Moses sacrificed much blood of the animals, also much red wine for the drink offering; but what may it be in the New Testament with the poor so much essence? This red wine, which is usually my grape blood, shall also now be my blood with you, instead of all the blood and wine that Moses used for the sacrifice. In German, too, a red wine can be called blood, and one can say: "How is the blood so good in the glass? Thus the philosophers say: The wine is the blood of the earth. Just as Christ says in John 4:34, "that his food is to do the will of his Father," which is like food, so he may also call his red wine and the blood of the earth his blood, because he is like the blood, especially because the Scriptures call red wine grape blood. In spite of Oecolampad, that he also leads his body sign thus from the scripture.

(67) Yes, you say, Squire Martin, you are a great man, but where are you going with this, that Christ says, "That which is given and poured out for you for the remission of sins"? Bread and wine are not useful for the forgiveness of sins, if they are broken and given over the table. Answer: Oh, dear one, do you want to see a fanatic with the Scriptures? I would be sorry to be called a swarmer, if I should not answer; I would at least throw up my trunk and say: You are pretending to conjecture, conceit and conceit. If that would not help, I would unbutton my pants and say: "You are a fool.

If I jump over it so that my ribs crack, I should also cannot prove that it should and ought to be called that, become lame immediately, and then say: "Marriage! he which he is nevertheless obliged to do. But he cannot, God has not brought me a scripture. Whoever cannot do this has denied it 3) to him before, it must be called his own should be thrown out of the swarmers' guild and guilds, dream and Oecolampad's drawing and yawning 4). But a for this is our swarmers' highest art and aid. Now do not pious Christian man, who listens to our raptures, how we watch me too closely, how I want to jump and flutter so play dice with the holy words of Christ, each one on his enthusiastically. Bread and wine are eaten and drunk for dream, would of course say: Oh, you are all boys, and the remission of sins; that is, because Christ ordains to respect God's word for jesting and smoking 5), I want to eat and drink, that one should keep his remembrance stay with the bad text.

thereby; so it is called a cheap eating and drinking of the 70 But you will perhaps chastise me here for giving remission of sins, because one should remember and act Oecolampad's sign so entirely to the devil, and argue that such remission thereby, as he says afterwards, "This do even if he cannot prove the word "sign of the body" with in remembrance of me"; just as one drinks wine for a like Scripture, there are nevertheless many Scriptures which purchase, 1) that there may be a cheap and like enforce that there must be vain bread and wine. Answer: purchase, which one should remember and hold fast. Where there, my beautiful love? They say: The Scripture

Have I raved enough? Have the words of Christ not contends against itself, and no man can bear it where it is been sheerly crushed around and around? I have truly not believed that there is bad bread and wine in the Lord's done it a little too well, more than befits a raving man. Supper. Answer: What Scripture? They say, "It is where Please forgive me, dear Christians, for thus mocking the the article of faith is established, that Christ has ascended wretched devil who mocks us. My wretched enthusiasts into heaven, and is seated at the right hand of God in His are still too young to be able to despise good ideas and glory. Item, that eating flesh is of no use, John 6:63: "Flesh thoughts; that is why they think that if they dream of is of no use." If there should be flesh and blood in the something, it will soon be the Holy Spirit. Oh how many Lord's Supper, then he could not sit at the right hand of fine ideas I have had in the Scriptures, which I had to let God in his honor, and would also give us to eat, which is go, which, if a fanatic had had them, all the printing of no use for salvation. Therefore, one and the same 6) presses would have been too little for him. And I still want Scripture must be made wise, and Christ's body must be to believe that if such thoughts of my enthusiasm would made a sign of the body; this must be the text in the Lord's have occurred to someone, perhaps neither Carlstadt, Supper.

Zwingel, Oecolampad, nor the others should now count Who would have provided such high wisdom to the for anything; nevertheless it is enthusiasm, and Christ's enthusiasts? Here is some of the best reason they have. words remain firm: "This is my body, which is given for Now if I ask them here if they have from Scripture and can you. prove that these two Scriptures are contrary to each other: Christ is seated in heaven, and his body is in the Lord's 69 O how my Oecolampad should rejoice, if he could bring up such a saying, that the body should be called the Supper; item, that flesh is not useful, and that Christ's body sign of the body, as I have now foolishly brought up, that is eaten in the Lord's Supper, and yet these things are bread and wine should be called the body and blood of written? they will answer me.

ten: Thou wilt love us with the Scripture; thou must believe us; we are certain without the Scripture, and more certain than when the Scripture saith it, Seventy-two I answered, "How can this be? Open your eyes, you fool, do you not see that heaven is high above, where Christ sits in his glory, and the earth is low here, where his supper takes place? How can a body sit so high in honor and at the same time be here, let itself be disgraced and be traded with hands, mouth and belly as if it were a sausage? Should this rhyme with the glorious majesty and heavenly honors? Yes, it is more than certain. Thank you, dear sirs, I did not know that in articles of faith one should not ask anything about God's word, but rather open one's bodily eyes and judge with them according to reason what is to be believed. Now I understand what this means, Fides est non apparentium, which is said so much in a new interpretation of these spirits: Faith should not believe any further than the eyes can show it with fingers and reason can measure.

Now, he who asks much becomes unpleasant; but I must ask more, that I may become still wiser. But how can we be sure, dear sirs, that a body cannot be in heaven and in the Lord's Supper at the same time by God's power, because God's power has no measure nor number, and does such things that no reason can comprehend, but must be badly believed? Because he says, "This is my body," wherewith shall I satisfy my heart that God has no way nor power to do such things as his word says? And perhaps, even though One Body is not visible in many places, He would like to have a way and know how to keep One Body invisibly, even visibly, in many places. If he could do that, wouldn't you have betrayed us, you who say no to it before you know it? Do you also have proof from Scripture that would deny God's omnipotence in this regard?

Dear one, let us not swear by the Scriptures; it is not for enthusiasts to stand on the Scriptures: But thou shalt bring scripture, that God may do and do these things.

could. Well, here is my scripture: "What God says he can do", 1) Rom. 4, 21. God says he can do", 1) Rom. 4, 21. And no word is impossible in the sight of God, Luc. 1, 37. Because he says here: "This is my body", he can truly do it and does it. Now you must prove again that he does not do it, nor could he do it. For this is your glorious reason for wanting to strike these words: here is the strike, and we are standing on the right battlefield. If you do not prove that it is impossible, then we will overthrow you and break through with the word: "This is my body." God says it; God does it. Defend yourselves, dear knights, it is time.

You may say here: We can prove it well, we once secretly ascended into heaven at midnight, when God was sleeping most deeply; we had a lantern and a lockpick with us, broke into his most secret chamber, and unlocked all boxes and drawers, since his power lay within. Then we took a gold scale, so that we could be sure of it, and we weighed it exactly: but we found no power that could do this, that one body could be in heaven and in the Lord's Supper at the same time; therefore it is certain that "body" must be called "body's sign". God forbid you, Satan, you wretch, how shamefully and surely you mock us. But my mockery shall also tickle you again, what does it matter!

(76) This is the highly famous reason why they drool the most before others, and stand and insist the most stiffly on it, because they say that the two Scriptures are contrary to each other (Christ is seated in heaven, and his body is in the Lord's Supper), and yet they do not prove it. They do prove that these two Scriptures and their reason are contrary to each other. But this would have been unnecessary to prove, and I would have told them just as well. For that you say that Scripture is contrary to one another does not apply; who asks about your saying? But then I would praise and honor them if they proved this saying with writing or otherwise. Let them leave it, so that the text may stand firm: "This is my body."

1) Marginal gloss in the Wittenberg and Jena editions: "Was GOtt sagt, das kann er thun."

If we now receive this, that Oecolampad cannot prove such his saying, nor show how the Scriptures are contrary to one another before God, as he certainly never can do, then the whole matter is won, and we have received it all. For if this remains, that the words "this is my body", that is, that Christ is the body in the Lord's Supper, persist, then the saying of John 6:63, "Flesh is of no use", will soon come to pass: then miracles enough will be found, and the sacraments will not be bad signs, and all their sores, of which they have much, will dissipate and fly away like dust before the wind. For Christ's body and blood must not be left a useless or small thing; I know this well.

But if we, according to our reason and eyes, judge by our articles of faith and the Scriptures, as Oecolampad does here, then of course one piece of Scripture is contrary to the other. For the scripture that Mary is a virgin, and mother is contrary to the scripture: Grow and multiply; item: I will create a helper for man around him. That I should therefore deny that 1) she is not a virgin, and cry out: The Scripture is contrary to one another; would I be justified in answering, Yes, before you and your reason it is contrary to one another; but how is it contrary to one another before God, tell me? Then I would stand as Oecolampad stands here.

79. Item, that Christ is God, is contrary to the Scripture: "God created man"; if you now go on and say, He is not God, because Godhead and mankind are more contrary to each other than heaven and earth, and cannot at the same time be the person of Christ in Godhead and mankind, and let your reason be that such Scripture is contrary to each other, then you will be answered, Yes, you say it, and before your eyes it is contrary to each other; but show how it is also contrary to each other before God.

80 So also that Christ's body in heaven and in the Lord's Supper is contrary to each other, this is what Oecolampad says, and it is so before his eyes. Yes, but one does not desire that he teaches us his saying, and what is before him otherwise or but what God says and how it is before God; there he lies, there he cannot do anything, and yet he must and should have certainty and certainty if he wants his teaching. Here let them answer. Here let them see how they want to commit crimes. But they do not do it; beyond that they will purr and whistle something else, so that one does not notice how they are pushed here in the hollow way.

81 Now hold them against each other, the enthusiasts and the writers. Carlstadt brought forth the xxxxx; that would not stand. Then Zwingel came, and wanted to make it better with his interpretation; that is even worse. After that, Oecolampad comes with his Leibs Zeichen, as with the very best piece; and passes most badly. For this is his reason: I Oecolampad say that the Scriptures in this piece are contrary to each other. Now is not this a tender, fine reason for faith? when a man thus says, "Although God's word stands there and says, "This is my body," yet, because I cannot understand nor believe it, and think it to be contrary to Scripture, it is not true, and must have another interpretation, regardless of how brightly God's word stands there. This is Oecolampad's spirit and highly praised truth, that human conceit and unbelief should prevail over God's word and establish our faith. Who could not do the same in all other articles? That is how deeply Satan should seduce such people. So this reason of Oecolampad's is overthrown with one word, that is, No, these Scriptures are not contrary to each other; one can say it and make oneself believe it, but not prove it. So then all his splendor lies in the mud.

82) Do you want to have the scripture from us, dear devotees? there it is: "Take, eat, this is my body. Bite yourselves with the same this time, after that you shall get more. O how sure ye were, and thought not that this saying might ever 2) be reproached or reproached against you. For ye had not crucified him alone, but buried him also, and laid guards round about the grave, that he was no more wicked. But now he rises again from the dead, and will never-more die, and throws you, his enemies, under him, and makes you footstools. This deceived the good man Oecolampad, that Scripture, being contrary to each other, must of course be reconciled, and one part take a mind that suffers with the other; because that is certain that Scripture may not disagree with itself. But he did not realize and consider that he would be the man to pretend and prove such disagreement of the Scriptures; but he accepted it and presented it as if it were certain and wanted to be proved. There it falls and is missing.

But if they would think beforehand, and see how they would speak nothing but the word of God, as St. Peter teaches, and leave their own sayings and doings at home, they would not do so much harm. This word, "Scripture is not contrary to one another," would not have deceived Oecolampad, for it is founded in God's word that God does not deny, nor does His word deny: but the addition of his word (I Oecolampad say that the Scripture here is contrary to one another) brings him into such sweat and misery that he denies, turns back, interprets, and tortures God's word as he wills. Lord God, how easy it is for such a horrible case to happen; and we are still safe and do not fear on such a slippery path.

But I will better touch and report their right reason, which moves them to such error, and will bet on it for my body and soul (which I also do not like to lose), that I do not want to miss; for I poor sinner also know a little of the spirit, and a large piece of the old mischief, which rages in us, I mean the flesh. She is most moved by this bit, that it is foolish in the sight of reason to believe that we should eat and drink Christ's body and blood in the flesh in the Lord's Supper. And truly I know, where they gain, that should be the final rejoicing: Yes, I thought it would not be right; I never wanted Christ's body and blood to be eaten in this way. As they are now talking secretly among themselves and the mad mob is obviously chattering. But they would gladly hide this, for they are ashamed to confess it, they know well that it is no good, and they see that it is not right.

85. but it is shameful that there is not so much integrity and honesty in them to freely confess such things as they desire in their hearts, like to have, to see, and to hear, but pretend that the Scripture compels them, which they know is not true, but attack the Scripture with cunning and iniquity, to adorn themselves with it before men, and under the name of the Scripture to bring their poison among the people.

86 However, even though they hide such things with great diligence, the rogue still comes out and lets himself be noticed. Zwingel confesses so much that he has never believed it all his life; and I believe it well that he believes nothing everywhere. Yes, that is even more, he sits in judgment and judges all men's hearts and minds that no man has ever believed such things. If that is not too bold, it is bold enough, and it is not true, I know that all too well. Now from such a confession it is easy to notice that he did not get such conceit from the Scriptures, which he found long after, as his book Subsidium in particular, and others prove; but long before, before he found such Scriptures, he believed so, and now runs first of all, seeks Scriptures and forces them on such conceit, D. Carlstadt also, before he wrote, long before, he said to one: Dear, you will not persuade me that God is in bread and wine. So they go out unawares, by God's power.

The same Oecolampad, when he has jumped over the Scripture that is presented to him: help God, how he licks, how horny he is, how he dances in his conceit and asks: what is it good for? Why the disciples did not worship the bread? Why the Scripture does not indicate such a miracle? What good does it do that Christ is invisible? Why Christians should believe such hard things? How can it be rhymed that the King of honor should let such wicked men play with him? But especially the blasphemous words paint his heart well, since he calls our God the baked God, the baked God, the fleshly God, and of that he calls him the baked God.

1) "Licks" here will probably be as much as "licks" i.e. jumps. Jer. 50, 11. Latin: exultat.

beyond measure. Who should not grasp here what they think in their hearts? If they were moved by the Scriptures, they would probably stop such jokes and deal with the Scriptures.

It is the resentment and disgust of natural reason, which does not want and does not like this article; therefore it spews and köcket 1) thus against it, and then wants to cover itself in the Scriptures, so that one should not know it. It shall not be an article. If I wanted to follow reason's disgust, I would do just such spitting and coking against it, so that the blasphemers would not think that such spitting is the art of the Holy Spirit. I want to say about God: What is the use that he is man? Why should one believe such a hard thing? Why don't the apostles worship him in the Lord's Supper? How does it rhyme that such majesty allows himself to be crucified by evil men? O of the carnal God! O of the bloody God! O of the dead God; and so on.

My enthusiasts, however, prepare the way with such disgust that one will almost deny Christ, God and everything with each other; as they have already begun to believe nothing at all. For they step out of reason's conceit, which is to lead them rightly. But such mockery serves to excite the mad mob, which asks nothing of the Scriptures. For they themselves know almost well that such pagan mockery does nothing against this article. Or, if it smears against this article, it also smears against all articles. For the word of God is always foolishness to reason, 1 Cor. 2, 14. Therefore they would have kept silent about all this, if they were 2) serious about the Scriptures and did not have their hearts full of disgust and unbelief, of which their mouths must be so full. More about this hereafter.

90 Since Oecolampad in his first book of the Fathers' Proverbs desecrates and mocks, he must confess that he did not get his conceit from the Fathers' Scriptures. For they speak so powerfully that they often force the word out of him: Hoc apparot oontra nos "886, it seems as if it were against us. Dear, what is this said otherwise, because, the fathers

What are the strong words there? I cannot get my thing from their writing, but must work diligently to turn their noses on my mind. But he who has to work in such a way that he directs and forces the sayings to himself, confesses that he does not have it from such sayings, but rather has the contradiction from them, and carries and drives his thoughts into them. But what his turning of the nose in the fathers helps him, we will see later.

91 But it is a wonder that the fathers, as much as they are, have never spoken of the sacrament as these enthusiasts do; for they have no need of such words as, It is bad bread and wine; or, Christ's body and blood is not there. And yet it is impossible, because the matter is very much acted with them, that such words should not once have escaped them, It is bad bread; or, Not that the body of Christ is bodily there, or the like, when much is concerned that they should not deceive the people; but speak badly, as if no one doubted that there was Christ's body and blood. After all, among so many fathers and so many writings, there should be one negative, as is done in other articles. But now they all stand united and constant on the affirmative; our enthusiasts, however, can speak of nothing but the negative. Summa, Oecolampad has it neither from the Scriptures nor from the Fathers, but works and sweats to carry it into both.

(92) This is enough of an answer to the enthusiasts. For since we contend and win so much that Christ's saying "this is my body" still stands firm, and their best reasons are nothing, and without all proof naked and bare: so also all other sayings of Christ's supper certainly still stand firm. For I have taken the least and most simple before me, only in defiance of the impotent, lazy, lame babblings of the enthusiasts. In the book against the celestial prophets, too, I have not been industrious in this matter, and no fanatic has yet mislaid the same booklet for me. But I think they despise it and do not read it; or if they read it, they shut their mouths and run away from great humility and the fullness of all wisdom and holiness.

1) "köcken" synonymous with: to spit.

2) "it" is in the Jena; missing in the Wittenberg and Erlangen.

(93) But for the sake of ours, to strengthen them, I will go on, as the reason and causes of the rejecters are nothing; and, moreover, prove that it is not contrary to the Scriptures, nor to the articles of faith, that Christ's body is both in heaven and in the Lord's Supper; though I am not obliged to do it to the rejecters, but they are obliged to prove that it is contrary to the Scriptures, and cannot do it? as has been said. But if I have proved this, let the words go and stand, "this is my body," as they read. For that I should visibly show with eyes and fingers that Christ's body is in heaven and above the table at the same time, as the enthusiasts desire of us, I truly cannot do. He who does not want to believe God's words must not demand anything further from me; I do enough when I prove that it is not contrary to God's word, but according to the Scriptures.

94 And first, let us take the article that Christ sits at the right hand of God, which the enthusiasts hold that he does not suffer, that Christ's body could also be in the Lord's Supper. If we ask them here what they call God's right hand, where Christ is seated, I think they will tell us how children are used to imagine a gilded heaven with a golden chair in it, and Christ sitting next to the Father in a choir cap and a golden crown, just as painters paint. For if they did not have such childish, carnal thoughts of the right hand of God, they would certainly not allow themselves to dispute the body of Christ in the Lord's Supper, or to be so puffed up with the saying of Augustine (whom they believe nothing else, nor any other), Christ must be bodily in one place, but his truth is everywhere 2c.

From what childish thought must it follow that they also bind God Himself in One place in heaven on the same golden chair, because apart from Christ there is no God, and where Christ is, there is the Godhead completely, as Paul says Col. 2, 9: "In Him dwelleth the whole Godhead bodily"; and Joh. 14, 9. 10: "So long am I with you, and ye know me not: Philip, he that beholdeth me beholdeth the Father; believest thou me?"

do you not know that the Father is in me and I in the Father?" Ans this will follow still further, that also we and all creatures sit in the same chair of God, perhaps like the lice and fleas in his choir cap, because Paul says Apost. 17, 28.: "We are his kind, and in him we live, weave and are."

We further ask them: Where is the Scripture that thus forces God's right hand into One place? So they say: Help God, do we not have enough Scripture? Are you blind? Do you not see how full of sayings our books are from the Scriptures? Surely I see that you are useless spouts. You talk a great deal where there is no need; for example, about spiritual food, about Christ's sitting in heaven, about his memory in the Lord's Supper, and the like, since no one asks you. It is your cuckoo that lets itself be heard, there you are full of scripture; but where it is necessary, there you pass by and are as dumb as the blocks, let yourselves dream after it, the whole scripture sounds on your conceit, as Solomon says Ecclesiastes 5:2, that in the world so goes what is due to one, there dream of it. And Virgilius: 1) Qui amant sibi somnia fin^a gunt. There one does not bring him also from.

(97) Why are you not thoughtful and see beforehand whether it is Scripture or not, that God's right hand is a special place, because Scripture teaches abundantly about God's right hand? But now you build such a great and dangerous fancy on your vain dream, and then boast that you have much Scripture. And because you dance so gladly at this round dance, you think that the sky hangs full of violins; and as one says: Who gladly dances, one may easily whistle to him. So because you like that Christ is in heaven and not in the Lord's Supper, you let St. Augustine's saying so easily persuade you to say yes, that God's right is a place in heaven, who are otherwise so rigid, clever and immovable in all the fathers' sayings that, 2) even if they all unanimously urge you to say yes, you nevertheless make no of it. Nor do you think that no one should notice why you write a great deal about unnecessary things and not about necessary ones.

Pieces not a bag, but Alone leads your dreams.

The Scriptures teach us that God's right hand is not a special place where a body should or may be, as on a golden chair; but is the almighty power of God, which at the same time can be nowhere, and yet must be in all places. Nowhere can it be in any place (I say), for if it were in any place, it would have to be understood and decided there, just as all that which is in one place must be decided and measured in that same place, so that it cannot be in any other place. The divine power, however, may not and cannot be decided and measured in this way. For it is incomprehensible and immeasurable, apart from and above all that is and can be.

Again, it must be essential and present in all places, even in the smallest tree leaf. This is the reason: for it is God who creates, works and sustains all things, 1) by his almighty power and right hand, as our faith confesses; for he does not send out officials or angels when he creates or sustains something, but all such things are the work of his divine power itself. But if he is to create and maintain it, he must be there and make and maintain his creature in the most essential as well as in the most essential.

For this reason He must be in every creature in its innermost, innermost, around and around, through and through, below and above, in front and behind, so that nothing more present or more inward can be in all creatures, except God Himself with His power. For it is he who makes the skin; it is he who also makes the bones; it is he who makes the hair on the skin; it is he also who makes the marrow in the bones; it is he who makes every bit of the hair; it is he who makes every bit of the marrow; it is he who must make everything, both pieces and whole: so his hand must be there to make it, that cannot fail.

101. here the scripture goes violently Isa. 66, 2. from Gen. 1: "Did not this all my hand made?" Ps. 139:8, 9: "Where will I go before your Spirit? Where shall I flee before thy face? If I go to heaven, you are there; if I go to hell, you are also around me. If I take the wings of the dawn (which are greater wings than half the world), and sit down at the end of the sea, thine hand shall hold me there.

The Scriptures give all the miracles and works of God to His right hand, as Acts 4:10: "Christ is exalted by the right hand of God"; Psalm 118:15, 16: "The right hand of God does miracles. 4, 10: "Christ is exalted by the right hand of God"; Psalm 118, 15. 16: "The right hand of God does wonders, the right hand of God exalts me" 2c. And Apost. 17, 27. 28. Paul says: "God is not far from each of us, for in Him we live, hover and are", and Rom. 11, 36.: "From Him, through Him and in Him are all things"; and Jer. 23, 23. 24.: "Am I not a God who is near, and not a God who is far away? Do I not fill heaven and earth?"

103. Is. 66, 1: "Heaven is my chair, and the earth is my footstool." He does not say, "A piece of heaven is my chair, a piece or place of the earth is my footstool; but what and where heaven is, there is my chair, whether heaven is below, above, or beside the earth; and what or where earth is, whether it is on the bottom of the sea, in the grave of the dead, or in the middle of the earth, there is my footstool. Now guess, where is his head, arm, breast, body, if he fills the earth with his feet, the sky with his legs? Far, far he reaches above and beyond the world, above heaven and earth.

104 What can or does Isaiah mean by this saying? For as St. Hilarius also speaks about God being essentially present at all ends, in and through all creatures in all their parts and places, that the world of God is full and he fills it all, but is not determined or encompassed by it, but is also at the same time outside and above all creatures? These are all things beyond all comprehension, but they are articles of our faith, brightly and powerfully attested in Scripture. It is little against this piece, that Christ's body and blood are in heaven and supper at the same time, and if the devotees began to come here with reason and eyes, they should soon fall away and say, "It is nothing," and, as is the virtue of the wicked, to say, "There is no God," Ps. 14:1.

For how can reason suffer the divine majesty to be so small as to be present and essential in a grain, in a grain, over a grain, through a grain, inwardly and outwardly? And even if it is a few majesties, it can still be completely and utterly in every single one, 1) which are so innumerable. For he makes every grain special 1) in all things, inwardly and everywhere; so his power there must be everywhere in and on the grain. Now his power is one and the same, and is not divided, because he made the skin of the grain with his fingers and the 2) marrow in the grain with his feet: then the whole divine power must be there in and on the grain everywhere, because he does it all alone. Again, that the same majesty is so great, that it cannot compass this world, nor a thousand worlds, and say, Behold, he is here.

Here let me now answer the enthusiasts. Body still has a comparison with body and may rhyme together. As, bread is a body, wine is a body, Christ's flesh is a body. Here one may be in another, as I may be in the air and in a garment or house, as money in a bag, wine in a cask and jug. But here, since not body, but spirit, yes, who knows what is called God; it is above body, above spirit, above everything that can be said, heard and thought; how can such a one at the same time be completely present in every body, creature and being everywhere? and again, apart from and above all creatures and beings, nowhere must be nor can be, as our faith and the Scriptures both testify of God? Here reason must immediately conclude: "Surely this is nothing, and must be nothing.

1) Thus the Wittenberg. Jenaer and Erlanger: special.

2) Thus the Jena. Wittenberg and Erlanger: den.

If he has now found the way that his own divine essence can be completely in all creatures and in each one in particular, deeper, more inward, more present, than the creature itself is, and yet again nowhere and in none can and can be encompassed, that he indeed encompasses all things and is in them, but none encompasses him and is in him: should he not also know a way in which his body would be completely in many places at the same time, and yet none of them would be, since he is? Ah, we wretched children of men, who judge God and his doings according to our own conceit, and think that he is a cobbler or a day laborer.

(108) Yes, they say, we believe that God's power is everywhere, but that does not mean that his divine essence or right hand is everywhere. Answer: I also believe that in the depths of your heart you believe nothing either of God or of God's power, and I am sure that you should skip all these mighty sayings that I am speaking and acting here, and open your mouths and say, "He speaks of grains and tree leaves, but does not write. For this is what you do, and then you talk about your patience or about unnecessary things. That must be writing.

But we know that God's power, arm, hand, being, face, spirit, wisdom 2c. is all one thing. For apart from the creature there is 3) nothing but the one simple Godhead itself, and thus before the creation God's power and hand, God's essence itself, was without doubt; so after the creation of the creature it will not have become 4) something else. He does nothing except by his word, Genesis 1 John 1. This is his power; and his power is not an axe, axe, saw or file, by which he works, but he himself. If then his power and spirit is everywhere and in all things most inwardly, most outwardly, thoroughly present, as it must be, if he is to make and maintain all things everywhere; then his divine right hand, being and majesty must be in all things.

He must, of course, be present if he is to do and maintain it. Now if he is in one place, as in the virgin's womb, essentially with his own person, and at the same time with

And to top it all off, I will also prove this with the Father, as our faith requires, 2) then he is also certainly example and a story from the Scriptures, and that in this so at all ends. For there may be no reason why he should way: It is our faith, as the Scriptures teach us, that our be in the virgin's womb, and not be so at all ends.

Lord Jesus Christ is an essential, natural, true God, and But in Christ there is something different, higher and the Godhead dwells in him completely bodily, as St. Paul greater than all other creatures. For in Him, God is not only says Col. 2, 9, that is, that apart from Christ there is no present and essential, as in all others, but also dwells in God or Godhead. As he himself says John 14:9: "Philip, Him bodily, so that One Person is man and God. And he who sees me sees the Father; do you not believe that although I can say of all creatures: There is God, or God the Father is in me, and I in him?" Well, there goes Christ in them, I cannot say: This is God Himself. But of Christ, on earth, and is the whole Godhead, personally, faith says not only that God is in him, but also that Christ essentially in him on earth.

Tell me now, how can it be true at the same time, that called a murderer of the thing that is God and that God is God is completely in Christ personally, present, essential within. But he who strangles Christ has strangled the Son on earth, in the womb, yes, in the manger, in the temple, of God, God and the Lord of glory Himself. That God is not in the desert, in cities, in houses, garden, field, on the only in him, but also dwells in him, so that God and man cross, grave, and yet also in heaven in the bosom of the become one person, is the great work and miracle of God, Father? If this is true and irrefutable according to faith, which makes fools of all reason, and faith alone must hold; that the Godhead in Christ is essentially, personally, otherwise it is lost.

present on earth, in so many places, and yet at the same Therefore, we speak now of the first alone, as God is time in heaven and with the Father, it follows that he is in all things Himself personally, without which presence everywhere at the same time, and essentially, personally God could not have become man, and One Person out of fills heaven and earth and everything with his own nature divinity and humanity; for He had to be there beforehand and majesty, according to 1) Scripture, Jer. 23, 23. 24.: in the womb, as He is in Himself in the divinity. O Lord "I fill heaven and earth, and am a God who is near"; and God, where are they who believe all this? What will Ps. 139, 7.: "Where shall I go before your face?" become of them when reason comes here with its womb of the virgin, and there put on mankind. For the (115) This is a powerful enough proof that God's right Godhead is immovable in itself, cannot move from one hand is not a special place, as the enthusiasts dream, place to another, like the creature. Therefore he did not where Christ's body is seated, but is the power of God ascend here from heaven as on a ladder, or descend as Himself. For God's right hand cannot be a creature, but on a rope, but was there before in the virgin body, must be something above and apart from all creatures. essential and personal, as in all other places everywhere, But there is according to divine nature, kind and power. Is he not, but only God Himself, who is everywhere in all things; therefore it must also be true that God's right hand is everywhere in all things, as we have heard. I mean that here we do not, like the scribblers, run over the Scriptures, or deal with other things than belong to the matter, but have firmly established and decided, on the right clear ground of the Scriptures and articles of faith, that God's right hand is everywhere; but they, the scribblers, lose the piece and cannot stand, because they say: It is a strange place, as they comfort their carnal thoughts from St. Augustine.

Now let us speak to them. They confess that Christ is at the right hand of God, and by this they want to have won that he is not in the Lord's Supper. This, of course, is the terrible sword of the giant Goliath that they insist upon. But how would it be if we took the same sword from you and cut off your head with it, and proved with the saying that Christ's body must be in the Lord's Supper, so that you would prove that it must not be there? Would you not take it for a true thing of David? Well, look and listen to us. Christ's body is at the right hand of God, that is known. But the right hand of God is at all ends, as you must confess from our previous revelation. So it is certainly also in the bread and wine above tables. Now where the right hand of God is, there Christ's body and blood must be; for the right hand of God is not to be divided into many pieces, but a single simple being. So also the article does not say that Christ is in one part, as in a little finger or nail of the right hand of God, but that he is at the right hand of God, that where and what the right hand of God is and is called, there is Christ, the Son of Man.

This is also what Christ wants, as often as he confesses in the Gospel that all things have been handed over to him by the Father, and "all things have been put under his feet," Ps. 8:7, that is, he is at the right hand of God; which is no different than that he is also over all things as a man, has all things under him and rules over them. Therefore he must also be close to it, in it and around it, having everything in his hands 2c. For according to the Godhead nothing is handed over to him, nor

He has put all things under his feet, if he has made and kept them beforehand. But to sit at the right hand is as much as to rule and have power over everything. If he is to have power and rule, he must of course also be present and essential, through the right hand of God, which is everywhere.

What does it want to become here? It wants to become this: If Christ in the Lord's Supper had never said these words, "This is my body," nor had he ever said them, yet these words, "Christ is seated at the right hand of God," compel that his body and blood be there, as in all other places, and may not here be some transubstantiation or change of the bread into his body; yet it may well be there, just as the right hand of God must not therefore be changed into all things, even though it is there and within. But how this happens is not for us to know; we are to believe it, because the Scriptures and articles of faith so powerfully confirm it.

We poor sinners are not so foolish as to believe that Christ's body is in the bread in the crude visible way, like bread in the basket or wine in the cup, as the fanciers would like to put on us to tickle ourselves with our foolishness; but we believe straightway that his body is there, as his words on it read and indicate: "This is my body. 2c. But that the fathers and we sometimes speak thus, Christ's body is in the bread, happens in simple opinion because our faith wants to confess that Christ's body is there; otherwise we may well suffer it to be said that he is in the bread, that he is the bread, that he is where the bread is, or however one pleases. Let us not quarrel about words, but let the meaning remain that it is not bad bread that we eat in the Lord's Supper, but the body of Christ.

120. so also the enthusiasts should consider that God has more ways to have one thing in another than this coarse one, which they pretend, as wine is in the cask, bread in the box, money in the bag. "Levi was in the loins of Abraham," says the apostle 1) to the Hebrews Cap. 7, 5. as the Scripture calls all the children in the loins of the fathers and out of the loins.

Item, trees and all fruits are in the kernels and Oecolampad wants to have done a great honor to Bilibald seeds. All things are in our heart, even God Himself, Pirkheimer at Nuremberg, and does not know how great a which is as great a wonder as any. Who will doubt that sin it should be that Pirkheimer interprets such a saying God has more ways that he does not tell us, since one is about the man Christ. But if I were Pirkheimer, I would in another, or since two are in one place at the same time? send Oecolampad a pair of glasses and ask him to count

(121) It is as great a wonder that many bodies are in the letters, if it would help, so that they do not lead so one place, as that one body is in many places. He who lightly over the sayings of Scripture and click their dreams can do one thing can do another. Now we have clear into the books for us.

scripture that Christ came to his disciples through a locked door, and from his tomb also through a sealed stone. If he came in through the window or the door, his body and that by which his body had disappeared had to be in one place at the same time, both intact and unchanged. The evangelist does not say that they saw him come in, but that he stood or stood in their midst. That is, as if he had been hidden there before, and had revealed himself; as he also did to Mary Magdalene at the tomb, and to all to whom he appeared. And Apost. 7, 56. he appeared to St. Stephen standing in the council house at the right hand of God; and Apost. 22, 17. he appeared to St. Paul in the temple; item Matth. 17, 1. 2. 3. the Father appeared in the cloud on Mount Thabor; and Luc. 3, 21. 22. also the

What does Filius hominis descendit, adscendit mean? He speaks so clearly of the Son of Man, how he descended and ascended. Now it is certain that Christ neither descends nor ascends after the Godhead, but after mankind. And if Oecolampad wants to boast so gloriously, he should first prove that such a saying of Christ speaks according to the Godhead, and teach what descending and ascending would be, and act the saying diligently and mightily. But this is not necessary for us enthusiasts, it is enough that we enthuse in this way, so it is said as soon as it is written. But because some teachers have interpreted the descent from heaven, I will save it until I hear my enthusiasts; I cannot write it all at once.

(124) Upon this saying, I may now get other enthusiasts, who will see me, and pretend: If Christ's body is at all ends, I will eat it and drink it in all wine houses, out of all bowls, glasses and jugs: there is no difference that both God and Christ are not far away, but near, and between my table and the Lord's table; oh, how we will devour it! For we unholy Germans are such shameful down, nor back and forth, because God is immovable and swine that we have neither discipline nor reason, and Christ also sits at the right hand of God, and does not when we hear from God, we regard it as much as if it were the jugglers' fairy tales. Speech and history are now going 122 Christ also says Joh. 3, 3: "No one leads to heaven on among the rabble against the Sacrament, who are except the one who descended, namely 1) the Son of Man seduced by the doctrine of the jesters, that one should who is in heaven. This indicates that his body is in heaven rather die than write a sermon among them. For they and on earth at the same time, quickly go away when they hear that [it] is nothing.

1) "namely" is missing in the Erlanger.

And they want to do it and wipe their butts on it. Secular authorities should punish such blasphemers. It is fornication and impudent thirst, because they know nothing about it and still blaspheme like this. And God knows, I write such high things very unwillingly, because it must come under such dogs and sows. But how shall I do it? The enthusiasts must answer for it, who force me to do it.

Hear thou now, thou sow, dog, or swarm, who art thou unreasonable ass, though Christ's body be at all ends, thou shalt not therefore soon eat, nor drink, nor take hold of it; neither speak I to thee of such things; go into thy sow-house, or into thy dung. I have said above that the right hand of God is in all places, but at the same time it is nowhere and incomprehensible, above and apart from all creatures. There is a difference between his presence and your grasping; he is free and unbound wherever he is, and does not have to stand there as a knave in the stocks or forged in the irons.

Behold, the sun's rays are so close to you that they sting your eyes or skin, so that you feel them, but you cannot grasp them and put them in a box, even if you grope for them forever. Thou canst hinder it, that it may not appear at the window; but thou canst not grope and take hold of it. So also Christ, although he is everywhere, cannot be grasped and held; he can peel himself off, so that you get the shell and do not grasp the core. Why is that? Because there is another when God is there and when he is there for you. But then he is there for you when he gives his word, and binds himself with it, saying, Here you shall find me. If then thou holdest the word, thou mayest surely take hold of him, and have him, and say, Here have I thee, as thou sayest. Just as I say of the right hand of God, Although it is everywhere, as we cannot deny, yet, because it is nowhere, as has been said, you can truly grasp it nowhere, but it binds itself to you, and makes you stay in one place. But it does so when it enters and dwells in the humanity of Christ; there you will find it in a place where it is not only in the humanity of Christ, but also in the humanity of God.

Otherwise you will run through and through all creatures, groping here and groping there, and yet you will never find it, even though it is truly there, because it is not there for you.

127 Therefore, because Christ mankind is at the right hand of God, and is now also in all things and above all things, after the manner of the divine right hand, you will not eat him nor drink him as the cabbage and soup on your table, if he will. He is now also become incomprehensible, and thou shalt not catch him, though he be in thy bread, except he bind himself to thee, and appoint thee to a special table by his word, and signify the bread unto thee by his word, when thou shalt eat it; which then he doeth in supper, saying, This is my body. As if to say, "At home you may eat bread, since I am close enough to it, but this is the right thing, this is my body. If you eat this, you eat my body, and not otherwise. Why? Because I want to attach myself here with my word, so that you do not have to swarm and seek me in all the places where I am: it would be too much for you; you would also be too little to take me there without my word.

How few there are, even among the learned, who have ever so deeply considered this article of Christ, or ever believed that it is so exceedingly incomprehensible that God should be man, and man should be God. But the Scripture says so, and faith certainly believes it to be true. If it is true, then we have herewith overthrown the enthusiasts of their best reasons, namely, that it is not contrary to one another, but in accordance with Scripture and faith, that Christ's body is both in heaven and in the Lord's Supper. And it is actually founded in the first article, where we say: "I believe in God the Father, Almighty Creator of heaven and earth". This same article protects and preserves our understanding in the Lord's Supper, as we have heard. It is not that I want to measure and encompass God's power with cubits, as the prophets do, as if he did not have more ways than I have now demonstrated. To have one body in many places. For I believe his words that

He can do more than all the angels can understand; but in this way he has shown us how to shut the mouths of the enthusiasts and to answer for our faith.

But since they are so far from boasting that their opinion is certain truth; certissima, certissima veritas it must be called: they are truly also guilty of proving that Christ's body may not be in heaven and the Lord's Supper, and that such articles are contrary to each other, and that the right hand of God is a special place. For if their fame is 1) true, that they have the truth for certain, then they must also be certain that the right hand of God is a special place, and even more certain that a body may not be in heaven and the Lord's Supper, and that such articles are contrary to one another. For the sake of glory 2) let them be defiant, that they prove it, as they ought and owe. If they do, I will recant and come to them; but there I am assured. But I warn them that they bring clear writing and lay good ground, better than they have done so far. For I will tell them beforehand that they will have overseers, and if I live, and God helps me, I will tell them honestly, if they do not meet it.

130) That now Oecolampad wants to be seen here, how he almost seeks Christ's honor, and drives his mockery against the Pirkheimer, and says: There must be a fine king of honor, who lets his body be thrown back and forth on the altar, even by godless boys 2c. Such words and the like serve to make a minty saint read them and say: He would do well to the king of honor and show him the butt. What then is the honor of Christ, that his body is in the Lord's Supper? Here I answer: It is true, according to Oecolampad's wisdom, Christ has no other honor than that he sits at the right hand of God on a cushion of garments, and lets the angels sing, violin, sound and play for him, and is unburdened with the toil of the Lord's Supper; but according to the faith of our poor sinners and fools, his honor is manifold, that his body and blood are in the Lord's Supper.

1) In the Jenaer: "jrthum" and in the "Correctur" again a misprint: "jrthun" instead of: "jr rhum".

is. First of all, that he makes fools of the learned and prudent, and makes them angry and hardened by his words and works, which he speaks and does so foolishly that they cannot believe, as St. Paul says in 1 Cor. 1:23: "We preach Christ as an offence to the Jews and foolishness to the Gentiles. And again v. 25: "The foolishness of God is wiser than men."

Now this is a great honor of divine wisdom, and with us fools is a glorious and praiseworthy God, who saw the wise with vain foolishness and put their wisdom to shame, so that they must be blind where they want to be the wisest. Such wisdom and honor no other king has or is capable of, as St. Paul says 1 Cor. 1:27: "Has not God put to shame the wisdom of the world?" To put wisdom to foolishness and to shame is not a small honor and virtue.

132. On the other hand, it is an honor and praise of his unspeakable grace and goodness that he takes such hard care of our poor sinners and shows such kind love and benevolence, and does not let him be satisfied with being everywhere, in and around, above and beside us, but also gives his own body for food, so that he assures and comforts us with such a pledge that our body, too, shall live forever, because here on earth he is blessed with an eternal and living food; Now we poor fools think that honor comes when someone proves his virtue, goodness and benevolence to others. For that someone lets himself be honored and served by others is a bad honor and not a divine honor: therefore one would like to lead the enthusiasts to school, so that they learn what honor means.

(133) And here the false-hearted show themselves honestly what kind of spirit they have. For since they do not know the Scriptures for themselves, they fall on this piece and want to confirm their error through Christ's glory, making themselves useless enough and concluding thus: It is not honest, but shameful that Christ is in the Lord's Supper; therefore he is certainly not there, and cannot be there. For Christ must be honest. Now when I ask them who does it say that is not honest? Answer them: We say so. I ask further: Who are you? How do you know it, and how do you prove it? Ho, is it not enough that we say it? One should always answer you with the Scripture.

(134) Be ashamed in your heart that you make such a show with this piece and cannot prove anything about it, and do not see that if the result were good and effective, 1) I would also boast and boast that God's Son was not born of a woman, as the pagans boasted against St. Cyprian and Augustine. Cause: It is not honest for God to be born of a frail body of a vain man. Item: It is not honest for Christ to be led by the devil out of the wilderness to the temple and the high mountain, therefore it did not happen. Item, it is not honest that he was crucified, therefore it did not happen.

Oh Lord God, are these the high spirits? Shall one lead the people away from the bright and certain words of God with such idle and vain talk: "This is my body"? Is the honor of God of all things made worldly and carnal, just as it would be dishonest for a worldly king to be hanged or crucified? But the glory of our God is that, if for our sake He gives Himself down most deeply into the flesh, into the bread, into our mouth, heart and bowels, and suffers for our sake to be dealt with dishonestly, both on the cross and on the altar, as St. Paul says in 1 Cor. 11:27, that some eat of this bread unworthily.

He suffers without ceasing that before his divine eyes his word, his work and everything he has is persecuted, blasphemed, desecrated and abused, and yet he sits in his honor. If I had not read it in their books, I would never have believed that they would have wanted to found this article with such foolish things. But they are blinded by God's wrath, and are not serious about instructing the consciences and making them certain, but only about confusing them, and opening the mouths of the mad mob, so that they should listen to their cuckoos and astonish you. For, as I said, the devil mocks us.

(137) But because we poor sinners must be accused of profaning and blaspheming Christ with our faith and doctrines, that Christ's body is in the Lord's Supper, let us hear how they honor and praise him. First of all, they take and deny the love, grace and good deed in him, that he wants his body to be our food in the Lord's Supper bodily, and in return they give him to sit in one but a single place, like a bird in a farmer. Doesn't this mean that Christ would be considered a child or a fool, if he took a florin and gave him a penny or an aspen leaf for it, and said that it was more precious than the florin? Summa, our faith is that all works of God are honest. As the 111th Psalm v. 3. says: Confessio et decor opus ejus, that is, "what God does is praiseworthy and beautiful." God cannot do anything dishonest or ugly; but the beautiful is not everyone's knowledge, it is spiritual.

It is also of the same high spirit that they lay such a hard rock at their foundation. Yes, they say, because this work is such a great miracle, that Christ's body is both in heaven and in the Lord's Supper, why do not the apostles and evangelists praise it as a miraculous work, as they do other miracles? Answer: How can one do it? He that hath not scripture must have his thoughts; he that hath not lime maketh mud. Who can answer such an excellent objection? But someone might say: The apostles and evangelists may have been so poor that they could not have produced so much vermilion or silver, 2) so that they could have painted a little hand on the edge and written at the same time: Here stands a miracle. For our enthusiasts want to have Christ and his disciples badly bound, where they describe a miraculous work of Christ, that they should write to it that it is a miraculous work; if not, then they want to dispute by this that neither work nor miracle, but badly nothing is. Because Christ says, "This is my body," and does not add, "This is a miracle.

1) i. e. proved.

2) i.e. red color from Brazil wood.

great wonder, it is nothing, since he says, "This is my body." This is almost the same as D. Carlstadt came with his point and big letters, and should also become a rock on which Christianity had to stand, or fall down and sink completely.

Sensible, honest people see that it is a disgrace to let out such talk among the people, and that it is not worthy of being answered. People still fall for it, cling to it, and it must be called vain scripture and truth, against such clear, dry, bright words: "This is my body. Not that they can hold it for truth in conscience, but would gladly that [it] were truth. But we are to thank God, the merciful Father, that He thus puts to shame those who are false in their own prudence, so that they must report themselves as they deal with lies and dreams, to warn us that it is vain devil's spew and mockery 1) so that everyone may beware of such falsehoods; but whoever does not allow himself to be warned, that he will be condemned all the more severely. So we believe that all the words and works of Christ are miracles. Therefore Isaias 9, 6. his name is called: "Wonderful". But we leave the evangelists and apostles free to call them miracles or not.

But they have one reason, which I consider to be the strongest and which they also mean seriously, and I believe it to be true; that is this: It weighs down, they say, the people of such articles. For it is hard to believe that One Body is in heaven and in the Lord's Supper at the same time. I praise my enthusiasts for freely confessing for once the right reason that moves them. They might well have long since kept silent about the other reasons and so much writing; this one alone would certainly have been enough to prove their faith. For from this reason all the other reasons spring. They would not have made such an effort with the others if this one had not urged them on.

141 Therefore, if anyone finds anything difficult to believe, let him believe and say, "It is not true.

1) Jenaer: mockery. Latin: luäkria.

This reason is conclusive and proves it. Therefore it is certainly not true that Christ is God and man. For it is difficult, even impossible, to believe, except for the saints, for whom it is not only easy, but also a pleasure and joy, yes, life and bliss, to believe all the words and works of God. But they do not concern us.

Now we have the enthusiasts with their own confession that they are hostile to the Sacrament, that they have resentment, disgust, disgust and abomination in their hearts against it; that is why they rave so against it. Oh, they should be a little more careful, leave such little pieces in the pen, but God does not want. The Greeks say: A liar should have a good memory. Thus Hilarius says: A godless man cannot be thoughtful. The devil always seals his thing and leaves a stench behind him. Why? Oh, it is not to be fenced against God's wisdom, he still wins.

They also have more reasons, namely, because it is not read that the apostles paid homage to the sacrament nor worshipped, but sat as to other food; so it is concluded that the apostles did not believe that Christ's body was there, therefore it is certainly vain bread 2c. This is a very good and solid reason, from which I will conclude: The apostles sat over the table in the Lord's Supper and did not worship Christ, whom they saw sitting there in the flesh, and did not pay him homage, so it is concluded that they did not believe that he was sitting there; therefore it is certainly not true that Christ was sitting at the table in the Lord's Supper. Mary and Joseph did not worship Christ when he was born, so it is certain that Christ was not there, but Mary gave birth to a moon child.

Such faith should have such evidence, such church should stand on such pillars. Should the apostles worship the sacrament they did not see, and not worship Christ whom they saw? But they should have shied away. Yes, if they had been enthusiasts. But now they cling to Christ with full love, so that they believe his word without all shyness, 2) as love is wont to do.

2) In the old editions: ohn alle Scheuen.

She believes everything," and she thinks nothing is impossible, especially what she hears from her beloved. She is more attached to his words than to what the words say. Mary Magdalene at the tomb thinks she wants to take Jesus herself, so her heart burns with love.

But my enthusiasts measure the apostles' hearts according to their own hearts, which are full of abomination and hatred of the sacrament, and think, We are disgusted and abhorred by the sacrament, and would not have believed it nor honored it. In the same way, the apostles would have had no desire or love for Christ's word, and would have shied away if Christ's body had been there. I can stand it that the devil mocks us with such ridicule. For I think he mocks himself more than he mocks us.

146 One more. Yes, they say, the works and miracles that Christ did were visible, as when he made wine of water, the blind to see, the deaf to hear, and so on. But since the miracle is not visible here, Christ's body is certainly not there. Mend, dear fellows, mend, the fur may be well, it is skin and hair not well off. Such little pieces are called vain scripture and the truth among such people. Now I accept it, let it be true: What miraculous sign is not visible, that is nothing and never happened. Christ, the Son of God, was conceived in Mary's body by the Holy Spirit, the greatest miracle of God; but it was not visible to the eye, therefore it is certainly not true. The Godhead dwells in Christ on earth and still for eternity; but it is not visible, therefore it is not true. But how will they do to their chief foundation and cornerstone: Christ sits at the right hand of God, but it is not before their eyes, therefore it is not true? But it is perhaps no miracle with them that Christ sits at the right hand of God, but a common thing, as when a teacher sits in his chair.

If these are good reasons and causes that teach us certain truths, prove our faith, and assure our consciences, then we are truly in a bad way. If someone were to bring me such books without title and name, and [I] did not know that [there are] such lofty

I would certainly think that they had been made by a gypsy or a loose lad, making a mockery of us Christians. There is no appearance that they are deceived by spiritual blindness, as happens to the heretics, but it seems as if it is vain will to deceive with God's word. It should not be possible that such lazy, lame, stale talk would seriously move a man who was in his right mind, even if he were a Turk or a Jew, let alone a Christian.

But the great resentment and disgust that they have against the holy sacrament, and the fierce desire that they have for their conceit, makes them so rash that they think that everything that they can grasp, even if it is a straw, is a spear and a sword; they think that with it they can kill a thousand at one blow. The own conceit has the heartache with us all, God forbid him, amen.

So our rock and dry light text still stands firm: "This is my body," and has confidently allowed itself to be stormed with stubble and chaff, which has been scattered and blown away by a small wind.

150 Now we want to attack their other cornerstone and the other best reason. For although they have many other loose reasons besides the first reason, which we have now attacked, about which we have told; yet I will now leave it enough at this one, and at the other cornerstone I will also do some, lest I also become a gossip about such loose, lazy frivolities. For I am truly hostile to such gossip, because they are not sayings of the Scriptures, where one could usefully act on some spiritual teaching, but must give word after word, and yet lose time over it and leave better things. But Satan must do so and always cause misfortune and hindrance.

151) So their other best piece is the saying John 6:63: "Flesh is of no use," which Oecolampad boasts is his iron wall, and he truly believes it to be true. But if everything is false that is hard to believe (as they say), then it is certainly also false that this is his iron wall.

I find it almost hard to believe; methinks it is paper, but perhaps it would like to have an iron color.

First, when they are to prove with Scripture that the flesh, in this place, must be and be called Christ's body, in which they are most concerned, for which reason they are also asked, they do as is their way, wipe it away, accept it and pretend it, as if it were certain, and as if they had fought it out chivalrously, and say: "Well, it is certain truth with us. Dear Lord God, who asks you about your conceit? Or, who seeks from you what you think is certain? How often have you heard that these two things, possibile and necessarium, may and must, are farther apart than heaven and earth? as even children and laymen of all languages know well. If you are asked whether what you teach must be so, you answer, "It may be so. Yes, Judas wants to be pious; follows very finely, therefore Judas must be pious. Pilate wants to become a Christian 2); therefore Pilate must become a Christian.

153] So here also: since you are to prove that flesh here must be called Christ's body, you are all mutes, since you are nevertheless obliged to speak, and therefore tell us that it should be called Christ's body. There you are all too washful and garrulous. Yes, it would also like to be called a roast pig, if the "to be called" is to stand with me and to apply to chattering and washing. For one can testify most powerfully against you that Christ, whenever he speaks of his flesh or body in Scripture, adds the word "my" and says: "My flesh," "my body," as he says in the same chapter of John 6: "My flesh is the right food. Item, "who eats my flesh" 2c. Item, "if ye eat not of the flesh of the Son of man" 2c.

154 But since he does not say here, "My flesh is of no use," but rather, "Flesh is of no use," you are truly in distress and fear that you would have to prove that this is called Christ's flesh. There is a great difference between Christ's flesh and bad flesh. For they cheerfully demand of you, and defy you, who shall afflict you.

1) Wittenberger: "from".

2) In the old editions: "Christians" instead of: a Christian.

I told you to change and improve the text and to make "flesh" into "my flesh", and you would have to be humiliated about it. Item, you are not able to prove it, and yet you accept it and insist on it as if it were proven in the most certain way. So the reason also lies there and is unproven, also remains eternally unproven. That is Oecolampad's iron wall.

(155) Yes, they say, the circumstances of the speech indicate that flesh is called Christ's body here. Where there? The word Christ speaks, "Flesh is of no use," and does not say, "Fleshly sense or mind is of no use," as you carnivores say; the word "of no use," in Greek ὠφελεί, conducit, prodest, actually means that which is of no use or good, or of no use. Now if Christ had wanted to understand the fleshly sense here through flesh, and not his own flesh, he would have had to speak like this: Flesh hears or understands nothing. But since he says that flesh is of no use, he must speak of his own flesh, which understands much, but is of no use when eaten. Behold, I thought that ye would answer otherwise than ye were asked, and pass by when ye were called. You are to prove that flesh here means Christ flesh, so you prove and teach us that percipere et conducere, to hear and to be of use, are two different words. Who asked you and asked for this? We know all this well ourselves, and the Vocabularius Exquo 3) or Gemma would also have taught us, without such high spirits and masters.

156 It is still unproven that flesh here means Christ's flesh. For let it be that here not the word percipere (to hear), but the word conducere (to use) is written, what does that help you? Shouldn't Christ speak like this: Flesh is not useful? That is, everything that flesh understands, hears, wants, speaks, does, lets, has, suffers, in short: flesh and what is flesh, which is of no use. And if I want to condemn fleshly sense, I must not be bound to speak thus: The carnal mind hears nothing; indeed, it is much better condemned if I say, "The carnal mind is of no use. Now we have no great power here, whether flesh here is not so much fleshly as carnal.

3) Thus in the old editions. Erlanger: 6X quo.

The word "flesh" means the sense of the flesh, but flesh comprehends everything that is in the flesh, sense, reason, will, word, work, 2c., as has now been said. All this is of no use, and neither forces nor proves such a word use) nor that therefore flesh here must be understood of Christ's flesh; since it can well be spoken of and understood of bad flesh, as I have now proved. Where is the iron wall here? Where is the certain truth?

157 So the iron wall is blown down with a little word, which means mea, "my," because since it does not say, "My flesh is of no use," but simply, "Flesh is of no use," we have won first of all that it cannot be understood of Christ's body. For since he does not add it himself, saying, "My flesh," it is forbidden to amend his words and add anything to them, even if we do not understand it of his flesh.

158 Secondly, that they may not prove with a few letters that flesh here means Christ's flesh. For if we were to admit to them, without any proof, that "flesh" here means as much as "my flesh", who would then refuse that Christ's flesh is not called everywhere, where flesh is written in the Scriptures? Soon all the old heresies would swarm in with crowds, saying that Christ did not naturally have flesh and blood, and was not really man, because they saw that so much evil is said of the flesh in Scripture; as, the Manichaei, Valentiniani 2c. And indeed, such bumblebees are already buzzing around the head of the Zwingel, and sting quickly, since he writes against D. Ecken zu Baden thus: If Christ's flesh is eaten, then nothing but flesh comes of it, because everything that is born of flesh is flesh, as we want to hear. Fie, that the devil should fool and ape us so shamefully, that for the sake of such loose talk we must deny such brightly revealed words: 1) "This is my body", and pretend that the Scriptures are against each other, and force us to it; but our ingratitude deserves well.

Although this foundation and iron wall has been sufficiently overturned, yet because there is no measure to their defiance and boasting, we still want to reveal their foolishness. We also want to swarm with them, and immediately admit that the flesh here is called Christ's flesh, as they are joking; not that [it] may be so; but thus we want to fool and run along this carnival in such foolishness, so that one may see what is to follow from it. Let the iron wall stand firm that Christ's flesh is of no use.

160 Now here I ask: Mary the Virgin, when she was bodily pregnant with the Son of God, and carried Christ our Lord in her womb for nine months, and after that gave birth to him bodily, as a mother, as our faith and the Gospels say, whether she also bodily carried and gave birth to Christ's flesh, in and through her flesh? I, as a fan, do not believe this. Why is that? Because that Christ's flesh, bodily conceived, borne and acted, is of no use. If it is of no use, it is not done, as our reason says: Christ's flesh is of no use; therefore it is not there. For if in the sacrament his flesh is not therefore, that flesh profiteth not, neither is it in the womb, even therefore, that it profiteth not. It is the same cause in both pieces.

161 The angels told the shepherds, and the shepherds found that Christ was lying in the manger, bodily and in his flesh. But who will believe that it is true? If Christ spoke with all the angels: My body is in the manger, we say no. For flesh is not useful, therefore your body cannot be there bodily, but the swaddling clothes and the manger signify your body; because it is one thing, flesh is not useful, and is not there.

162 Item, Simeon took him bodily in his arms, when his parents brought him bodily into the temple, Luc. 2, 28. But great lies are all these together, and is contrary to the glory of Christ, because that flesh is of no use, that is, it cannot be there bodily. This is our ground, this is where we stand, and this is our iron wall. Item, Christ

He was baptized in the Jordan, he walked in the deserts and cities and on the sea, and all this in the flesh, Matth 3, 13. ff. This is all a fictitious thing. Why? Flesh is of no use, that is, Christ's bodily presence is not there, as is now said. Item, Christ sat bodily at the table, in the Lord's Supper, and also talked bodily with His disciples, and they with Him, Matth. 26, 26, and also washed their feet bodily Joh. 13, 5. Yes, it is said, but it is a lie, and blasphemed God's honor. For flesh is of no use. Therefore he was certainly not there in the flesh, but only in the spirit.

Do you say: Stop for God's sake, you are probably raving yourself to death. In the same way, you should also swarm Christ out of the garden, the cross and all his suffering, so that none of them would ever have happened in the flesh, because he had to be there in the flesh in all of this, and his flesh is of no use where it is there in the flesh. Yes, dear one, I will also let him rave about the right hand of God, since everything is up to us, and prove that he is not there. For flesh is of no use. Even though his flesh sits at the right hand of God, it is the same flesh of Christ. For there is no other flesh at the right hand of God. If then it is the same flesh, it is of no use there; if it is of no use, it is not there, and is nothing at all, and goes through this saying just as in the Lord's Supper.

164 And more than this, I will prove that the body of Christ is not spiritual in their hearts, which is their greatest gossip. For, as I have said, flesh is of no use; but flesh is and abideth flesh, whether in the belly, or in bread, or in the cross, or in heaven, or in the Spirit, or wheresoever thou wilt. For the places do not change it; yet wine, grain, money, and cloth remain just the same as they are; they come in a thousand places in one day. Should Christ's flesh not remain the same flesh, be it in heaven, spirit, crib, mother, or wherever you want? If then it be bodily, as it must be, it is no good: if it be no good, it is not there, and nothing at all.

(165) Behold, what a mighty swarm the saying, "Flesh is of no use," can bring about, so that it can destroy the heavens and the earth for Christ's body.

He has made the earth too narrow, and he has driven him out of heaven and out of the spirit, where the devotees had sent him, as into a strong fortress, fortified with iron walls, so that he would be well guarded, so that the boys on the altar would not be able to deal with him dishonestly. Therefore this saying is indeed the strongest foundation and a real iron wall; yes, for us against them, and they could not have raised anything stronger against themselves than this very saying, which they boast of most highly for themselves. So it is with us poor sinners and unthinking, defenseless servants of the baked and bloody God, that whoever wants to strike us brings us weapons enough for us to strike them and defend ourselves.

166 Here they will perhaps answer thus: We do not say that Christ's flesh is of no use in all things, but only when it is eaten bodily. Otherwise, if one eats it spiritually, that is, if one believes that it is given for us in death 2c., then it is useful according to the word of Christ Joh. 6, 55: "My flesh is a true food" 2c. I thank the good instruction. But it still remains that this does not prove that Christ speaks of the bodily eating of his body. For he does not say thus: Eating my flesh in the flesh is of no use, but badly thus: Meat is of no use. Therefore such teaching does not help the matter; it must and should be proved that he speaks of bodily eating. This you will never do.

167 And if you prove this (as you could not), I would like to hear why Christ's flesh is of no use when it is eaten in the flesh, and not also when it is conceived in the flesh and born, placed in the manger, taken in the arms, seated above the table in the Lord's Supper, hanging on the cross 2c. Are all these external ways and customs of his flesh as well as when he is eaten bodily. What is better than that it is in the womb than that it is in the bread and mouth? If it is of no use here, it cannot be of any use there; if it is of use there, it must be of use here also, since no more can be made of it anywhere than that it is bodily and outwardly Christ's body, whether eaten or received.

I am not born or borne, seen or heard, and there is nowhere the spiritual food that is useful, but only the bodily need or action, according to your way of speaking. Who wants to report me here? Is there no one at home here? Well then, the previous teaching is also of no use, and helps me nothing, and must remain on the fact that I have said that Christ's flesh must either be of use in the Lord's Supper, or must be of no use at all, whether it be in heaven or in the Spirit.

168 But again I ask, How? if I eat Christ's flesh in the Lord's Supper bodily, so that I eat it spiritually at the same time, will you not admit to me that Christ's flesh in the Lord's Supper is almost useful? But how can this be? So it can be: I will eat his body bodily with the bread and yet at the same time believe in my heart that it is the body that is given for me for the forgiveness of sins, as the words are Matth. 26, 26: "This is my body, given for you," which you yourselves call spiritual eating. If there is spiritual food, then the physical food cannot harm, but must also be useful for the sake of the spiritual food. Now answer me, I am allowed to give necessary instruction here.

Yes, you say, we but the spiritual food from the bodily. Thank God! Are you the hair, 1) and so pious honest people, that you with impudent lies into the world through so many books so disgrace and blaspheme us innocent poor sinners? Is this your new art and high spirit, which the blinded Luther cannot comprehend? When have you ever heard of us eating or teaching to eat the Lord's Supper in such a way that it is only an outward bodily eating of the body of Christ? Have we not thus taught by many books that in the Lord's Supper there are two things to be remembered? One is the highest and most necessary, which are the words: "Take, eat, this is my body" 2c. The other is the sacrament or bodily eating of the body of Christ. Of course, no one can pass the words through the throat into the belly, but must grasp them through the ears into the heart. But what does he take into the heart through the words? Nothing else, but that they are lukewarm.

namely, "the body given for us," which is the spiritual food. And we have further said that whoever eats the sacrament bodily without such words, or without such spiritual food, it is not only of no use, but also harmful, as Paul says 1 Cor. 11:27: "Whoever eats the bread unworthily is guilty of the Lord's body."

(170) Therefore you should not have taught us that bodily food is not useful. We say more and say that bodily food is also poisonous and deadly. But this does not prove that Christ's body is not there. Rather, it proves that he is there. For if it were not there, the bodily food would be harmless and useful. But since it is not useful, and is also harmful, it must of course be there and be eaten. Neither is it proved that the saying belongs to the Lord's Supper, since Christ says: "Flesh is not useful. And so your dream stands everywhere with vain lies and shame. The mouth that eats Christ's flesh does not know what it eats, or what the heart eats in it; it would be of no use to it, because it cannot grasp or hear the words. But the heart knows well what the mouth eats. For it grasps the words, and eats spiritually that which the mouth eats bodily. Since the mouth is a member of the heart, it must also live forever for the sake of the heart, which lives forever through the word, because it also eats the same eternal food that its heart eats with it spiritually.

We ask you, dear sirs, if you want to rave against the Lutherans or the new papists (as you disgrace us), please abstain from lies and preach and write nothing else about us than what we teach. For as ye have lied unto us hitherto, so do we not teach as ye have now heard. Or if you want to write against us, then write and prove how the Lutherans are such idols that they teach that there is no word of God in the Lord's Supper, but only the body of Christ in the bread. Item, that they have neither heart nor soul to grasp and eat such words, but only the mouth to eat the body of Christ. If you prove this, then I confess that your Scripture is right and well-founded out of measure.

is founded. For your enthusiasm goes against such people, and against no one else; as if mice or sows ate the sacrament, it would be of no use to them.

But if you leave us the words in the Lord's Supper, and admit that we have souls, we will cheerfully ask what devil commanded you to separate the word from the body of Christ in the Lord's Supper; item, to separate the heart from the mouth in us, and to drive only the bodily food into the Lord's Supper, and to tear out the spiritual. For although in the Lord's Supper the ungodly practice such separation for their own condemnation, and eat only the body of Christ without the word, with the mouth, without the heart, only bodily and not spiritual, yet Christ did not institute it in this way, but did both together, eating the word and his body, spiritually with the heart and bodily with the mouth. Now, of course, the abuse of the wicked cannot and should not break or change God's order and appointment.

From all this we conclude that the iron wall of Oecolampad, or the saying, "Flesh is of no use," cannot belong to the Lord's Supper at all. For, as we have heard, in the Lord's Supper a spiritual food of Christ is instituted, besides the bodily, because in it is God's Word, which says to the heart, "Take, this is my body," which the belly or mouth cannot bodily eat nor grasp. Although the ungodly, the papists, and the fanatics do not respect such words, and thus lack the spiritual food, the Christians meet it with their faith.

174 For this reason it is less than nothing, since they say, "Flesh is of no use"; therefore it is not there. For in this way I would also prove that there is no God nor creature, if I only put away God's word, as they do in the Lord's Supper. If you take away the word: "God created the heavens and the earth," then I would like to see who has a God, or what God is good for. Take away the word, "Christ, the Son of God, is our Savior," and I will see who has Christ, or to whom he is useful. In the flesh he is well known, for God and Christ would still be there.

even if he did not let a word of it be preached. But who would it help? Who would benefit, because no one would know that he was anything? If it is of no use, then it is certainly of no use, as the iron wall shows that what is of no use is not.

So also, if God's Word does not say that the heavens and the earth are His creatures, to whom would they be of use? Or what do they help? They are useful to the belly, but not to the soul; if they are not useful, they are nothing everywhere 2c. But where the word of God is added, the heart needs and enjoys the same word spiritually in the word that the body needs and enjoys outwardly and bodily. Oh, what can I say! The old rogue, the devil, has blinded the enthusiasts in such a way that they do not know what they themselves are saying; they talk a lot about spiritual food, but do not know either what spiritual or bodily food is. Therefore, we will speak a little about it here, for the instruction of those who need it to further expose the folly of the devotees and to betray the mocking devil.

First, it is not called spiritual eating, drinking, or acting, if that which is eaten, drunk, or acted upon is spirit, or a spiritual being. For then Christ's flesh might not be spiritually eaten or drunk; since Christ's flesh, wherever it may be, in spiritual or bodily essence, visible or invisible, is truly, naturally, bodily flesh, which can be grasped, felt, seen, and heard, born of a woman, died on the cross: but therefore it is called spiritual, that it comes from the Spirit, and wants and must be spiritually eaten by us. Objectum non est semper spirituale, sed usus debet esse spiritualis. We must prove this with examples.

When Mary, the virgin, conceived and bore Christ, Christ was a real bodily, visible man, and not only a spiritual being; nor did she also conceive and bear him spiritually. How so? So she believed the word of the angel that she should conceive and give birth. With the same faith in the angel's word, she conceived and gave birth to Christ spiritually in her heart at the same time as she conceived and gave birth to him in her womb.

gave birth bodily. For if she had not conceived Christ in her heart spiritually, she would never have conceived him bodily. God might have made Christ's body from her body, in her sleep, without her knowledge, as he made Eve from Adam: but then she would not have become his mother, just as Adam is not Eve's mother.

Now what did she receive in her heart? Nothing else, but the word of the angel, namely: "You shall be pregnant with the Son of God" [Luc. 1, 31]. Since she grasped the word and became pregnant with it in her heart through faith, she also became bodily pregnant with that which the word in her heart told her. Her womb does not know what it receives, for it does not hear the angel's word; but her heart does hear what the womb receives. Now she is pregnant in two ways, spiritually and physically, and yet with one fruit. And the bodily pregnancy would have been of no use to her, if it had happened without the spiritual pregnancy. Now here you see that spiritual pregnancy does not force the fruit to be a spiritual being. Yes, the fruit is bodily, but it is also a spiritual conception next to the bodily one.

Item, the shepherds saw the Lord, the child, in the manger bodily, and also Mr. Simeon in the temple, Luc. 2. But the seeing would have helped them nothing, if there had not also been a spiritual seeing. But who gave them the spiritual sight? Without doubt, not the sight of the Child, but the word of the angel that sent them to Bethlehem to see the Savior, and the answer of the Holy Spirit that came to Simeon, that he should see the Christ of the Lord before he died. Through the same word, spiritual sight, that is, faith, arose in their hearts, so that they first saw the child spiritually as the Savior, and then with their physical eyes as well. Now it is one child, one Savior, and yet it is seen in two ways: spiritually by the word, bodily by sight. But the eyes of the flesh do not know what they see, for they see the Savior, but cannot understand that he is the Savior. For they cannot comprehend the word. But the heart knows well what the Eyes see. For it hears the words, and knows that the eyes see the right Savior. Now here the thing is bodily, and yet a spiritual seeing beside the bodily.

180) The woman with the issue of blood did not touch a spiritual thing when she touched the hem of Christ, but the bodily garment of Christ; nevertheless, there was a spiritual touching of the same garment in her heart, because she said to herself, "If only I would touch the hem of his garment, I would be healed. Behold, such word and faith in her heart is a spiritual touching. For her hand, of course, could not grasp the word that her heart spoke, "Touch," nor knew what she was touching. But her heart knew that her hand touched the garment of the Savior. But how did it know? Not from touching it, but from the word, "This is the Savior." Now what touches the heart spiritually? Nothing else, but the same bodily garment that touches the hand bodily. The bodily garment is one, and yet there are two kinds of touching, spiritual and bodily.

The land of Canaan was given to Abraham by God. Now the land is a physical thing, but there is also a spiritual taking of the same land. For Abraham took it spiritually by faith, because his heart said: I believe it, and take it. But from where did he take it? Doubtless not from the land, of which he never possessed a foot; but from the word which he said, "Unto thee and unto thy seed will I give this land." Now that his children Since his children took it bodily, their body or hand did not know what they took. For the body does not hear the word of God, but Abraham's heart knew and saw what his children's bodies took. Now they take nothing else bodily than what Abraham had previously taken spiritually through faith in God's word.

182) And when he begat Isaac his son by Sarah, the same was a man in the flesh: neither is there two witnesses, spiritual and corporeal. For Abraham begat Isaac spiritually by faith, when his heart said: I believe that I will beget Isaac. But where did he get the witness? Not from

His body, or of Sarah, but of the word, "Sarah shall bear thee a son." Now when he begat the son in the flesh, his body knew not what he did, because it could not hear the word. But his heart knew what his body did, for his heart heard the word and knew that his body begat Isaac, whom he had begotten before by the word of God in faith. Now it is the same Isaac in the flesh that his heart begat spiritually through faith and his body begat bodily through the work, as St. Paul Rom. 4:3 almost praises this faith of Abraham.

Henceforth, all that which our body does outwardly and bodily, when God's word comes to it, and is done by faith, it is and is called spiritual; that nothing can be so bodily, carnal, or outward, it becomes spiritual when it is done in the word and faith. That "spiritual" is nothing else, but what is done by the Spirit and faith, in and through us, God grant, that the thing with which we deal, be it bodily or spiritual, scilicet in usu, non in objecto, spiritus est; be it seeing, hearing, speaking, grasping, bearing, carrying, eating, drinking, or what it may. For he that serveth his neighbor, and doeth it bodily, it is no good to him. For the flesh is of no use. But if he does it spiritually, that is, if his heart does it through faith in God's word, then it is life and blessedness. Now there is one kind of bodily neighbor, that he may walk, but two kinds of doings. The body does not know what it is doing, it is driven like a beast; but the heart knows what the body is doing. From where? Not from the neighbor, but from the word of God, which says: "Love your neighbor.

For so God does with us, that he sets before us both his work and his word. The work is to be done by the body, the word by the soul; for if the work were presented without the word, it would be of no use to anyone. As if he had sent Christ to Mary without a word, the work would be of no use to her. For she would know nothing about it, nor would she know it. Item, if he had let Christ die and rise again, and let such a work remain hidden and not proclaim it by word, to whom would it be of use? What use is it even now, to whom he has preached?

Is it bodily carried by the eyes, and they do not accept the word in the heart? Since our body is to deal with such works bodily, and yet cannot hear the word; again, the soul cannot go out and deal with the work bodily, God thus divides it according to both measures, and gives the word for the soul, and the work for the body, so that they both may be saved and enjoy the same grace in two ways, each his own humble portion.

Now tell me here who are the true Capernaïtes. For Oecolampad chides us that we are Capernaïtes, because we eat Christ's flesh bodily in the Lord's Supper. But I say that dw gushers are right Capernaïtes. For the Capernaïtes also separated the work from the word, and fell upon the bodily meat-eating; even as our enthusiasts do, separating the words, and leaving them, wherein is the spiritual meat, gazing and yawning 1) while at the bodily meat, as fools look into the mouth, and gape with their eyes, that they cannot perceive the words which are plainly written, "Take, eat; this is my body." This is what the Capernaïtes did.

But we may not be Capernaïtes, for we keep both bodily and spiritual food. The mouth eats the body of Christ bodily, for it cannot grasp the words nor eat them, and does not know what it eats, tasting as if it were eating something other than Christ's body. But the heart grasps the words in faith, and eats the same spiritually that the mouth eats bodily. For the heart sees what the mouth eats bodily. But from where does it see? Not from the bread, nor from the eating of the mouth, but from the word which is written, "Eat, this is my body," and yet is one body of Christ. For both. mouth and heart eat, each in its own measure and manner. The heart cannot eat it bodily; so the mouth cannot eat it spiritually. God therefore makes it equal, that the mouth may eat for the heart in the flesh, and the heart for the mouth in the spirit, and so both may be satisfied and saved with one food.

1) Thus the Wittenbergers: "gehnemeulen" i.e. yawning open the mouth. Jenaer and Erlanger: "genemeulen". Latin: xatulo ors indiant.

For not even the body with no understanding knows that it eats such food, so that it should live forever. For it does not feel it, but dies and rots, as if it had eaten other food, like an unreasonable animal. But the soul sees and understands that the body must live forever, because it eats an eternal food, which will not leave it in the grave or dust rotting and decaying.

Yes, they say, Mary, when she was with child and gave birth, she also saw her child in the flesh; the shepherds and Simeon also saw him, and so on; the others saw everything they believed. What shall we say: I hear you, you tender, disgusting fruit, want to teach your God how He should present Himself to you in the flesh; perhaps you also want to become Mary, His mother, and Simeon, and are not satisfied with the way He presents Himself to you? As you wish, go and make your own, you will see. But we trust in our God, who has willed to give birth to Mary spiritually and physically, and not to be eaten or drunk either physically or spiritually. Of the shepherds and Simeon he would be seen spiritually and bodily, and not born, neither eaten. So according to his pleasure, to whom he desired to be seen, heard, born, suckled, borne, touched, and the like, both bodily and spiritual.

But of us here he will neither be born, nor seen, nor heard, nor not touched, but only eaten and drunk, both bodily and spiritually, so that by such eating we may have as much and be as far away as those who gave birth, saw, heard, bore, 2c. and be as near to us bodily as he was to them; but that there must be another way, so that he may be so near in all the world, which could not be where he appeared visibly. For this purpose he has not denied us sight, but has promised it; only that it may be kept up and saved until the last day, that there may be room for faith, and that we may not be saved here in this miserable life. What more can he do?

But that all this is right and well said, which means spiritual, I hope, is quite obvious. For this must be spiritual are called what the Spirit does and comes from the Spirit, just as what the flesh does and comes from the flesh is carnal; as Paul says Rom. 8:5: "Those who are of the flesh are carnally minded; those who are of the Spirit are spiritually minded." Item Rom. 8:13: "If ye put to death the works of the flesh in the spirit, ye shall live." There you hear that also the fruits 1) and works of the Spirit are called spiritual, because they come from the Spirit, as he also says Gal. 5, 22: "The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, patience," 2c. And Summa, the whole life of Christians he calls spiritual, and they all at once spiritual, 1 Cor. 1, 30. and Cap. 2, 12. that [there] is no doubt that whoever eats Christ's body in the Lord's Supper in faith spiritually, that the same also eats spiritually in the bodily meal and lives and walks spiritually.

(190) But our enthusiasts have a dizzy and fluttering spirit, (2) think that there is nothing spiritual where there is something corporeal, and pretend that flesh is of no use; so that the contradiction is true, that the Spirit cannot be with us except in corporeal things, but in the Word, water, and Christ's body, and in his saints on earth. Have we now almost overthrown the iron wall?

Now let us take Christ's saying before us, "Flesh is of no use," and see if we can do it better than the scribes. And let our reason be this, that where the two words "flesh" and "spirit" are set one against the other in Scripture, flesh cannot be called Christ's body, but is always called the old flesh, 3) which is born of the flesh, John 3:6: "That which is born of the flesh is flesh." For why should they set the Scriptures against each other, if they could get along together? Now Christ's body and flesh are almost compatible with the Spirit; indeed, he is the Spirit's dwelling place in the flesh, and through him the Spirit comes into all others.

among men, because they are flesh"; item, Is. 40, 6. 7.: We were not so far off the mark when we interpreted the "All flesh is hay, but the Spirit blows into the hay, so that flesh to be the mind of the flesh. For in the flesh, where it withers"; and Christ Joh. 3, 6.: "That which is born of the there is no spirit, the highest and best is of course the Spirit is spirit, that which is born of the flesh is flesh." But mind, spirit, will, heart and courage. If then flesh is of no St. Paul, Rom. 8, more or less throughout the whole use, neither is its mind, understanding, will, and all its chapter, always sets spirit and flesh against each other; doings and abilities of any use, and the opinion of Christ and Gal. 5, 17: these two, "spirit and flesh, are against in this place must be this:

And I consider that this is known to Dear disciples, you who murmur and take offense at everyone who reads the New Testament; but if anyone my words, you do not understand me well, for you fall into does not believe it, let him read it, and he will find that the the work of eating flesh in the flesh, and understand it as flesh and the spirit, where they are set against one it is torn with teeth and digested in the body, as flesh from another, are certainly condemned there, as being sinful, the womb. 1) This is a carnal, deadly mind. Since this is true and irrefutable, the flesh, where it is flesh. All my words are spirit; therefore both flesh and set against the Spirit, is not called Christ's body, but the food, and all that I speak of, are also spirit and spiritual to old Adam, born of the flesh, it is certain that also John be understood and used. "For the spirit quickeneth; flesh 6:63, "Flesh is of no use," cannot be understood of is of no use."

Christ's body, because Christ holds flesh against the (196) If then the fervent are allowed to stand so stiffly Spirit. For his words are clear: "The spirit gives life, flesh on this saying, "Flesh is of no use," which must be quite is of no use. My words which I say unto you are spirit and dark and uncertain with them, but with us it is almost life." You see that he separates the flesh from the Spirit certain that it stands against them, they should also hold and sets it against the Spirit. For he teaches that life and it against us, whether we stand firmly and stiffly on the spirit are in his words, and not in the flesh. But to the flesh saying, "This is my body," which is quite bright, certain, he gives that it is of no use. And how shall it be of use, if and clear; so that it cannot be made dark and uncertain neither life nor spirit be in it? If there is neither life nor spirit by any art or power, and all fervency about it will come to in it, there must be death and sin in it. But which heretic shame. For we do not yet see the Scriptures, 3) which has ever been so desperate (except the Jews), who held should strive against this saying, as they boast and such things of Christ flesh? Now let the heretics here try pretend, for whose sake we should not stand so stiffly themselves; let them see what they can do; they have upon it. We see that their blind conceit sees through a boasted that it is an iron wall and certain truth; if they can painted glass, and lets itself think that the Scripture strives confirm the fame, I will watch. in many places against this saying; but it rather rhymes the same expression is also found in Luther's "Hausrechnung," De Wette - Seidemann, vol. VI, p. 330. There Seidemann explains "Fleisch ynn Schernn" by "Krebse"; likewise incorrectly the Erlangen edition, vol. 65, p. 234.

2) "so" is missing in the Jena.

3) Scripture----Scriptures.

But Zwingel is first of all an unskilled carpenter and hews rough chips, since he writes in Baden 1): "That which is born of flesh is flesh", Joh. 3, 6. Now if Christ eats flesh, nothing but flesh comes of it. Fie and shame to him who says this; nor does it follow according to the mind of the eye. Haec ille. I say that you enthusiasts are bold, 2) insolent people. You pretend to be very humble, patient and patient toward men, but you are equally foolish and foolish toward God and His Word.

198. Behold now, how subtle is this: "That which is born of flesh is flesh"; therefore, where Christ is eaten flesh, nothing but flesh can come of it. The saying John 3:6 speaks of the birth and nature of the flesh, so it refers to fleshly eating; this spirit even has the Scriptures under its control.

199. for I hold that Zwingel here speaks of natural flesh; as bread and flesh, where it is eaten, becomes flesh and blood of him that eateth it, and would that Christ's flesh were eaten, it should be digested, and become flesh and blood, as other meat. And this is what the saying of John 3:6 means: "That which is born of the flesh is flesh. Rhyme well down the stairs. But if his opinion is this, that he who eats Christ's flesh becomes flesh, or carnal, and not spiritual, then it rhymes even more finely, and may be concluded likewise: He who eats bread becomes bread, and he who eats sausage becomes a sausage, and he who drinks wine becomes wine. So it would be a wonder that the wolves have not long since created 3) or become vain sheep, because they eat so much. Well, such alfenzen we want to let go.

200 But the blasphemy is not to be suffered, that these enthusiasts also want to weave Christ flesh into this saying, "That which is born of flesh is flesh"; and their opinion is bad, that Christ flesh is born of flesh. Thus they indicate how finely they read and understand the 6th chapter of John. The wretched Satan drives them to

To believe and speak with such thirst and stubbornness. How can they think anything good of Christ's flesh, because they insist that it is born of flesh and is flesh? Then they must go on and on saying that his flesh is of no use, and may not deny it.

201. But we poor sinners and servants of the baked God say thus: That Christ flesh belongs under the saying, That which is born of the Spirit is spirit; for his flesh is not born of flesh, but of the Holy Spirit, as also the children and all the world confess in faith, saying, "I believe in Jesus Christ our Lord, who is conceived of the Holy Spirit." And the angel, Matth. 1, 20., speaks to Joseph in his sleep: "Do not be afraid to take Mary, your spouse, to yourself. For that which is born in her is of the Holy Spirit",

202. and Luc. 1, 34. 35. when Mary consulted with the angel how it should be that she should have a child, because she knew no man, Gabriel said: "The Holy Spirit will come into you, and the power of the Most High will overshadow you; therefore the holy thing that is born of you will be called the Son of the Most High. Here you hear that Christ's body is born of the Spirit and is holy, therefore it must certainly not be flesh but spirit, according to Christ's saying, "That which is born of the Spirit is spirit." But of no other man does the Scripture speak thus. Not that I put these sayings before the zealots, for they should be able to revile them and quickly jump over them, as their virtue and high spirit is wont to do; but I want to strengthen and comfort us poor Capernaïtes and carnivores with them against their arrogant devil. For if their ravings continue that Christ's flesh is of no use, soon Marcion, Manichaeus, and Valentine will come, teaching that Christ had no right body, but a ghost of a body, because it does not rhyme that Christ's body is of no use, and yet should have a right body.

203. Now from these sayings we learn what is called spirit or spiritual, what is called flesh or carnal, so that we do not follow our eyes and fingers.

1) To D. Eck. Cf. 8158.

2) Erlanger: "bold and".

3) "schüfen"----- sheep-like. Latin: oviles.

But, as I have said above, that all things are spirit, spiritual, and of the spirit, and that which comes of the Holy Spirit, however bodily, outward, visible it may be; again, flesh and carnal, whatever comes without the spirit from the natural power of the flesh, however inward and invisible it may be. For also St. Paul, Rom. 8, calls carnal sense flesh, and Gal. 5, 20. among the works of the flesh also counts heresy, hatred, envy 2c., which are nevertheless completely inward and completely invisible.

(204) Now if Christ be separate flesh from all flesh, and only spiritual flesh above all, born not of the flesh, but of the Spirit, it is spiritual meat: If it be spiritual meat, it is eternal meat, which cannot perish, as he himself saith, Joh 6:27: "Work 1) meat that perisheth not, which the Son of man shall give unto you." And again, v. 33, 48, 50, f.: "I am the living bread come down from heaven." Item: "He who eats me lives forever." And so on through the whole chapter he teaches how his flesh is the true, living, eternal food, which makes alive and keeps all who eat it, and whoever does not eat it must die 2c.

205 Why is this? Because his flesh is not of the flesh, nor carnal, but spiritual; therefore it cannot be eaten, digested, or changed. For it is incorruptible, like all that is of the Spirit, and is food altogether and of a different kind from corruptible food. Perishable food is transformed into the body that eats it; this food, in turn, transforms into itself the one who eats it, making him like it, spiritual, living, and eternal, as it is when he says, "This is the bread from heaven that gives life to the world."

If Christ's flesh is eaten bodily or spiritually, the same body is the same spiritual flesh, the same incorruptible food, which is eaten in the Lord's Supper with the mouth bodily and with the heart spiritually, after Christ's institution, or eaten only with the heart spiritually through the word, as he teaches, John 6:35. For the fact that in the Lord's Supper he is eaten with the mouth bodily does not break him off, so that he must become flesh or carnal food; but if he goes into the mouth or heart, it is the same body; just as when he went on earth, he remained the same Christ, if he came into the hands of the pious or the wicked.

Therefore, the disciples should not conclude thus: If Christ is eaten meat, then nothing but meat is made of it. This is true if one speaks of beef or boar meat, and Capernaïtes speak in this way. But thus: If Christ is eaten flesh, nothing but spirit comes of it. For it is spiritual flesh, and cannot be changed, but changes and gives the spirit to him that eateth it. Since the poor sack of maggots, our body, also has the hope of the resurrection of the dead and of eternal life, it must also become spiritual and digest and consume the old fleshly things in it. This is what this spiritual food does, when he eats it bodily, it digests his flesh and transforms him, so that he also becomes spiritually alive and blessed forever, as Paul, 1 Cor. 15:44, says: "The body will rise spiritually."

For in this eating it is so, that I give a gross example, as if the wolf devoured a sheep, and the sheep was such strong meat, that it changed the wolf, and made a sheep of it. So we, if we eat Christ's flesh bodily and spiritually, the food is so strong that it transforms us in itself and makes spiritual, holy, living men out of carnal, sinful, mortal men; just as we already are, but still hidden in faith and hope, and is not yet revealed, on the last day we will see it. And if they can badly eat bread and wine and drink without harm, because they also eat Christ's body and blood spiritually, they should also admit to us that it would be harmless to eat Christ's flesh bodily, besides the spiritual food; because Christ's body is as good as bread and wine, as I have written against D. Carlstadt. But it is not worth that

It 1) such high spirits should read and answer, therefore 2) I must let it pass here also.

209] Here I will leave it with the two main points and cornerstones of the prophets, since they say: Christ is seated at the right hand of God, and flesh is of no use, therefore his body may not be in the Lord's Supper. Where these two pieces lie down, they have lost the matter altogether, as they themselves well feel and also confess. But I hope they have become stubble and dust, and the truth has smelled itself on the devil. For this he can do nothing better, but come again and bring straw support, so that he can settle such a case. So he who has helped me now will also have more in store than they think (peace I would like to have where it could be), 3) and bring forth the prophets; but if it should not be, then let go what goes there. I trust to do more with one book than they with ten. For lies need much washing and chattering; truth is soon told.

210 But when they lay little foundations, and make a pretense, Matt. 24:23, "If they shall say unto you, Behold, here is Christ; believe ye not. I have answered this sufficiently in the book against the heavenly prophets, and have not yet been overthrown by them. In the same way, when they say: If the bread is Christ's body, then the bread is crucified for us, I have also answered that there. For the two pieces are D. Carlstadt's, which he leads against me among others. Item, that they ask: Where Christ commanded to eat his body in the Lord's Supper, is also D. Carlstadt's and easy to answer, so: Let them put on Brill, or a boy spell these words: "Take, eat, this is my body", then they will find it well.

211. summa, if we conquer these two main pieces, so that they do not contradict each other: Christ is seated on the right, and yet is in the evening.

I will teach them where Christ commanded his body to be eaten, where it is written that in the Lord's Supper there is forgiveness of sins, consolation of souls and strength of faith, and all their questions, since they so beggarly with places and mending, and yet can nowhere cover nor warm their evil conscience with it. Of such art I may well boast myself a master, by the grace of God. For where Christ remains for me, there all shall remain for me and be found, that I know well.

D. Oecolampad also has mercy on us, and wants to help us poor people, and complains: If Christ's body were in the bread, we would have to worry so much and have so many thoughts about such a miracle, as Christ's body would become bread, that we would forget about his memory, which he commands so harshly: Therefore, it is better that there is nothing to it, than that we have to have such sorrow. Truly, it is a yearly trade here, and should still give the spoiled lazy student cause for concern, as the cow would have gone through the door, and would still have had to leave its tail attached, or as the ox would have had to hang its dung on the top of the beam. It is a tiresome thing to waste time and words with such devilish jiggery-pokery, just as if Christ had commanded us to investigate how his body was in the bread. So I also wanted to say: Christ is not God. For if this were true, we would gain so much to think 4) about such a great miracle, how the Godhead might become man, that we should forget about faith. But lest this should happen, it is better that Christ be not God.

After that he first of all comes into great distress, whether the bread is nobler than the virgin's body; and there is a great deal of such talk in their books. In all of which this is the very best, that they bear witness to how they have a restless, uncertain, insecure heart in this matter, which cannot cease nor desist, ever more and more.

And yet, because they have seen that I am full of joyful words, they want to persuade us with high defiant words as they are also certain of the matter from the measure. But words do not do it, truth and sure conscience must do it; a sure conscience does not beg thus.

214 So that I now keep her on the two main pieces, will now leave all other her chatter and have enough of these told. For I know such spirits well, I have also had many of them before me, how they slip, flutter to and fro and only seek cause, even if it is not, to chat, only that they do not have to stand and answer to the right main pieces, since one asks them and presses them. For they think it is answered, when they make a book, and write on it the little word: answer.

At the end, we will also discuss one or two of the Fathers' sayings, as D. Oecolampad discusses them. They consider St. Augustine as their own, because he often uses the words: mysterium, sacramentum, signum, invisibile, intelligibile. But Oecolampad cannot conclude anything certain from it, as he boasts that he has the certain truth. For although St. Augustine often says that bread in the Lord's Supper is a sacrament and sign of the body of Christ, Oecolampad has not yet concluded anything certain from this. Oecolampad has not yet established that there is only bread and not Christ's body, because one can say that Christ's body is invisible under a visible sign, as the same St. Augustine says: Sacramentum est invisibilis gratiae visibilis forma. Sacrament is a visible form of the invisible grace.

Here St. Augustine himself explains in his own words what he means by the words sacramentum, signum, invisibile, intelligibile, much differently than Oecolampad interprets them. For St. Augustine does not say that sacrament is a figure or sign of a future or absent thing, as the stories of the Old Testament find; but a figure of the present and yet invisible thing. Because we have Augustinum himself, who is in contact with his own

If we explain it in words, we may not interpret or explain it to any other stranger.

217 As often as St. Augustine uses such words: 8Loramsntuiv, vsl: siZnum oorxori8 st 8LvZuim8 Domini, the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, and the like, he stands strongly on our side against the enthusiasts, and wants bread and wine to be a visible form of his invisible body and blood present. But it is due to Oecolampad that he proves how St. Augustine uses the little word sacrament and the like here for a sign of an absent or future thing, as he invents from his head and interprets St. Augustine with falsehood and lies. If he does that, let us depart. We have St. Augustine's explanation ourselves, as has been said. If they now take many sayings from St. Augustine, since he has such a way of saying that the bread is his body's sacrament or sign, and must be invisible, spiritually understood, 2c., then they do nothing more than bring us weapons,' so that we should strike them on the head, if we were not otherwise equipped enough.

218) But what do they say to the saying that St. Augustine ad Januarium, epist. 118, writes thus: It is evident that the disciples, when they first received the body and blood of the Lord, did not receive it sober; but it pleased the Holy Spirit that, in honor of such sacrament, the body of the Lord should first enter the mouth of the Christian before any other food.

219 To this, you interpreters, interpret us this saying, here St. Augustine stands and calls the Lord's Supper a sacrament and yet says: The disciples took the body and blood in the sacrament. St. Augustine calls the Lord's Supper a sacrament, yet he says: "The disciples received the body and blood of the Lord in the sacrament. Item, that the body of the Lord should go into the mouth of the Christians before other food, in honor of this great sacrament. What does Christian mouth mean here? What does it mean that the body of the Lord enters the mouth before other food? And this happens in this sacrament? Is it clear enough what Augustine means by the word sacrament? Does it still mean a mere empty sign of an absent thing? What does the Lord's body mean? Does it mean a piece of bread, or does it mean a piece of bread? There it is that Augustine sacramentum corporis et sanguinis means an outward visible form, under which Christ's invisible body and blood is truly present, received and taken into the mouth bodily, like other visible bodily food. Item, Psalm 33. St. Augustin says: Christ was carried in his hands, when he gave his body to the disciples and said: "This is my body"; yes, he carried the same body in his hands. Is the saying also dark?

I must address their conscience a little here. For their mouth and pen have gone so deeply into the no (as they say) that they cannot turn back to the yes. Their conscience (I say) must therefore think: Truly, we interpret and direct St. Augustine and the Fathers to our mind; but it does not want to be certain. It is not a matter of liking, but of needing. It is not great art to say: This or that may be understood in this way; but this is art, this is also demanded of us, that we prove that it must be understood in this way and cannot be understood in any other way. Possibile does not do it; necessarium does it, as the logicians say. Now we boast of certain truth; but truly we do not prove it, and especially because there are one or two sayings of St. Augustine that are quite clear and bright, that Christ is the body in the sacrament, and sacrament is not a mere sign, as we say. So it is indeed possible that Augustine also uses the word "sacrament" or "sign" in all other sayings, and all his sayings are of no help to us. What does it matter (I say), their conscience must tell them so? For how do they know that Christ's body in the sacrament should go into the sober mouth of the Christian, and that Christ's body should be in his hands and carried, when he says: "This is my body"?

After the apostles, holy Christianity has no better teacher (of my understanding) than St. Augustine, and the holy, dear teacher should be so defiled and blasphemed by the scribblers that he should be kept under cover and protection of their poisonous, blasphemous, seductive teaching, then I will say no to it, because I have a breath, one does him wrong. And it is indeed good to say no to it, because the blasphemers will not accept his words.

alone point to their meaning, and such interpretation nevertheless do not prove, nevertheless boast, they have the bright pure truth certainly. Their proof gives no more than this: it may thus be understood. When they have this, they fall on it and defy that it must be understood in this way. For he who boasts that he is certain of truth, as these enthusiasts do, speaks of course that it must be so. And yet they hit themselves in the cheeks and punish themselves by lying, because they prove no more than: it may be so, potest esse, ergo necessario est; the children in the schools know what that means.

They look only to see whether they will make the sayings of the Scriptures or of the fathers uncertain and bring them into doubt before the people. When they have done this, they leave it there; then they immediately boast that they have the truth for certain, and do not even think that they should prove their actions, just as if they were doing this to spite us. But what kind of spirit this is, which alone directs its art to make the sayings of the Scriptures uncertain and doubtful, and does not also again build certainly and firmly on the other side, and thus on the sand, and boasts of certainty, which it itself makes uncertain, is easy to recognize. For it is certainly not Christ's Spirit who makes certain and certain all that he teaches, as St. Paul praises the Plerophoriam, Rom. 4, 8, and 2 Cor. 1, 19: "In Christ JEsu is not yes and no, but yes yes."

Now Oecolampad does nothing else with the sayings of the fathers, but that he throws them out of the sense, so they were held until now, and makes them uncertain. And again he does nothing to make them certain and firm in his mind, so he lets them float and hover between heaven and earth with all those who follow and adhere to him. This is not teaching, but deceiving; and to boast of such as certain truth is to lie twofold, and to deceive the poor consciences.

224 Tertullianus, the oldest teacher of the time of the apostles, in the fourth book against the heretic Marcion, says thus: "The bread that Christ took and divided among his disciples, he made his body, saying, 'This is my body,'" which is as much as to say: "This is my body.

as the form of my body. But it could not have been a form if it had not been a real body. Now that which is vain or nothing (as a ghost is) can of course take no form. Or did he make the bread a vain thing, or a ghost of the body, because he had not a right body? then he should have given the bread for us. This saying is to help Oecolampad that in the Lord's Supper there is vain bread, and stands stiffly on the word figura, since Tertullianus interprets the words of Christ thus: "This is my body," that is, my body's figura, or form. Hence Oecolampad has his reason for making the word of Christ in the Lord's Supper "my body" of my body sign.

Here I must once again remind them of their duty and office, which they always and forever forget, namely, that they should prove that Tertullianus' statement is not only possible or possible, but should and must be understood on the basis of their delusion. If they do not do this, then we justly reproach them as liars and deceivers, because they boast that they are certain of the matter and have the truth, condemning us with our faith. Now he is never able to prove that figura here is so much as a sign, as others have shown him before, but he forces Tertullianus with his conceit that figura must be called a sign here, and yet cannot be called so, Tertullianus does not suffer it; as we shall hear. Because Oecolampad thus forces the same word and does not prove it, he is already down, and Tertullianus helps him nothing everywhere. How should one interpret it differently? Then you see, what do I ask about it? You shall prove it, it is your duty to speak, to listen to me: There stands the mute.

226 But we do not deal now with whether Tertullianus and other teachers teach rightly or wrongly. For we do not want to build our faith on men, but on God's word, the one rock. Not that we despise them, for they certainly meant it as well as we can always mean it, and offered their work to benefit us; but we act whether the fathers' enthusiasts use sayings rightly, or whether they deal in lies, and see what the fathers held. Now Tertullianus stands and says: Christ made the bread his body in the Lord's Supper, according to the words: "This is my body. Here is no conceit nor wavering; for to make bread his body is to speak aridly, clearly and brightly. Oecolampad lets this go, and jumps once; for it is for us.

But that follows: "that is so much as my body's figura," which Oecolampad accepts as for itself. But figura is a conceit and a fickle word. He would like to interpret it as a likeness, model, or sign of interpretation, just as the stories in the Old Testament are called figures of the New, as Adam is called a figure or model of Christ, as a bride of Christianity is called a model or figure. But figura according to Latin kind does not mean such model; but the little word figura is misused there. For Oecolampad almost gladly accepts the abuse, for it serves him well; but he should prove it and yet cannot. For we say that Tertullianus uses the word figura according to the proper manner of the Latin language, since it means a form or shape, mathematice, which is long, thick, broad, round, white, black, which can be seen, felt, "traded"; as we Germans also say of the Sacrament that Christ's body is under bread's shape, and his blood under wine's shape. This is what we call Gestalt, which Tertullianus calls figura in Latin.

If Oecolampad cannot prove that figura is called a model here, then he is invented a falsifier of Tertullianus and a fraud, and his bodily mark goes to the ground. But when will he prove it? When the cuckoo becomes a nightingale. What is it, nuy, to so excellently insist on the teacher's sayings, and to present them so falsely and fraudulently, and then to boast that it is the truth? That is what I said, with vain dreams and uncertain conceit they mislead the consciences, shutting the mouths of the simple, as if something great were there, and nothing is behind it. False coiners are burned, but forgers of the Scriptures are called holy teachers.

229 Now to understand Tertullian's opinion, it is to be noted that the heretic Marcion teaches how Christ would not have taken natural right body from Mary, as also other more heretics taught, but would have been

The devil has been only a shadow or ghost of a body that can neither be grasped, felt nor held; as the devils sometimes appear in various ways, and yet is nothing and 1) a vain ghost before the eyes.

230 Now Tertullian contests this Marcion, and wants Christ to have had a true natural body, and thus concludes: "What is a vain thing, a shadow or a ghost, cannot take on any form. For a ghost has neither color, nor thickness, nor length, nor width; it is a vain appearance. If it had color, one could grasp it and take the color; if it had thickness or length, one could break it, lift it and carry it, set it and lay it. Item: one can also make no color, thickness, length on it, on it, around it or over it. That is one. Now Marcion confesses that Christ's body (that is, his body's shadow or ghost) is in the bread. Tertullian replies: "How could Christ's body be in the bread, and take the form of bread, if it were not a true body; because it is not possible that form should exist where there is a ghost and not a true body?"

This is the one syllogism or conclusion of Tertullian; this is what he wants, since he says: The bread, which Christ took and divided among his disciples, he made his body, when he said: "This is my body", that is, my body's form. He made the bread into the form of his body, so that Christ's body was under the bread; for form cannot be without body, as he says afterwards. But he had to speak of form, because Christ's body is seen invisibly, not differently than under bread's form; yes, it is no longer bread's form, but it is Christ's body's form (says Tertullian). But it could not have been a form (he continues) where it was not a true body. For that which is vain (as a ghost is) can take no form. Then you hear again that the bread could not be the form of Christ's body unless his body were a true body, because a ghost cannot take form.

232. what such conclusion Tertulliani against

1) Erlanger: "and one".

Marcion, I leave it, it does not concern us now. But we can see that Tertullianus is of the opinion that Christ's real natural body is in the bread of the Lord's Supper, so that the shape of the bread, its thickness, width, length, and color, has become the shape, thickness, length, and color of Christ's body through his word, when he says: "This is my body. I do not add my words here, but I show Tertulliani's own words. And what kind of fencing would it have been against Marcion, if Tertullian wanted to prove from the Lord's Supper that Christ had a real suffering, and did not believe himself that Christ. Body would be in it? But now he says that. The form cannot be without the body, and the bread is the form of his body. So surely Christ's real body must be truly there, since his form is, which from the bread, through the word, has become his form. This is Tertulliani's opinion, I truly know, and his words are dry and clear.

233 The other syllogism or conclusion is: But if this should not be, and Christ should have made the bread a ghost of his suffering (as you, Marcion, would like to say), because he should not have a proper body, then you must say that he gave bread badly for us, for the forgiveness of sins, because he says: "This is my body, which is given for you. If there is nothing but ghost in the bread, and the ghost cannot be given for us, then the bread must be given for us, because there is nothing left to suffice the words, "This is my body, given for you." That is what he says. Or if for this reason he made the bread a ghost of his body, because he did not have a right suffering, he had to give the bread for us. Then we can see that Tertullian wants to have in bread the body that was given for us, so that we do not have to say that bread was given for us. So that he clearly confesses that the words of Christ: "Take, eat, this is my body, given for you," summarize bread and body, that the body is in the bread. But no one would say so who held the bread in the sacrament.

234 From all this it is (I think) clear enough that Tertullian does not understand figuram here in Oecolampad's way for an equivalency.

It is called the form of the body of Christ, because Christ's body is in it and under it, and speaks out dryly: Where Christ's body would not be there, it would remain bread and bread's figure, which would be given for us. Let Oecolampad prove his figure also thus. They are strange saints to me. The holy teachers have the way of interpreting the Scriptures, that they take bright, clear sayings, and thereby make the dark, wavering sayings clear; it is also the way of the Holy Spirit to illuminate the darkness with light. But our enthusiasts do something absurd, they take a dark, shaky word from a text that pleases their conceit, leave out what is written next to it, run after it and want to make a bright, clear text dark and shaky with it, and then say that it is the truth. This is the way of the devil, who is a master of darkness and wants to make the light dark with darkness.

As here in Tertullian, Oecolampad takes the dark word figura, which he himself is not sure what it means, and also does not see it right. This must now be the bright sun; then runs to the bright words: "This is my body", which must badly be the clouds and darkness; just as they are the dark sayings: "Flesh is of no use," "Christ is seated at the right hand of God," also for suns, and thus want to darken the words of the Lord's Supper; not that the Scriptures are dark, but their conceit is blind and lazy, so that he cannot see the clear words rightly; just as a lazy man does not open his eyes to see the right light, and takes the gleam for light.

236) Tertullian has another saying in the book against the Jews, where he deals with the saying Jer. 11, 19. They said: "Let us throw the wood into his bread. 1) Tertullian interprets this as follows: "Without doubt the wood is thrown into his body. For this is how Christ Himself interpreted it, when He calls the bread His body, which body the prophet had previously proclaimed to be bread.

237 I am not fencing here whether Tertullian has Jeremiah's saying properly interpreted. Demi in the Hebrew it says thus: Let us root up the tree with the food, that is, with fruit and with everything; from this we do not act now, but we act what Tertullian understood in this. Now it is certain that by the wood he understands and interprets the cross that Christ bore, and by the bread his body, and calls the bread in the Lord's Supper; for Christ nowhere else calls the bread his body. John 6:35 says that he is bread, but does not say that bread is his body. Whoever then calls the bread in the Lord's Supper the body of Christ crucified, beloved, does he also confess that there is bread in it? Now Tertullian does it here and speaks clearly of the bread, that Jeremiah called it crucified, and threw the wood into it, and that the same bread was his body, making bread and body one thing.

In the same way, in the third book, he writes against Marcion, and he repeats the same saying of Jeremiah: "Let us cast the wood into his bread. Without doubt (says Tertullian) "into his bread", that is, into his body. For this is how God Himself interpreted it in your Gospel (you Marcionites), when He calls the bread His body; so that it may be noted that He made or gave the bread into the form of His body, which body the prophet showed beforehand in the form of bread, which mystery the Lord Himself was to interpret afterwards 2c. Here Tertullian speaks again how the bread is a figure or form of the body of Christ, and Christ gave such a form to his body when he said, "This is my body"; just as we heard in the first sentence above. So that it may be taken that he is speaking here of the bread and the body in the Lord's Supper, and says: mathematice, that is, the prophet gives the body of Christ of the bread form so long before; which afterwards Christ has done more clearly, since he says: "This is my body", et dedit panem sui corporis figuram.

239 These are all Tertullian's words, that Jeremiah, with his prophecy, had previously given the bread to the body of Christ, which Christ then accomplished by giving the bread to his body. All this must be spoken of the natural bread, which has a form, as it is in the Lord's Supper, not of the spiritual bread, of which John 6:35. For this does not give form to Christ's body, but is Christ himself, as he says: "I am the bread from heaven" 2c. Since Tertullian understands that this is natural bread, of which Jeremiah says that the Jews threw the wood into it, and says that it is Christ's body crucified, I think it is powerfully proved that Tertullian confesses in the Lord's Supper, under the form of bread, Christ's true body, to which the wood of the cross was thrown. Let us see what our finetechs and conceiters want to do here in this light.

1) In the Vulgate: Miliamus liMum in pansm "to".

240. And that they may try their thinness and prove their art, I also give them as a gift this saying of Tertulliani, which he writes in the book of the resurrection of the flesh and says: The flesh is washed, that the soul may be cleansed; the flesh is anointed, that the soul may be consecrated to God; the flesh is marked, that the soul may be kept; the flesh is shadowed by the laying on of hands, that the soul may be enlightened in spirit; the flesh is fed with the body and blood of Christ, that the soul may be fattened by God.

241 Now here teach us how our flesh is nourished with the body and blood of Christ. Turn it around once; and as you say in the Lord's Supper that bread signifies the body, and wine the blood of Christ; so again teach us here that the body of Christ signifies bread, and the blood signifies water or wine, by which the body is nourished. But see to it that you also make the interpretation certain that this must be so. For we are not satisfied, either here or elsewhere, if you alone say that it must be so.

242 What kind of spirits and people are these, who play the good old teacher in the world with lies and deception, to seduce and confuse the simple consciences, and then boast that it is the pure truth, blaspheming God and the Holy Spirit. It would be much better that they freshly deny the dear fathers, than that they want to draw them to their mind with such deception and falsification, and deceive the world.

under the fathers' names, whom they wrong before God and the world.

Irenaeus is also one of the oldest teachers, who had to fight against the Valentine heretics, who taught that Christ was not the Son of God, and the resurrection of the flesh was nothing; the body would also not be saved, but only the soul, because St. Paul says: "Flesh and blood do not inherit the kingdom of God", 1 Cor. 15, 50. Against this Irenaeus writes that the body also becomes blessed, and is a resurrection of the flesh, as our faith confesses. And among other things he gives this proof against it: "If the body is not also saved, why is it fed with the body and blood of the Lord in the sacrament? If he eats an eternal food, he will certainly live on it eternally. But let us hear his own words. In the 4th book, chapter 5, he says: "Just as the bread that comes from the earth, when it is called by the name of God, is no longer bad bread, but a sacrament, which stands in two things, an earthly and a heavenly. So also our bodies, when they receive the sacrament, they are already no longer rotten, because they have the hope of resurrection.

244 How do the enthusiasts do here, who boast that Irenaeus stands with them, and want to be sure of the matter? Oecolampad wants to be a knight against the papists and their transubstantiation, and against Valentinum. But I would like to hear and see him who would interpret this saying to mean that there is only bread and wine in the Lord's Supper. There stands Irenaeus, and says: the bread is not bad common bread, after it is called or appointed by God, but Eucharistia (so the ancients call the sacrament); but what may be the calling, since God calls the bread with? It can be nothing else, but the word, when he says: "This is my body", then he calls it and gives it a new name, which it did not have before, because it was bad bread, and says: "The bread stands after such naming or word in two things; the one is earthly (that is bread, which comes from the earth, as Irenaeus says here), the other heavenly; that must be Christ's body, who is in heaven. What other heavenly thing can there be in the sacrament besides the earthly one, which is there by God's naming or word?

Here, Oecolampad makes earthly and heavenly into one thing, namely bread, which is earthly because it comes from the earth, and also heavenly because one gives thanks and praise to God about it. In this way, one should move Irenaeum around and teach it to swarm. If one asks: How can we be sure that this is the opinion of Irenaeus? or who has ever heard that our thanksgiving or word is a heavenly thing? The answer is: I Oecolampad say it; if it is not enough, you have no spirit. In this way, all the bread on all the tables, when the Benedicite is said, is called heavenly, because there is thanksgiving. Shall one now believe this badly, and may no proof, but is the certain truth, if only the enthusiasts say it? Certainly, defiance, who demands further proof. Well then, that is jumped over Irenaeum and answered nothing at all to his words; nor must it mean not only answered, but also the certain truth.

But Irenaeus does not want to suffer it. For we know that bad, common bread remains bad, common bread, even if Christns and all the apostles themselves speak the Benedicite over it, and no heavenly thing comes of it. Just as Christ divided the bread among the people, and gave thanks and praise to God over it, yet bad bread remained there and did not become heavenly.

But Irenaeus says here that according to the word of God there is no longer bad bread, but besides the earthly bread there is also a heavenly thing. And it is an impudent thirst, where someone wanted to interpret the calling of God to mean humanly thanking, blessing or praising. Paul teaches us Rom. 4, 17, what God's calling or calling means, since he says: "God calls or calls that which is not that it is. So here Irenaeus also speaks of God's calling or calling, as also Moses testifies in Genesis 1 that God creates everything by calling or calling (that is, by the word). Or be you master and tell me what vocatio Dei might otherwise mean, quando

Deus vocat, dicit, appellat, nominat; that is his word, since he speaks: "This is my body", just as he speaks Gen. 1,3: "Let there be light", so it is light. Rather, it is God who names or sets up, and what he names, that stands as soon as there, as Ps. 33, 9. says: "He speaks, so it stands."

248 So there are three parts in the sacrament according to Irenaei. The first is vocatio Dei, the word or naming of God, which is, since he says: "This is my body", by the naming or word the bread (he says) becomes Eucharistia, or Sacrament, so that the bread is now two things, since before it was bad bread and one thing. Before it was vain earthly; but now both earthly and heavenly. What the heavenly thing is, let the scribblers show us, if it be not that which is shown in the naming or God's word, when he saith, "It is my body." For that it is our thanksgiving or word, Oecolampad says freely, and yet is as certain of it as he is of this whole article. Therefore it is a vexatious thirst to boast of something so boldly as certain, which one must take for granted that it is uncertain and its own dream.

Item, Irenaeus says that our bodies are already no longer corruptible when they receive the sacrament, but have the hope of resurrection 2c. For we see how the ancient teachers spoke of the sacrament in such a way that it also gives the body an immortal being, but hidden in faith and hope until the last day. Now bad bread cannot preserve the body eternally, nor make it imperishable. For it is perishable food, even though Christ Himself gives thanks for it, as He Himself called bread perishable food, which He divided among the people. Thus, according to Irenaeus, there must be something heavenly in the sacrament, which may live forever and give eternal life. For he speaks of the bodily food, since our bodies (he says) receive the sacrament, through this same bodily food our bodies are already incorruptible in hope. This cannot be because the body of Christ, since he speaks of Joh. 6, 55: "My flesh is meat, and he that eateth my flesh liveth forever.

The enthusiasts should take such pieces before them and answer them with diligence, not fluttering about and drooling over something else, as Oecolampad does; for they should think that such pieces would move us to address them and not let them go like this. For such a thing shows to a haughty heart, which despises all men as blocks; just as if they had to let it suffice them, if a gusher murmurs a little to it, and should then be accepted immediately for certain truth. If we are not as learned and holy as they, we nevertheless also have consciences that move and drive us to search for the truth; so they are guilty, because they certainly boast of the truth, of proving this to us who say that their truth is vain quicksand 1) and uncertain whirl.

251 Item, hard before it Irenaeus speaks thus: How can they say that the flesh must decay and may not come to life, if it is fed with the body and blood of the Lord? Here we see that the body is fed with the body and blood of the Lord, so that it may live forever and not decay, as the heretics say. Irenaeus speaks of bodily food and the food of the body, and yet the same food should be the body and blood of the Lord. It is not enough to say that the body and blood of the Lord are called bread and wine, as a sign of his body and blood. For these do not give the incorruptible life to the body, of which here Irenaeus speaks against the heretics, that they do not allow the incorruptible life to the body, when it eats such food as gives it. Nor is it enough that they interpret it to their liking; they must prove it and make it certain, as they boast that they are certain.

252 In the fifth book, chapter 5, he says: "He confesses that the cup (which is a creature) is his body, through which he strengthens our bodies. And behold, the body of Christ in the cup strengthens our bodies. This is spoken of the bodily food without any doubt, and yet it is the body of Christ, even though the cup is also a creature. Item, soon after: When therefore the mixed cup and the made bread come upon the word of God, it becomes the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, by which our body's nature increases and endures. How then can they say that the body should not be able to receive the gifts of God, which is eternal life, when it is nourished with the body and blood and is its member?

Here we hear that bread and wine are the word of God, which he calls the calling of God above, and interprets itself that the sacrament is not a sign of the absent body of Christ, but is the body of Christ itself, so that not only our body is fed bodily, but also our body nature and being is nourished, strengthened and preserved for eternal life, and thereby becomes a member of the body of Christ 2c.

I long and desire to hear how the enthusiasts not only want to resist these and similar sayings, but also immediately bring them to the contrary mind, and that in such a way that it is tangibly certain that Irenaeus holds with them. For we do not believe their 2) mere uncertain interpretations and word matters, as Oecolampad does; it should be dry, clear proof, stronger than this is ours. If they do this for me, I will praise them of the Holy Spirit's own heart.

254 Let us also hear St. Hilarius, who was also one of the ancient teachers and an excellent man in the Scriptures. He writes against the Arians lib. 8. de Trinitate thus: If the Word truly became flesh, and we also truly take the Word that became flesh to ourselves in the food of the Lord, how can it be believed that he does not naturally remain in us, who 3) took upon himself the nature of our flesh when he became man, never to leave the same 4) and in addition has mixed the nature of his flesh together with his eternal nature under the sacrament of the flesh, of which we are partakers in common?

255 Here Hilarius speaks that we are true-

Hastily take in the food of the Lord (that is, in the Sacrament) the Word that became flesh, or, as we would like to speak more clearly, the incarnate Word, and therefore let Christ remain in us naturally or with his nature and essence, not only spiritually, as the spirits dream. And calls the sacrament sacramentum carnis nobis communicandae, a Sacrament of the flesh, which is shared among us in common, that there not only bread is shared among us, but also flesh. And further says: that Christ under the same sacrament mixes together, not only spiritually, but the nature of his flesh together with his eternal nature. But what does the nature of his flesh mean? Is it bread and wine? Or does it mean his natural essential body? Now let whoever wants to gloss and interpret here, only that they make their gloss certain, and interpret the words Hilarii with good reason differently than they read. For as they stand there, they give us in the sacrament not only Christ naturally in the flesh, but also his eternal divinity.

Soon after this he says: "If we want to speak how Christ is truly and naturally in us, if we do not learn to speak it from him, we will certainly speak it as fools and ungodly men. For thus saith he, My flesh is meat indeed, and my blood drink indeed: he that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, abideth in me, and I in him," John 6:55. f. There can be no doubt that the body and blood are true, because they are both, by the Lord's own confession and our faith, truly flesh and truly blood, which, when taken and drunk, make us in Christ, and Christ in us. St. Hilarius, in the same place, is quite clear that just as Christ, according to the Godhead, is natural in the Father, and one thing essential; so Christ, through the sacrament, if we open and drink, is natural and essential in us, and we in him. For this purpose, the word "natural" is used everywhere, so that it proves a natural union of the body of Christ with us, and not only a spiritual union, which is in the will and sense.

257 Thus Hilarius says: Haec accepta

et hausta efficiunt in nobis, does not say: Haec credita et intellecta spiritualiter etc.. The true body, the true blood is taken and drunk 2c. What does accipi pere et haurire mean? It is easy for the enthusiasts to invent a gloss on it here, and call it mysterium, cibum dominicum, accipere, haurire, whatever they think. Which we could do just as well as they, and do not need their mastery; but no one desires such art from them, but that is what one desires, even if they have interpreted and glossed most artfully, that they also want to prove that such glossing is certain and right, must be so and could not be otherwise. They have not done this to this day in any writing or saying, and they despise doing it. Just as if it were not necessary, nor they guilty to do, and was equal enough, if they only say: God is called a cuckoo. But if they do, they will not make me so many books, I know that well. Let their spirit and art be small and thin enough. Anyone can interpret and gloss according to his own will, and does not need a special spirit to do so.

258 The holy martyr St. Cyprianus. Cyprianus, writing to Pope Cornelio on how Christians in persecution should be strengthened to suffer through the Sacrament, speaks thus: Now, however, peace is needed not only for the sick but also for the healthy, and we must give communication, the sacrament, not only to the dying but also to the living, so that we do not leave those whom we incite and provoke to strife bare and unarmed, but strengthen them with the shield of the blood and body of Christ; For since the sacrament is administered so that those who receive it may have protection from it, whom we want to have safe against the enemy, we must equip them with the Lord's food. For how shall we teach them or provoke them to shed their blood over his name's confession, if we deny them Christ's blood when they should fight? Or how can we make them drink the cup of suffering, if we do not first allow them to drink the cup of the Lord in the church, as is fitting in the sacrament?

259. in this saying we see how with

Cypriano Communicatio, Eucharistia, Pax Be One Thing, and speaks of the presentation of the Sacrament to those who are to contend, for strength, and speaks out arid that they receive the Lord's body and blood in such presentation. It is true that a fanatic can make a blood sign and an insinuation out of the blood, the chalice, the sacrament, that Cyprianus must speak as they wish; but that they also prove this is not necessary, it is enough if the spirit says it.

260] In the sermon against the apostates, he says: "When they return from the altars of the devil, they come to the sanctuary of the Lord with unclean hands, which still stink from the smell of sacrifices, and still 1) smell from the poisonous food of idols, and want to touch the body of the Lord with their mouths, which still stink from their evil deeds, and still smell from the deadly flesh, despising everything that St. Paul says against it. They despise everything that St. Paul says against it in 1 Corinthians 10 and 11, but commit sacrilege and violence against his body and blood, and now sin against the Lord with their hands and mouths more grievously than when they denied him.

261 Then you hear that Cyprian shows how they take Christ's body in the throat and mouth, and act freely with hand and mouth on his body. Now the mouth cannot spiritually eat Christ's body. But a scribbler soon answered that the body and blood of Christ are called bread and wine here, as a sign, and must not prove it; summa, if this applies, that one may change the words and interpret them anew, so freely that he is not even obliged to prove it, then no saying, indeed, no letter in all the world, it serves for the scribblers. But if the words are to be accepted for what they are according to the languages, that bread is called bread, body is called body, 2c., or if other interpretations have to be proved with good reason, then there is neither a saying nor a letter in all the world that helps the enthusiasts, and their fame is vain lies that they have certain truth.

262 For even the saying of Augustine does not stand with them, who has the most appearance of all when he says, Psalm 98: "You will not eat the body that you see, nor will you eat the body that you see, nor will you eat the body that you see, nor will you eat the body that you see.

drink the blood which they that crucify me shall shed: a mystery have I given you, which if ye understand spiritually, it shall make you alive 2c. And Joh. 6: What do you send teeth and belly to? Believe, so you have already [eaten]. For Augustine, because he speaks of teeth and belly, is certainly his opinion against the Capernaïtes and our enthusiasts, who think that Christ's body should be torn and bitten with teeth, and digested with the belly, like a piece of beef. Christians do not teach this, nor do we poor sinners; they know this, but they do not want to know it.

263 So also, when St. Augustine says: one shall not eat the flesh that one sees, 2c., he also says of eating as one eats beef, as he himself declares that he speaks against those who think that Christ would cut his body into pieces and divide it. Yes, if they want to hold on to this saying of Augustine, it will take away Christ's body and flesh completely, even spiritually. For this is how it reads: Not the flesh that you see, not the blood that is shed 2c. Just as if one should eat other blood and flesh than Christ's flesh and blood. Now we eat no other flesh and blood, even spiritual, than the very same that was seen and crucified. So St. Augustine does not have to deny or condemn that one eats Christ's body and blood, as his words read, but the fleshly food, as one eats sausage and bread, tears it with teeth and digests it with the stomach.

The enthusiasts lack everything in that they do not distinguish Christ's body (as St. Paul says 1 Cor. 11, 29.) from other flesh, and do not speak differently of it, except as if it were perishable, digestible, consumable flesh, which one buys in the shops 2) and cooks in the kitchen. So coarse are they that they do not see how this flesh is an imperishable, immortal, imperishable flesh, as the 16th Psalm v. 10. sings of it: "Thou wilt not let thy holy one decay", and "my flesh shall rest in hope" [Apost, 2, 26.]. Death has probably tried it once, and wanted it ver-

1) i.e. spit.

2) See the note to § 195 of this paper.

But he could not, but it tore his belly and neck more than into a hundred thousand pieces, so that death's teeth were crushed and flew apart, and he remains alive. For the food was too strong for death, and it consumed and digested the eater. God is in this flesh; it is the flesh of God, the flesh of the spirit; it is in God, and God in it; therefore it is alive, and gives life to all who eat it, both body and soul.

265 If the fanciers had seen the little piece, they would not have been so mad as to call us carnivores, but would have taken themselves by the nose. For they are real carnivores, because they act with such carnal thoughts in this matter, and believe that Christ is flesh like other flesh, of no use at all and perishable. And all their defiance and glory is that they think that if they twist and turn the Scriptures and the sayings of the fathers to suit their conceit, it is enough, and so the truth is certainly established; but there is still a long way to go.

266 I have also written before against the heavenly prophets, and asked how it is that with them bread and wine in the Lord's Supper is useful, and does not prevent the suffering of Christ from being remembered, and that Christ's body and blood should not also be as useful or good as bread and wine, so that Christ's suffering can still be remembered? Or why this should follow: "Christ's flesh is not useful, therefore it is not there," and should not follow: "Bread and wine are not useful, therefore they are not there. But there you have to rush over and not answer. But this is the summa of it, the fanciers direct all their teachings and writings to this, there they penetrate and work after, that they make our text and faith in this article uncertain and shaky. If they could do that, they would think they had won. But if they could do it right away, and make us uncertain and unstable, they still have not made their faith certain, because they do not prove one letter of the glosses they give.

What kind of spirit is this, then, that wants to make this part uncertain and misleading, and yet cannot make its part certain nor firm;

Yes, he does not want to do it, nor does he take it upon himself to make it certain? Of course, there is no other spirit than the devil, who has the desire to shake hearts everywhere, and does not let them be sure and certain on any part, but rather stirs and floats, after which his wind weaves like aspen leaves. But the Holy Spirit is such a teacher, who is certain, makes certain, and does not let them so weave and float. For in Christ there is not yes and no, but "yes and amen", 2 Cor. 1, 20. And St. Paul teaches and praises in Christ plerophoriam, the complete, certain, secure mind, on which one can die and dare everything [Rom. 4, 21. Col. 2, 2.].

268 But I would advise the revelers to revel as much for full as for half, and, since it should be daring, to come through briefly and do these words, "This is my body, given for you," entirely out of the Lord's Supper. For as they believe and partake of the Lord's Supper, they must not include these words at all, but it is enough for them to partake of the Lord's Supper with these words: Christ took bread, gave thanks, and brake it, and gave it to his disciples, saying, Take, eat: this do in remembrance of me [Matt. 26:26]. For these words are sufficient for a man to eat this bread, and to remember Christ in it. But this is the supper of the scribes altogether: why then should the useless, unnecessary text be written, "This is my body given for you," since it is sufficiently comprehended in the remembrance of the Lord, when it is proclaimed how his body is given for us? For what else is to be remembered but how he was given for us, as St. Paul interprets?

269 O how gladly we would do this, if the words were not in all evangelists 1). O there 2) is good advice to, you must be bold and say, they are put in from the margin into the text, but not written by the evangelists themselves. Because your reason is that what seems to you to be useless and unnecessary is not true, just as Oecolampad cleverly says, "It is not true.

1) Erlanger: Evangelion. Latin: LvavZelistis.

2) Erlanger: the.

There is no use nor need for Christ's body to be in the bread, therefore it is not true. So here also, it is a vain and useless thing to say that the words are in the Lord's Supper, therefore they should not be in it, since without them the Lord's Supper is completely described, instituted, and used, and no need or benefit has yet been shown that they should be in it; but if any were shown, it would be easy to make up something to the contrary. It is in your hearts that these words are left over and of no use, and you would very much like them not to be in there, because they do you the burnt harm.

270 For these are also two of Oecolampad's shameful blasphemies, that he asks why it is useful or necessary for Christ's body to be in the bread. And if we do not indicate it, he wants to conclude: there is nothing to it. What am I to say to the infernal Satan's wicked thirst? Well then, if we cannot declare it, as it would be useful and necessary that Christ's body be in the bread, should God's word therefore be false or to be twisted according to our conceit? A devout, God-fearing heart does this: It first asks whether it is God's word; when it hears this, it muffles this question with hands and feet: for what is it useful or necessary? For it speaks with fear and humility: "My dear God, I am blind, I truly do not know what is useful or necessary for me, nor do I want to know, but I believe and trust you that you know best and mean it according to your divine goodness and wisdom; I am content, and I am glad that I hear your mere word and hear your will.

But those who are possessed with devilish hope turn this around, and want to curb God's word with the question: "for what it is useful and necessary", set themselves free to the judgment seat, demand God's word before the court, and ask the poor culprit why he says and speaks such words? what use and need is it to do and speak such things? If he does not show benefit and need, they crucify him there and then as an evildoer, and then boast with the Jews, as if they had the certain truth, and God had done them a service. Is this not terrible to hear? Thus one runs at, if one wants to act God's word with humans conceit.

Now, dear sirs, who have such teachers, be warned herewith, that you see what kind of preachers you have. They are the devil's larvae, who, under good appearances and fine words, model the devil for you in God's stead. For here they show that they do not understand anything about God's word and faith. St. Paul says Rom. 8, 26: "We do not know what to ask." This was also known to the pagan Socrates, who said: "We should ask God to give us what is good for us, because He knows best. And our enthusiasts want to go even higher, badly about God, and set a goal for him, and know what is useful or necessary for us to believe, or stand there, and want to say to him: You deny.

But if they had some understanding in faith, and had ever felt a little of it, they would know that the highest virtue, nature and honor of faith is that it does not want to know what it is useful or necessary for what it believes. For he does not want to question God, or to ask why, for what purpose, or for what need he has, but rather to be unwise, to give glory to God, and to believe his mere word. Be ashamed, you leaders of the blind, that you should not yet know such things, and spout so many books with such great glory into the world, so that you reveal your own foolishness and ignorance to everyone!

God commanded Abraham to sacrifice his son Isaac, Genesis 22:2, and Abraham was of course deep enough to know what it was necessary or useful for. If he would have quarreled with God (like our enthusiasts) and wanted to know what it would be useful or necessary for, or if he would have wanted to turn his word against Him, what blessing would he have received? Just that Lucifer deserves in heaven.

275. again our mother Eve also had God's word that she should not eat of the one tree, Gen. 2, 17.; then the swarming Abgott came to her with this very question, and said: "Why did God command this?" Cap. 3, 1. ff. As if to say: What is it good for? What is the need? Well, it is nothing

God's word does not mean this, and interprets God's word differently. Then it fell, and drew us all along with it, in all measure, as he is now also raising us up through these gushers, and creeps along on his serpent's belly: Why did Christ put his body into the bread? What is it good for? What is the need? Well, it's nothing, his word doesn't mean that; and so he interprets his poisonous lies and blasphemies for divine understanding, and praises the bright truth. Therefore St. Paul warns us against such a serpent, 2 Cor. 11:3, saying: "I fear that just as the serpent deceived Evam with his deceitfulness, so also your minds may be corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ." Isn't it true? These fanciers lead us away from the simple-minded meaning of these bright simple-minded words, "This is my body," by their deceitfulness.

276 I suppose that it is possible that Christ visibly and bodily cuts up his flesh and gives it to us to eat, as the Capernautes understand and as the enthusiasts dream, but it is not useless, and the saying, "Flesh is not useful. Why is that? Because there is the public article of our faith, that Christ is flesh full of divinity, full of eternal good, life, blessedness, and whoever takes a bite of it takes eternal good, life, all blessedness and everything that is in the flesh. And if he believed it, he would also have life and blessedness from it, but if he did not believe it, it would not help him, but rather harm him with such treasure.

Now it is impossible that the flesh should be cut, divided, torn, corrupted, or decayed, for it is a blessed, divine, incorruptible flesh, as Peter says in Acts 2:27: "It was impossible that death should retain the flesh. 2, 27.: "It was impossible that death should keep the flesh", because the 16th Psalm v. 10. speaks: "You will not let your holy one decay", and Joh. 19, 36. from Moses: "You shall not break a bone in him" [2 Mos. 12, 46.]. Suffering and dying it has once been able, but to dismember, to divide, to break, to chew, to digest, to consume, to decompose is not possible. It must be completely at once to be conceived, born, borne, eaten and believed. And where it is, there it must be of use; for there is good in it, without, where it is without faith; for without faith nothing is of use, as St. Paul says [Titus 1:15], "To the unclean all things are unclean." And Rom. 14:23: "That which is without faith is sin."

278. Therefore, as has been said, this is one of the greatest blasphemies heard in our times, and truly horrible to hear that Zwingel and Oecolampad may say: Christ's flesh is 1) of no use where it is eaten bodily, even to believers; just as if eternal good could not be good, eternal life could not be life for the sake of our custom, and would have to change its essence, nature and kind, according to whether it was eaten by men or not; or as if it were bad an empty flesh, since there was no divinity in it. And from this we may certainly judge that the wicked Satan speaks through it. For the Holy Spirit is not so forgetful that he should so shamefully blaspheme the flesh of Christ, and cry out for a useless flesh, since he himself dwells within, and works vain good and profit thereby, whether it be in bread or heaven, or in the heart. It cannot be useless, that is not possible.

279 Neither does it help them to boast as they otherwise rightly teach and praise Christ in other things. For whosoever earnestly denies, blasphemes, and profanes Christ in one piece or article, cannot in any other place teach or honor him aright; but it is vain hypocrisy and deceit, be it what it may. For this is what it means to lose Christ completely or to keep him completely. He does not split or divide himself; he wants to be loved and honored with all his heart, with all his soul. But the devil prepares the way for other heretics who will come and say that Christ is not, that he has neither flesh nor Godhead, as happened in the beginning of Christianity. If this little piece does not move and convert them, and if it does not help the others to beware of them, to notice and shun their devil, then there is no more counsel, they will be lost; but without my fault, her blood was on her head, I warned her enough.

280 Although no Christian desires to know what good it is to believe that Christ's body is in the bread, but badly believes the words of God with fear and humility, we still want to show some benefits; not to teach the enthusiasts, because they do not respect it, nor do they ask to know it, but the devil mocks us through them. First of all, this is also a benefit, that arrogant clever spirits and reason may be blinded and defiled, so that the arrogant may stumble and fall, and never enjoy the supper of Christ; on the other hand, the humble may stumble and rise, and enjoy the supper alone, as St. Simeon says: "This is set for the fall and resurrection of many in Israel" [Luc. 2, 34.]. For it is expedient and good that the arrogant, ungodly blasphemers should be thus separated, that they should not partake of the holy Sacrament; "for one should not cast the sanctuary to the dogs, nor pearls to swine" [Matt. 7:6]. But now the scribblers believe that there is vain bread and wine, so it is certainly so, as they believe, so they have it, and so eat vain bread and wine, enjoying the Lord's body neither spiritually nor bodily. This is very good and useful, so that our goods are not scattered among the unworthy, but are kept holy and pure among the humble alone.

281 Secondly, we have heard above how Irenaeus and the ancient fathers indicated the benefit of our bodies being fed with the body of Christ, so that our faith and hope might endure that our bodies also might live forever on the same eternal food of Christ's body, which he eats in the flesh; which is a bodily benefit, but nevertheless exceedingly great, and follows from the spiritual. For Christ will also make our bodies eternally alive, blessed, and glorious, which is much greater than that he should give us his body to eat for a little while on earth. Therefore he wants to be in us naturally (says Hilarius) both in soul and body according to the word Joh. 6, 56: "He who eats me abides in me, and I in him." If one eats him spiritually through the word, he remains spiritually in us in the soul. If you eat it in the flesh, it remains in the flesh.

As he is eaten, he abides in us, and we in him. For he is not digested nor changed, but without ceasing changes us, the soul into righteousness, the body into immortality. This is what the fathers said about the bodily meal.

The third benefit, I hope, will be tremendously proven. For they will have to confess to us that we have God's words in the Lord's Supper, namely these: "This is my body, given for you, this is my blood, shed for you for the forgiveness of sins. So I ask them again, is God's word of any use? If it is of no use, why does the prophet Isaiah Cap. 55, 11. say: "God's word does not return empty, but creates benefit"? Why does St. Paul say Rom. 1, 16: "God's power, which makes blessed all who believe in it"? Why is it called "the word of life" [Phil. 2, 16], "the word of grace" [Apost. 14, 3], "the word of blessedness, the word of wisdom" [1 Cor. 1, 24], and so on? Is life, grace, blessedness, wisdom, strength, power vain things? What then wants to be useful?

Why then do my nobles 1) rage and ask what Christ's body is good for in the Lord's Supper, just as if it were bad beef, and put the Word of God out of sight, as if we had a Lord's Supper without the Word of God? Who are the capernaum and carnivores here? We have God's word in the Lord's Supper, they must confess to us. But God's word creates innumerable benefits, yes, it does all things: it brings and strengthens faith, overcomes sin, the devil, death, hell and all evil, it makes us obedient to God, yes, children and heirs, it praises God, delights all angels and saves all creatures. But all this must also be in the Lord's Supper, because God's Word is in it.

Yes, they say: 2) We do not ask whether God's word is useful, but what the body of Christ is useful for itself in the bread? There, there, Luther, take a bite. Here one's heart might well fall away before the high spirit, if he wants to ask in this way. But if I

1) In the old editions: Junghern.

2) So in the Wittenberg and in the Jena. In the old edition of Walch and in the Erlanger: they say.

Again, if I say that I will not let the body of Christ be separated from the word, then they should whistle and whistle at me. 1) Well then, let it be as they dream that Christ's body is in the bread alone, and that there is no word of God with it, which is not possible; but let them see what they gain, and they will escape the rain and fall into the water. For if Christ's body is without the outward Word of God, it cannot be without the inward eternal Word, which is God Himself, John 1:14, for this Word became flesh and is in the flesh.

Now I ask again: whether God himself may also be of some use? Indeed, when he walked on earth, he was so useful that whom he touched through his flesh, he helped. He called Lazaro out of the grave with a bodily voice through His body (Joh. 11, 43.), He touched the leper and made him clean (Matth. 8, 3.), He walked on the sea and reached out His hand to the sinking Petro (Matth. 14, 21.), and He went about in the land and did wonders and good deeds (Matth. 9, 35.). It is also his way and nature to do good where he is. How then could he be useless in bread, since it is the same flesh, the same word, and the same kind, and must be good and useful.

Thus they say: Yes, one does not see and feel the benefit. Well, my dear, is that where the error lies? Of course, it is of no use to the enthusiasts, who would gladly grope and feel, so that they would not have to believe, like the carnivores and Capernaïtes, who would also feel and bite. But we who believe know that the body is useful to us wherever it is. If it is in the bread, and is eaten bodily with faith, it strengthens the soul to believe that it is Christ's body which the mouth eats, and so faith clings to the body which is in the bread. Now this is not useless, but blessed, which lifts up, supports, and fastens faith. In the same way, the mouth, the neck, the body that eats Christ's body, shall also have its benefit, that it may praise forever, and on the last day rise again to eternal blessedness. This is the secret power and benefit that comes from the body of Christ.

1) "Pfisten" in Latin: sannis ras xploäant.

in the Lord's Supper enters into our body; for it must be useful, and cannot be in vain; therefore it must give life and blessedness to our body, according to its nature.

I would have said this if it were possible for Christ's body to be in the Lord's Supper alone and without God's word. But this is not the case, for there are God's words: "This is my body," which grasp, comprehend and give us the body of Christ bodily, therefore the body of Christ must be useful through the word. Yes, even if it were true that Christ's flesh was like beef, and yet God's word was with it, and if it 2) were to be eaten by us, it would still be useful for the word's sake. When Abraham was promised his son Isaac [Gen. 15:6] (who was bad flesh and a child in the flesh), Abraham was justly praised by God, because he believed that he would have the son Isaac, Rom. 4:22. Here, the enthusiasts would also ask how Isaac would be of use to Abraham's faith, and then say that Isaac would never have been nothing, the spirit must be there, flesh would not be of use.

And what is the wonder that Isaac or beef is useful, if it is put into God's word and presented? After all, the devil, death, sin, hell and all misfortune will be of use and help if it is put into God's word and presented to us and believed by us. Can death be useful to me for body and soul, if I have Christ's word for it, which says: "Whoever loses his life for my sake will find it" [Matth. 16, 25.], and must therefore death, through the word, drive and strengthen my soul to righteousness and obedience of faith, and chase my body through to life: should not Christ's body, which is in itself vain life, blessedness and full of God, also be as useful to me through the word as death, sin and the devil? Yes, one does not feel and see it. Neither do we feel and see how the devil and death are useful through the word. But faith feels it. Come now, my dear, and persuade us that because death without the word is not useful but harmful, it must of course be nothing, because that is your reason, that nothing is good.

2) "it" is missing in the Erlanger.

that which is of no use, so that Christ's body must also be of no use to you.

The great arrogant prudence, by which they despise God's word so shamefully, as Oecolampad does in his blasphemous antisyngram, leads them to not see the word of God in the Lord's Supper, and only look and gape at the bodily food, thinking that the divine word should present vain spiritual things and not act outwardly bodily things. This is still the seed of M nzer's and Carlstadt's spirit, who also did not want to suffer anything outwardly until they were completely drowned in the flesh.

But God turns this around and does not give us a word or a commandment, since he does not bind a bodily external thing and reproach it to us. He gave the word to Abraham when his son Isaac was bound. To Saul he gave the word, when the Amalekites were gathered to kill. To Noah he gave the word when the rainbow was bound. So from now on you will not find a word of God in the whole scripture, where a bodily external thing is not bound and presented. If we were to follow the enthusiasts, we would have to say that all such bodily external things were of no use and vain. So here also in the Lord's Supper we are given the word, when Christ's body (crucified for us) is taken in, that it is to be eaten bodily, and that such eating is to avail for the forgiveness of sins, as the words read. Just as Isaac had to come bodily and become Abraham's son, as the words read, and the rainbow had to stand bodily, also as the words read.

They themselves, the scribblers, must admit that even in their spiritual food a bodily thing is presented. For Christ's body, though it be at the right hand of God, is nevertheless a body, and an outward bodily thing, having bone and flesh, which hath no spirit, as he himself saith Luc. 24:39: "Spirit hath neither flesh nor bone, as ye see that I have." If then they want to be almost munificent and not suffer flesh and bone, they must not eat Christ spiritually, for they eat flesh and bone. Now what is the difference? Yes, what is better that they eat flesh and bone with their soul, than that they eat it with their mouth?

isset? If it is of no use in the mouth, how can it be of use in the soul, because it is the same flesh and bone everywhere? But they want to have a vain spirit, which they also have, that is, the devil, who has neither flesh nor bone.

I have written this little piece, that external things are of no use, diligently against D. Carlstadt, how it should be distinguished, thus: External things without God's word are of no use, as the Pope's laws are; but external things, taken with God's word, are salvation and blessedness, because they are in the word and fasten faith; as I have now said of Isaac and the rainbow, which are both external bodily things. But because they are written in the Word, Abraham had to attach his faith to the future Isaac, who was written in God's Word. But the devil with his enthusiasts is so hostile to the word that he always wants to separate it from the outward things, but God wants them undivided and puts them together. What one then says: Here is not a vain outward thing, but put into words: "This is my body," 2c., they do not hear, they rage past as the foolish, and cry out: External things are of no use, external things are of no use. They will not let go of such a minting spirit until they also cause misfortune like the minting man. Because they have the same spirit, it is to be feared that they will bear the same fruit. As the tree is, so it bears fruit.

For from such a spirit it must follow that worldly authority is of no use as an external thing, because one does not want to hear nor see that it is written in God's word, and to believe that it is God's order, Rom. 13:1, which faith is not useless before God, and this fanatic spirit must remain rebellious and murderous. Now behold, worldly order is an outward thing; nor does it bind faith, and is also an article of faith, for the sake of the word into which it is put, Romans 13: "All orders that are in every place are of God. But it does not help with the nonsensical until they bash their heads.

But I would like to know where they got that there is a God, that the Son of God is a man, that one must believe, and all the other articles of our faith, which have never fallen into no understanding, whether they have known them by the Spirit before they have heard or read of them bodily and outwardly? Here they must say no, that I know for certain; for they have it by the bodily outward word and writing. How then shall such an outward word be of no use, by which the Holy Ghost is given with all his gifts? Ah, it is blind hope, that they have shut up Christ at the right hand of God in a chamber, and do not believe that he is present in his word and outward things, since his word speaks of them; therefore they themselves do not know (as St. Paul says) what they speak of, or what they put, wanting to be masters of the Scriptures, and have become useless washers, 1 Tim. 1:6. Another time we will speak of it more fully.

295 They go on to say: But what need is there that Christ's body should be in the sacrament? Faith can be strengthened without it by the Gospel, which is otherwise preached. That is right, but let us bring God to trial once more and hold before Him what is His need, or what we need, that He should hold before us such His word and work. Does he now want to make fools of us, as if we ourselves did not know as well as he what is necessary for us and for him? does he think, even if he is a god, that he alone is therefore wise, and wants to master us, the clergy? 1) If he has flesh and blood, then we have the spirit, and his flesh is of no use; but our spirit is alive, and we want to sing to him something else, so that he may think and say such words to us, and present such works to us, which we recognize to be necessary to us; if not, then we have decided that he should be a Capernait, Atreus, 2) Thyestes and carnivore, and we want to see how he will fight against us.

How do you think about this spirit? is he not humble and reasonable, moderate and sedentary? I mean, yes, he lets his evil words and blasphemies to Basel and punish Luther finely for his scolding and biting. But who are the worst scolders and reproachers? Are they the ones who both reproach God and the people? Or are they the only ones who reproach 3) the seducing spirits? That is, to have the beam in one's eye and to master the mote in another's eye.

This is Oecolampad's other blasphemy. For he who asks why it is necessary what God speaks and does, wants to be smarter and better than God. This is the right coining spirit, which also said that he would put both in Christ and in the Scriptures, if they did not want to conform to his spirit. Immediately after the Zwingel, when it was held up to him that we eat Christ's body in the Lord's Supper invisibly in an unspeakable way, he goes on and cries out about Christ, saying: "O how is Christ such a fine light of the world? How finely he enlightens us, if we are not to know how his body is eaten in the bread! He would not be far off if, like the coiner, he were to enter into Christ.

One's heart might burst at such impudent talk of the infernal devil and his enthusiasts. They want to know how Christ's body is in the bread, or should it be false that he is in it, and cannot yet know how it is that they open their mouths, move their tongues, take the pen in their hands, and much less, I will be silent, that they should know how they see, hear, speak, and live bodily. We feel all these things, and are daily in them, and yet know not how it is; and want to know how Christ's body is in the bread, or let Christ be neither light nor master.

299 But we want to show, although we are not obligated to do so, also for the sake of abundance, why it is necessary that Christ's body be in the bread. And recently the first need is for God's sake. For if it were not so, Christ would be a liar in his words, since he would be

1) Walch and the Erlangeners: "und wolle uns die Geistlichen meistern?"

2) Atreus put the flesh of his son before Thyestes in revenge for committing adultery with his wife.

3) In the old Walch edition and in the Erlanger wrongly interpungirt: "Or are's die allein, die verführischen" 2c.

says: "Take, effet, this is my body, given for you". Then you beautiful devil have the trouble: "God is true, what He says, He does, and can do" [Ps. 33, 4]. Because he says here: "This is my body", and points (with the little word "this") to the bread, as the scribblers confess, then his body must of necessity be there. And there is also power in this need, that God may receive His glory, since He boasts that He is true and faithful. In addition, we want to believe that this adversity is not hard on the spiritual God of the devotees: for he might well suffer our fleshly and baked God to be a liar, as he [the devil] has been from the beginning, and not keep or fulfill his words as he does.

The other need is for our faith; for faith in God's word is necessary for us, because it is said that we should believe it, and God demands and wants faith where His word is. Now there are God's words, which in themselves comprehend and grasp the body of Christ, that it is there. Therefore, just as the word and faith are necessary, so also the body, composed in the word, is necessary to us, so that our faith may be right and rhyme with the word, because the two, word and body, cannot be separated; and even if it were separated and without word, it would still be necessary, because life and salvation are in it.

(301) Yes, this may well be done apart from the sacrament. It is true that it may well be done apart from the body of Christ, which is at the right hand of God; should Christ not therefore be at the right hand of God? Item, it might happen without the gospel, for who would want to oppose God, if he had wanted to redeem us by deed, and had neither preached anything about it, nor become man? Just as he created the heavens and the earth, and still makes everything without outward preaching, and does not become man because of it: should the gospel therefore be nothing? But now that he will give it to thee by mankind, by the word, by the bread of the Lord's Supper, who art thou, a trusting and ungrateful devil, to ask why he doth it not otherwise and without manner? Will you set and choose for him ways and measures? You should be glad of joy

He will jump and do it in whatever way he wants, only that you get it.

302 Do you not think, I would well ask, that because one can have the gospel and the memory of Christ in all sermons, what need is there that one must keep a communion and drink bread and wine with it? What need is there for anyone to read the Scriptures with him? What need is there for one to exhort and comfort another in particular, since all this can be done in public, common preaching? Are these not childish, blind thoughts in such great matters? God wants to fill the world and give Himself in many ways to help and strengthen us with His word and works; so we want to be so fed up and weary that we refuse Him, and suffer badly only in the way that pleases us. You are a black, desperate devil. That is enough of that now.

When the enthusiasts think they have won their cause, they go and make the Lord's Supper a symbol, that is, a sign, so that Christians can be recognized outwardly, as beggars and Jews are known by their yellow 1) rings, and should badly be a sign of Christians among themselves, not against God, so that they practice and maintain love among themselves. This must also follow from this spirit. For since they snatch God's word from the bread and wine, and leave nothing but eating and drinking, as in the tabernacles, nothing must of course be served by this for God, nor must our faith be helped, but rather it must become a mere belly service and a grudge. For what does God ask of our eating and drinking, as He says in Jeremiah [Cap. 7:21]? And what does it help our faith that the belly eats and drinks? So it was said in ancient times of church consecrations that they were held so that friends might know and love one another. So Christ's supper has also become a church consecration here.

But if it be asked, wherewith do they prove this? the answer is, Oh, is it not enough that we say it? And indeed, whoever finds the words of God difficult to believe in this article, which is discharged by such gossip of a great unwillingness. But if we receive that his words are true, and Christ's body and blood are in it, they should let us keep the Lord's Supper a little more than a church consecration. But if they tear out his word, and make vain bread and wine of it, then I let it happen that they make a church consecration or carnival out of it, it counts the same; if they lust for it, then they may also make a dance or play out of it, we ask nothing of it; only that we do not come into their blasphemous and hostile meal.

But we know that it is the Lord's supper and is called, not the Christians' supper. For the Lord not only instituted it, but also makes it and keeps it himself, and is the cook, waiter, 1) food and drink himself, as we have proved our faith above. Neither saith Christ, when he commandeth and appointeth, Do these things for your sakes, to know and to love one another; but thus, "Do these things in remembrance of me." If we are to do it in his memory, it is appointed for his service, for his honor. But with what do we serve him? With eating and drinking? I think that by strengthening our faith and getting to know him, as we have often taught, there should be no doubt when we receive that his body and blood are there, just as the holy fathers tell us about such fruits of the Lord's Supper.

306. I also hear it said that this error also pleases some of the papacy, and some now hope to preserve the mass first of all, that it is a sacrifice, especially because some of the fathers call the sacrament a sacrifice, as Irenaeus, Cyprianus, Augustine, and because they well feel that it is unchristian to sacrifice Christ daily, who sacrificed himself only once, and can no longer be sacrificed, they now fall on bread and wine, and since in the sacrament there should be only bread and wine, it seems to them to be without danger that they keep the mass for a sacrifice, and may now earn the interest more easily, because they should sacrifice bread and wine badly.

If this were true, it would hardly be right for him, so that God's judgment would remain true, since St. Paul [2 Thess. 2, 11] says: "God sends them strong errors, so that they must believe the lie, because they did not want the love of the truth, so that they would be saved. And Christ John 5:43: "I come in my Father's name, and ye receive me not: another shall come in his name, and him will ye receive." So these gentlemen also, persecuting and hating the gospel without end, shall accept for it ravings and lies.

308 But how if the mass were to perish in the first place, so that you think you are preserving it, and thus lose both the gospel and the mass through this assumed fervour, so that you keep neither faith for the soul nor interest for the belly? For if the common man should find out that you are offering bad bread and wine in the mass for their sin, they would soon throw off their hands and withdraw both sacrifice and interest. For who would be so foolish as to give a piece of bread and a drink of wine for his soul, especially in the New Testament, "since we are redeemed by the precious blood of Christ, not by gold or silver," not by bread or wine [1 Pet. 1:18, 19]? For even the hopeful are, that by such a doctrine they would cast down the church, with the pope and with all, and establish a great unity and equality among all Christians.

309. Now let him who wills, and as he wills, let it be bread or Christ's body, he will have to answer: It is certain that Christ cannot be sacrificed more than and more than the one time when he sacrificed himself. For such a daily sacrifice and to sell such a sacrifice for our sin, as it has been instituted and held until now, the papists themselves see (praise God) that it is the greatest blasphemy of God and abomination that has ever been on earth, and none of the ancient teachers ever held, taught or wrote such a thing. For Irenaeus calls it a sacrifice, that one offers bread and wine, since the sacrament is made by God's word, solely for thanksgiving, that one thereby confesses how God has made us as was done in the Old Testament, but not at all for our sin, or to redeem our souls, or to propitiate God, as the papists keep the Mass. Some call it a sacrifice, for the sake of remembering the one sacrifice that Christ once made for us; just as every year Easter Day is called Resurrectio or Resurrectionis diem, the resurrection, and says: Today Christ is risen; not that Christ rises every year, but that every year the day of his resurrection is remembered. In this way St. Augustine calls the Sacrament a sacrifice. But if anyone does not want to believe, let him always go on sacrificing and blaspheming until he stops; the truth has sufficiently come to light in this piece.

I hereby ask and admonish my enthusiasts to do as much honor to the truth as they can, so that we may soon come to the point and the end, and avoid unnecessary pieces, answer us to the right main pieces of the matter, remain on them and be constant. So that I may state it again: It is not necessary for this matter that they teach us how Christ sits at the right hand of God, has left the world, has ascended to heaven, and our hearts are to hang there, not to give to earthly things, and the like; for we know all these things well by the grace of God; but this is necessary that they make certain and prove how the two parts are opposed to each other: Christ's body sits at the right hand of God, and at the same time is in the Lord's Supper.

How it is that God's power has become so weak that it is not able to do this, and that all this can be overcome with good reason and clear Scripture; now here we are to teach 1) where the need lies, so that we may be sure that the words: "This is my body" are dark and obscure, and are to be understood differently than they read. Do you hear, dear sirs, what I ask? where I lie? where I call? Dearly beloved, pass not by, and despise me not so haughtily, and sing me not another thing for it.

312 Likewise, you must not teach us how flesh is of no use, and how

We already know how without the spirit nothing is of use; we would like to know more, namely, how the saying, "Flesh is of no use," is contrary to the saying, "Christ's body is in the bread. Item, that we may be sure that of Christ's body it is said, "Flesh is of no use." Item, that Christ's body is perishable, useless, corruptible food, when he himself says John 6:51 that it is imperishable food that gives life, and just as in the Lord's Supper it is perishable, useless meat, yet by nature and kind it is eternal food. Here, here, we call, here hear us. So also, as the saying must be understood of the Sacrament: "When they shall tell you, behold, here is Christ, behold, there he is." Such, and what more you consider to be your own conceited reasons, make us certain and clear. For all that ye have wrought hitherto is lost, and nothing is accomplished thereby, because ye have said many things, but have undertaken to prove nothing.

313 The disciples boast that they wanted to press and press the meaning of the words "This is my body": "This is the sign of my body. But someone was standing there watching him press the grapes, and he noticed that someone had put some pebbles into the winepress, but they were painted with grape colors; so the poor man pressed the grapes over the pebbles with great difficulty, but nothing would come out, until the winepress fell on his head, stones and all, and crushed him. Admittedly, Christ's words cannot be much pressed nor pressed; they are pebbles, yea, vain rocks, which the wicked cannot handle without harm, as he saith Matt. 21:44: "Whosoever shall fall on this rock shall be bruised; but on him whom he shall fall, he shall bruise."

314 So also, if you want to keep the fathers on your mind, as you boast, and not deny them freshly, do not leave it there that you gloss over them badly for your liking, but press and press their words well, if they wanted to give it. Do not teach us how the sayings of the fathers may be directed or bent this way or that, but whether it is certain that they should and must be directed this way. For ye have heard that we

1) Erlanger: us. "us" is not expressed in Latin.

Such know your art well, and do not even desire your mastery in the pieces that we already know. Yes, we confess and praise you as the very finest teachers; you teach that which can be well understood and needs no faith. For he who cannot understand that bread is bread, wine is wine, must of course be mad. But there you are lacking, that you should prove that bread is vain.

St. Paul is not such a fine teacher, for he teaches what no one can understand, but his proof is so strong that he forces one to believe it. This you do not do, but meanwhile speak of other things. 1) But if you must point out your art, and think that it helps the cause, do so, and let most of your talk be about the main thing. I mean that herewith I sufficiently admonish what you should do; but what does it matter whether it will help? For I know the fleeting, shy and slippery devil almost well.

But that you praise your holy life and suffering, and judge me that the Spirit of God has abandoned me, we gladly let happen; indeed, we poor sinners wish that you would be much higher than your fame is, because we are sure that it is not only harmless but also beneficial for us where pious, holy people are on earth. Of course, we do not want to reward them, but enjoy them well, and we can truly enjoy them. But if you want to boast more about your life, I ask you to prove it by deed, and to punish and correct yourselves for the sake of their evil, † 2) and not allow them to

1) Thus the Jenaers. Wittenberg and Erlangen: "but of other things dieweil redet."

2) Here, to please the sacramentarians, in the first Wittenberg edition of 1548, a longer section (from this cross to the next following cross) is knowingly omitted, as one assumes, at Melancthon's instigation. Amsdorf wrote a whole book about this, and Röer, in the table of contents to the third volume of the Jena edition under the year 1527, talks about it extensively. See the appendix to this writing. The title of the book published by Amsdorf in 1549 is- Daß die zu Wittenberg im anderen Theil der Bücher D. Martini im Buch 'dass die Worte, das ist mein Leib 2c. noch fest stehen' mehr als ein Blatt und vier ganze Paragraphos [Absätze] vorsätzlich ausgelassen haben." The same paragraph is also missing in our Latin Wittenberg edition of 1558, Dorn. VII, toi. 417.

Do so much harm and injustice to others that your fame may not be taken for lies, and your holy life not for hypocrisy.

317. Martinus Bucerus is among you one of the most distinguished, and a Christian dear brother and fellow servant of Christ among you, who also sanctifies you already in life, the same one has verlateinet our pastor, He Johann Pommers, Psalter (as he then has great grace to speak of God and to interpret) and has thus corrupted the fine book with the poison of your doctrine of the holy sacrament, that it is difficult to find counsel, because the same book comes among so many people, and under John's name and work is sold among them, the very error, since he constantly refutes it with his hand and mouth. You holy people let such a little piece go as if you were pleased with it, and do not hold it up for retraction and restitution, since you know well what is in it for John and how highly he is offended by such a knavery.

318 Similarly, my very best book, which I have ever made, the postillions, which the papists also like, he has also prepared with prefaces, subliminaries and objections, so that under my name this blasphemous, shameful doctrine is brought and carried further than perhaps through all your books. What shall I do? How can I advise the matter now? I must feel as if a dog had bitten me. I have punished it with prefaces, but what is the use? The devil saw well that this book penetrated everywhere; therefore he seized the same, loaded and smeared his dirt on it. And so I, an innocent man, must be the devil's muckraker, whether I want to be or not. As yet we suffer nothing, but walk on roses, and are scoundrels and biters; but they are vain sanctuary: and yet do such poisonous wiles and murderous stings besides, which cannot be healed. And indeed, if I were a Christian, I would be of a mind that someone would rather cut off my neck, because such treachery proves that I must present the poison of the soul with my book, ignorantly and unwillingly.

319. so gach 3) is the people and their

3) "gach" ---- abrupt, hurried.

Devils with their insanity, that they spread the same also by foreign books, just as if the books were too few, so that they wanted to deceive the world now. 1) What should happen after my death? That is what they do to me during my life, and let me sit here in Wittenberg and watch. Martinus Bucerus should not have taught me his dream and poem of brabeo et eadem esca. It is not such a big thing, I would have liked to have seen it, where I would have enjoyed it. In addition, if he had found fault with my interpretation, he would have known how to find me with writings or his own little books, and would have had no need to desecrate my dearest book behind my back and to drive his poison into the hearts with it. Such little pieces all pass among you as holy, moral, Christian works. In spite of us impatient ones, that we rebel against it.

The same Bucerus does not let him be satisfied with this. M. Philippus Melancthon must also serve, from whom he freely writes: Philippus may now believe what he wants, but he certainly also taught that there is only bread in the Lord's Supper. Behold, dear, behold, how the holy people press upon us, and want to have us blind, spiritless carnivores by force into their faith, as if their God could not come to his glory without us Wittenbergers, and preserve their faith. I do not want to delete the little trick now, as it would be well worth it, so that they do not take cause from our impatience to forget the main things and to praise their holiness. We only ask that they first do such things out of their own means and not suffer among themselves before they burn themselves so brightly and wipe their mouths; for it behooves holy people badly to prove such arch-rogues and devilish tricks to their neighbor.

321 Paul says, Rom. 2, that not the perpetrators alone, but also those who consent, are guilty of death. If it were our lives alone, we poor, unholy, impatient sinners would gladly keep silent, and suffer such from the great, sedentary saints; but it concerns our doctrine, which is not the same to other people.

They come before us and insult, poison and mistype it, so that it does more harm through us than through its own books. 2) We must protest against this a little. Against this we must protest a little. Whether one notices what her famous holiness is, I cannot be responsible for; it is Christ's fault who says: "by the fruits one should know the trees".

322 Their mob also carries me with such a judgment that because I have written against the peasants, the spirit has departed from me, that I may not understand the bright truth 2c. I let go of the fact that such and other things are said of me. I do not boast of a high spirit, but of the great gifts and graces of my God and Spirit I boast (I hope) quite justly and not without cause. Nor do I think it a great thing to understand how vain bread and wine may be on a table, which even a child and a fool understands well, I also see it every day before me on my table; but you dear councilors of Basel, Strasbourg, and all those, if you have such sacramental caves with you, may well let such their speech warn you that you do not put your eyes into the bag, but take good care of the game. The coiner is dead, but his spirit is not yet extinguished. † 3)

For what is to be thought of the spirit that still rebelliously comforts and excuses the peasants, 4) and condemns me for writing against it, is easy to notice. The devil is not asleep, but is still spouting. That is why I said above that this spirit is not good, nor does it mean well through these enthusiasts; although I respect that the preachers, against whom I write, still have nothing evil in mind. But, dear God, they have no power of their own; the spirit has blinded and captivated them, therefore they are not to be trusted. For whichever spirit dissolves Christ flesh is not of God, says St. John [1 Ep. 4, 2. 3.], and says to this,

2) dump - poison.

3) Up to this point is omitted in the Wittenberg edition of 1548. In the edition of 1551, vol. II, p. 164 f., this piece is inserted again.

4) The words: "and excused" are missing in the Erlanger.

1) In the old editions: wöllen.

it should be the test. Now this spirit dissolves Christ's flesh, because it makes a useless, perishable and all mean flesh out of it, like beef and veal, as we have heard, therefore it cannot be righteous. I warn, I advise, beware, beware, Satan has come among the children of God.

I will leave it here until they return, for the saying, "This is my body," still stands firm against all their fanaticism. This is what I (praise God) have raised with this writing for this time, God grant that they may convert to the truth. If not, that they should write vain cords, that they might see themselves and come into my hands, amen.

Writing Georg Rorarii au the Christian reader, in which he indicates that some of Wittenberg with Untruthfulness to him that he omitted a necessary piece 2c. Folio 423b.

Ps. 35:11, 12: "There are false witnesses who accuse me of not being guilty. They do me evil for good, to bring me into heartache.

Phil. 4, 5. 6.: The Lord is near; do not worry, but cast all your care on Him, for He cares for you.

What is understood between the two little crosses above, is all omitted (few lines excepted) in the other Tomo of the Streitschriften D. M. In addition to this, I have had several other pieces, especially two that do not appear in the first printing, added at the same time for further proof and indication.

The first with this title: A writing of D. M. L. de transsubstantia- tione, fol 265 a. The other: Etliche Sprüche Herrn Niclas von Amsdorf, wider die Wiedertäufer zu Münster; item, Wider die Sacramentirer, toi. 396 d, 398 b.

out of and in order to persuade the people, pious hearts, as if I should have omitted the above-mentioned noticeably necessary part (which the dear Lord and Father D. M[artin] would have been very interested in) for my person, out of my own nobility and thirst, intentionally, to please the devotees of the sacraments. I should not and cannot remain silent about this; for this accusation concerns not only my good reputation among the people, but primarily the confession of faith of pure divine doctrine of this high article of the Lord's Supper of our Lord Jesus Christ; for the wicked Satan wants to make me an enemy of the Sacrament against my thanks, knowledge and will.

Here I say: No, no, because I can stir up a vein; for I have never, that God, the denouncer of all hearts, knows, taken in mind or thought to practice such a blasphemous knavery against this article of our holy faith, to please the Sacramentans, yes, I have always been hostile to this blasphemous mob and raving with right earnestness.

Say further that those who accuse me in this way, crying out from time to time as a devil's liar, thereby profaning and desecrating my Christian name, which Christ, my dear Lord, has purchased and earned for me, do so with untruth against God, who earnestly commands, "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor."

Dear God, how can men be so bold as to speak so publicly against their own conscience, without any need or just cause, in such a high matter, which is not a physical honor, good 2c.,

It is written about the play Col. 888-891. We give it after the above-mentioned first printing of the Jena edition.

For this reason, however, I do not want to tell these people who and where they are. In case of need, however, I will tell in God's name what I know, and also indicate how I have behaved and acted in this matter.

This is enough now in the hurry to answer this piece, so omitted 2c. What concerns the preface of Mr. Niclas von Amsdorf, 1) and the five causes of the same, is none of my business; for I have indeed done nothing about it 2c.

1) Praise and thanks be to God through Jesus Christ, our Lord, forever, that my book, which I have sent out this year against the enthusiasts and enemies of the holy sacrament, has brought forth no small fruit. First of all, many pious hearts, which had been confused and troubled by the useless words of the enthusiasts, have been 2) satisfied and thank God with great joy, as they happily confess with writings to me. On the other hand, that I have just met Satan and have not missed him, so that he has now at first become nonsensical and furious about me; as this also probably indicates the spirit's next answer against such a booklet of mine, which has long since gone out, and at last on this St. Martin's Day [Nov. 11, 1527] will also come to me once in Wittenberg, because perhaps it has so far been afraid of dying.

2) In the old edition of Walch and in the Erlanger: "they are". Does the Erlanger have the "they" from the original or from Walch?

2. help god, how angry are the heroes, that they not only forget their moderation, which they are used to praise highly against me, and would also like to maintain, when no adder is so poisonous as they are in these writings, but also do not see what or to what they should answer because of great anger and wrath. And of Zwingel's spirit in particular, which mixes in a lot of images, purgatory, saints, honor, keys, original sin, and knows not what more of his new great teachings, only that he may spout a lot where there is no need, and skip where answering would be necessary, as I will indicate.

For this reason I have had enough of her, and will write to her no more, lest Satan become even more foolish, and spew forth more lies and foolish works (as he has now done), defiling the paper uselessly, and thus hindering the reader's time to read better things; for if I have not been able to bring forth a correct answer with the book, in which I have so often recorded, even in large letters, what I desire an answer to, then I have no hope, even if I wrote a thousand books,

*This writing, which is usually called "Luther's great confession of the Lord's Supper" in distinction from the "Short Confession" (1844) reported in No. 47 of this volume, was published in March 1528 by Michel Lotther in Wittenberg, then reprinted there in the same year (without indication of the printer) and in 1534 by Hans Weiß in Wittenberg. In the collections: in the Wittenberg (1551), vol. II, p. 165b; in the Jena <1556), vol. III, p. 476 b; in the Altenburg, vol. III, p. 812; in the Leipzig, vol. XIX, p. 440 and in the Erlanger, vol. 30, p. 151. We give the text according to the latter, since it printed the same after the first original edition, comparing the Wittenberg and the Jena editions.

that I would get an answer. And Satan is not to be blamed either, for the liar is not joking with the truth. May the merciful God convert them and deliver their minds from the snares of the wretched Satan, for that is all I can do. I am worried, unfortunately, that I must be a true prophet, since I have written that no heretic will be converted. So I will let them go according to the teaching of St. Paul, Titus 3:10: "You shall avoid a heretic when he has been admonished once or twice. For they will do no better henceforth: it is out of their power, and I will turn to ours, instructing them further, as much as I can, by Christ's grace, in this article.

4. And although I have done enough by the two little books, one against the celestial prophets, the other against the enthusiasts, for all understanding Christians, so that whoever does not want to err, can well be appalled by it against the seducers, and so far are still unbitten by the enthusiasts' spirit, however nearly they cry out, I still want to let this little book go out for the last in this matter, for the strength of the weak and to explain the article the better; For I see, indeed I must see, that because Satan answers so foolishly and spouts vain useless words, he has in mind to hinder me thereby in other matters, since he is much more interested. Therefore it is no longer fitting for me to deal with his foolish work and to leave the holy scriptures lying around. He feeds from now on as much as he wants.

But I want to take three pieces before me in this booklet. Firstly, to warn our people with an indication of how this spirit of enthusiasm has not responded to my reasons.

On the other hand, the sayings deal with teaching about the Holy Sacrament.

Third, confess all articles of my faith against this and all other new heresies, lest they should boast at some time or other, or after my death, that Luther had kept it with them, as they have already done in some pieces.

First of all, let every devout Christian be warned against the enemies of the sacraments, from the

The reason that this sect has so many factions and heads in the beginning, and are even divided among themselves because of this text: "This is my body, given for you", is that such disunity and disputes cannot and may not be of the Holy Spirit. It is certainly the troublesome Satan, as I have also indicated in the next booklet. For the text must be uniform and simple, and must have a certain understanding, if it is to be clear and based on a certain article. But because they have so many different understandings and texts here, since each is contrary to the other's understanding, and no one is certain of his understanding, no one has ever been able to prove his understanding and to put it aside for others: so it follows that they are all wrong, and none of them has the text in this place until this day, and so they must all keep the Lord's Supper without a text. For an uncertain text is just as no text. Now what kind of supper is this, since there is no text or certain word of Scripture? For Christ's words must be certain and clear, otherwise they are not to be had; but we have certain text and understanding and simple words, as they stand, and we do not disagree about them.

7 "Whom" then they answer that it is no harm that they have many words or understandings, because they are of one main thing, that is, that there is bread and wine of the same kind, and they make such like statements: As in the Gospel Christ shows the sum of the Gospel in many ways, as, John 4:14, 1) by drinking water; item, John 6:51, by eating his flesh and drinking his blood; item, by the father of the house who feeds the laborers in his vineyard, Matt. 20:1 ff. By eating His flesh and drinking His blood; item, by the householder feeding the laborers in his vineyard, Matth. 20,1. ff.; and so on by many and various similitudes the one kingdom of God is shown in the Gospel; therefore it is not unreasonable that also the spirit of enthusiasm has various understanding and word about various things.

What do you think? Doesn't it rhyme well? Who does not see here that the wretched spirit either does not want to answer because of great arrogance, as if he mocks our question, or is completely blind as a bat that he does not see what is asked or what he should answer? Who has asked this of him? Who has asked him to teach us how one thing may be presented by various interpretations, speeches, likenesses, and forms? We know all this better beforehand than he can always teach us. I know well that Christ, the only Savior, has not only various interpretations, but all the interpretations of Scripture. He is called a lamb, a rock, a cornerstone, a sun, a morning star, a spring, a bridegroom, a householder, a teacher, a father, yes, everything and everything points to him and says about him, each in its own way. Just as if we acted here, as a thing may have many names and signs, or as if there was someone who doubted it.

(9) But here he should answer, because we asked how it was among the enthusiasts, that among them one name, word, and mind were at variance with himself about one thing, one saying yes, the other saying no. When Carlstadt says that Tuto points to the seated body. Zwingel says that the same Tuto points to the bread. Now both cannot be true; one must lie and be the devil's teacher; for in one speech it cannot be that one name or word has at the same time two vile meanings and interpretations. I cannot say, in the one saying, Joh. 1, 29.: "Behold, this is the Lamb of God" 2c., that Lamb here should at the same time interpret a sheep and wolf, or at the same time a sheep and not a sheep, as yet in the one word Tuto Carlstadt, Oecolampad and Zwingel disagree, and one says, it interprets this; the other says no, it interprets another. Item Zwingel speaks: "is" means "interprets"; Oecolampad says no, it means badly "is". Again Oecolampad says: "my body" means "my body's sign"; Zwingel says: No, it means bad my body. Here, here one should answer, and compare this disagreement, so that the devil would not have to stand so coldly and be so publicly seized in his lie. But this will probably remain unanswered by them forever.

10 For though one place of Scripture calls Christ a lamb, and speaks as of a lamb, yet in no place does it speak against it.

Nor does he punish himself, nor say no to it; for the fact that he is called a lamb does not contradict the fact that elsewhere he is called a rock or a stone, and there is no disagreement. But the spirit of enthusiasm skins itself here in the cheeks, and interprets not only many words, but also one word at the same time in one place against itself. The lie would not be so gross, and the disgrace not so great, if they interpreted the same word in different places discordantly and unequally, or interpreted different words in one place unequally; but that they interpret the same word, in the same place, in the same speech, unequally and repugnantly, that is, with leave, well bethan, and the devil beaten naked in the pillory; for no language speaks thus, and a child must say that [it] cannot be. For if I say, Christ is the Lamb of God, it cannot be that one by the Lamb understands a wolf, the other a sheep; one must lie, and is not both of the Holy Spirit. Now the enthusiasts have almost ten different understandings of the words of the Lord's Supper, and no one is the same as the other in interpreting them. There must be lies and devils and no good spirit.

(11) But that the false spirit blames us, because we ourselves do not abide by the words and the same mind, because we say, "This is my body," to be understood thus: "Under the bread is my body;" or, "In the bread is my body," 2c., and thus ourselves also disagree, I answer, "The lying spirit knows well that he does us wrong here, and does so only to disparage us and to adorn his lies with his own. For he knows very well that we argue about it with all seriousness, that these words "this is my body", as they are written and read, should be understood in the most simple way, and do not make various and disparate texts out of one text, 1) as they do.

(12) This I have said in my booklet, that those who say in common speech, Under the bread is Christ's body, or, In the bread is Christ's body, are not to be condemned, because with such words they confess their faith that Christ is in them.

1) The words: "aus Einem Text" are missing in the Erlanger.

Body is truly in the Lord's Supper. But with this they do not make another new text; neither do they want such their words to be the text, but remain on the one text. Paul says: "Christ is God", Rom. 9, 5, but 2 Cor. 5, 19: "God was in Christ", and yet both places are each in their own mind simple and certain, and not contrary to each other. But the enthusiast's text is divided in one place, in one word.

(13) And if we should be sought so carefully, and if there should be so great a power in it, or if it should be proved that the text, "This is my body," could not suffer me to speak otherwise: In the Lord's Supper is Christ's body; then we are ready, and would have it recanted, that it should not be thus spoken, but badly and plainly, "This is my body," as the words are there. Let them also do so, and be agreed in the text. Although no Christian will require us in this way, that in all other sermons and conversations, as often as one speaks of the Lord's Supper, we should be bound to say, "This is my body," provided that in the Lord's Supper we leave the text to itself and to its place. In other places and speeches we may well be allowed to say: Under the bread or in the bread is Christ's body. Item: In the Lord's Supper Christ's body is true; for we would not be granted to speak of our faith.

(14) But the fanciers thus make a joke to mend their holed furs. They well feel that their lies are different in one place and word, and want to defend their disagreement with it and not revoke it; but it does not apply. We grant that they may speak of the sacrament elsewhere as they wish or are able. But we want the text in the Lord's Supper to be one, simple, certain and certain in all words, syllables and letters. Since they do not do this, I freely conclude that the devil, the father of all disunity, is their teacher. For St. Paul says: "God is not a God of disunity" [1 Cor. 14:33]. So also all Christians are of one mind, Eph. 4, 3. and do not make divisions, 1 Cor. 1, 10. So you know this spirit from the first fruit of their disunity.

(15) Concerning this, where the Scriptures give various names or sayings to one thing, these are not only good, and never contrary to one another, but also certain and well founded, that one may stand upon them. As where Christ is preached a lamb, I am sure and certain that he is well and truly called a lamb. But the enthusiast none can make his interpretation certain. For Carlstadt has not made his Tuto certain to this day that he interprets it as he claims, as they themselves confess. Zwingel and Oecolampad, however, have never attempted with a single letter to make it certain, as "is" is so much as "interprets," "body" is so much as "body's sign"; but say it badly, as their own word and opinion, of which they themselves are uncertain, and regard no one as wanting to try whether they want to make it certain.

(16) Therefore the swarming spirit shall not teach us here how in the Scriptures the kingdom of God has various interpretations, but shall prove that such interpretations are contrary to each other and uncertain, as we complain and prove that their erroneous false interpretations are not only various, but also contrary to each other and uncertain. Is it not well answered? When I fight against their disunity and uncertainty, he answers me from diversity, just as if diversity and disunity were one thing. I ask how it is that their interpretation and understanding are not only diverse, but also disunited and contrary to each other, he answers that it is not wrong that they are diverse. Let us be satisfied with this, and confess our error, and give credence to their faith.

(17) But when will the answer be given, how the disunity in such diversity comes from the Holy Spirit? There is no one here at home. If we are to come to them, then they must truly put away such disagreement, and become one and certain of the text and understanding beforehand; otherwise we will quite rightly shy away and say, "The devil is in the hedge. For such aggravation would be more necessary, because the images are storming. Images would not hinder us; but disunity of mind and speech, that is the devil.

18 For even if they had won their cause and shut us up, they would not have accomplished anything more and would not have advanced their cause any further than to have taken this text "this is my body" from us according to our understanding. But with this they have not yet proven their understanding, nor can they ever prove it. Now if a right spirit were with them, it would not only take away the false understanding, but also give and prove another and constant true understanding in its place. If St. Paul had taken away the righteousness of the law or works in the most violent way, he would not have achieved anything, but he would have taught another righteousness in its place and made it certain. God did not abolish the Old Testament until He put the New Testament in its place and made it much more certain than the Old.

(19) It is not a fine spirit that teaches and says, This is a lie, and yet there is no certain truth to it. It is not valid to punish a lie, and on the other hand not to know nor to want to denounce the lie, namely the truth. He who wants to overthrow lies violently must put public, certain and constant truth in their place; for lies are not afraid 1) nor do they flinch until the bright, constant truth comes. It is far away in the darkness and absence of truth. Now if our understanding is wrong in these words "this is my body," then Zwingel is guilty of making his understanding and text (namely, this means my body) certain and proving it constantly. Likewise Oecolampad, and all the others, each one his own. But when will they do this?

(20) Yea, I will tell thee more, because they cannot certainly have nor prove their understanding or text, it is certain that they also may not constantly reproach our understanding and text falsely. For, as it is said, who can certainly and constantly punish a lie, who does not know the vile truth?

can muster? Who can reprove wrong who does not prove right? Light must ever punish darkness: one darkness does not punish another; so Beelzebub does not cast out a devil either. The enthusiastic spirit feels this well, therefore it walks around like a cat around a hot pudding, looking at how our text and understanding is not right, and yet it shuns and shuns, like the devil, the word of God, so that it does not have to prove how its text and understanding is right, because it feels well that it cannot do it.

(21) Therefore he thinks that we should leave it there, that he should abolish the text of the Lord's Supper according to our understanding, and not put another certain one in its place; no, that does not apply. If thou wilt break off, build again. If thou wilt warn against error, teach also certain truth in its place, or let thy mastering and teaching stand. 2) You are a false lying spirit, because you reproach falsely that which you cannot make true or certain, nor do you want to. The Holy Spirit, however, knows how to prove the contradiction and make it certain, where he punishes lies or error.

22 Let this be written as a warning to you, my dear lords and brethren, for here you can grasp this spirit, that it shuns the light, and is a useless washer when it is not necessary, and flutters and flutters about when it is necessary to speak. And, as I also said in that book, you must not think that he will go right under your eyes on one argument or rebuttal; but, as he did on this first rebuttal, so he does almost on all the others, as we shall hear.

(23) Therefore beware of them, or attack them freshly with this dissension and uncertainty of their speech and mind, and confidently require of them that they make thee a right, certain, united text in these words, "This is my body." If they do this, come confidently to them, and I will also give myself 3) gained. But because they do not do so, they shall be called false, heretics, seducers, and in addition to these things.

2) "to give oneself won" == to admit that one is defeated.

3) So the Jenaers. Wittenbergers and Erlangers: me too.

1) Thus the Wittenberg. In the Jenaer, with Walch and in the Erlanger "itself" is missing.

lost, even if they were still so stiff and proud. For even if their main thing and insanity were right and true, one would still have to have 'one, unified, correct, certain, unanimous text; because nothing can be built on an unstable, discordant, repugnant text. So my first objection still stands, that this sect has so many disunited heads, as a sign that Satan is master and spirit here.

(24) Secondly, I had requested that we also be shown from Scripture how the little word "is" means "interprets" in the Lord's Supper. For I had proved in my booklet that the Spirit in his previous writings did indeed lead some sayings from Scripture, in which "is" should mean "interprets"; but it would be his own conceit, and had not yet proved it. Therefore I desired that he should still do it, and prove his interpretation. For it is not very necessary for us that he should say sayings; we know such sayings almost as well as without his saying them, as: "Christ is the Rock" 2c. (Rom. 9, 33.) But that there is interpretation in it, we do not see and know, and would like that such would also come forth.

25 He now goes on, and does the same, but again he says such sayings as: "John is Elijah" [Matth. 11, 14], "Christ is a vine" 2c. [When this is done, he 1) clatters long and much with his own words, and smiles without Scripture, saying, "Here is interpretation. For John is not Elias, but interprets Eliam. But there you see that he does not want to prove how "is" should mean "interprets". He says that it means "interprets," but who asks that he says it? We know beforehand that he says so; but he should prove with Scripture that he says right.

26 And even though he himself almost feels that his Klüttern is just gibberish (as he takes great pains to speak bad German, though without such pains he would still be un-German enough), and confesses that his opinion is not to stand on it: whether "is" would be taken for "interprets", that therefore also here in the Lord's Supper should be taken that way; but that, because other oerters of Scripture and faith compel that the words of the Lord's Supper may not have all our sense, let the "is" be taken for "interprets" with them, quia is sensus sit absurdus etiam fideli intellectui.

Yes, carnali intellectui. Now, how our understanding does not rhyme with Scripture and faith, they have not yet proved, and will see it further afterwards.

(27) But this is not to say that they would thus make the text of the Lord's Supper uncertain, and turn themselves out as thieves in secret; let them stand; and because they have taught that "is" means "signifies," let them prove it continually, and instead of the former certain text, which they would have broken up and made uncertain, let them set before us again a new certain one; as I also said above that they are bound to do. Because they now shy away from this and do not want to do it, they give it to be understood what kind of spirit they have, as one that only wants to break and not to build, to tear and not to heal; that is called the devil. Therefore be warned against this devil, who flutters and flutters so that he does not want to answer properly, and let him go.

28 But to instruct you further, as ours, you should know that it is a pure poem who says that this little word "is" means as much as "interprets. No man can ever prove it in any part of Scripture; indeed, I will say further, that if the enthusiasts in all the languages that are on earth bring a saying in which "is" means as much as "interprets," they shall have won. But they should leave it well alone; the high spirits are lacking in that they do not rightly regard the art of speech, grammatica, or, as they call it, tropus, which is taught in the children's school.

The same art teaches how a boy should make two or three words out of one word, or how he should give one word new usage and more interpretations. As that I prove with some examples, the word "flower", according to its first and old interpretation, means a rose, lily, violet and the like, which grows and blossoms from the earth. If I now want to praise Christ with a fine praise, and see how he is blossoming from the Virgin Mary

1) klüttert == rings.

If such a beautiful child comes, I may take the word "flower" and make a trope, or give a new interpretation and custom and say: Christ is a flower. Here all grammarians or masters of speech say that "flower" has become a new word and has a new interpretation, and is now no longer called the flower of the field, but the child Jesus, and must not here the word "is" become an interpretation, because Christ does not mean a flower, but, he is a flower; but another flower, than the natural.

30 For thus says the poet Horatius: 1) Dixeris egregie, notum si callida verbum reddiderit junctura novum; that is, it is finely spoken, if you can well deny a common word. From this it is clear that one word becomes two or many words when it receives a new interpretation over its common meaning. As "flower" is another word when it means Christ, and another when it means the natural rose and the like. Item, another, if it is called a golden, silver or wooden rose. Thus, when one speaks of a meager man: He is a dog; here "dog" means the meager felt, and has become a new word from the old word, according to the doctrine of Horatii; and need not be here "is" an interpretation, for the meager does not mean a dog.

(31) So then they speak in all languages, and change the words; as when we say, Mary is a morning glory, Christ is a fruit of the womb, the devil is a god of the world, the pope is Judas, St. Augustine is Paul, St. Bernard is a dove, David is a little woodworm, and so on, the Scriptures are full of such speech. And in grammar it is called tropus or metaphora when two things are given the same name for the sake that there is a likeness in both of them, and so the same name is one word according to the letter, but potestate ac significatione plura, according to power, custom, interpretation two words, one old and one new, as Horatius says and the children know well.

32 We Germans use to put "right", or "other", or "new" with such negated words and say: You are a right one.

Dog, the monks are right Pharisees, the nuns are right Moabite daughters, Christ is a right Solomon. Item, Luther is another Hus, Zwingel is another Korah, Oecolampad is a new Abiram. In such speeches all Germans will bear witness to me and confess that [they] are new words, and the same is so much when I say: Luther is Hus, Luther is another Hus, Luther is a right Hus, Luther is a "your Hus. So that one feels how in such speeches, according to the doctrine of Horatii, a new word is made from the previous one; for it does not work nor sound when I say: Luther means Hus; but: he is a Hus. In such sayings one speaks of the essence, what one is, and not what he means, and makes over his new essence also a new word. So you will find it in all languages, that I know for sure, and so teach all grammaticali, and know the boys in school, and will never find that "is" may mean "interpret".

33 Therefore, when Christ says: "John is Elias", no one can prove that John means Elias, because it would be ridiculous that John should mean Elias, as much cheaper Elias means John. And according to Zwingel's art Christ would have to turn it around and say: Elias is John, that is, he means Johannem. But Christ wants to say what John is; not what he means, but what kind of being or office he has, and says: he is Elias. Here Elias has become a new word, and does not mean the old Elias, but the new Elias, as we Germans say: John is the right Elias, John is another Elias, John is a new Elias. In the same way it is said: "Christ is a rock", that is, he has a being, and is truly a rock, but still a new rock, another rock, a right rock; item: "Christ is a right vine.

34 Dear, how does it work, if you want to interpret such things according to Zwingel's conceit: Christ means the right vine? Who then is the right vine that Christ signifies? So I hear, Christ should be a sign or interpretation of the wood in the vineyard? Oh, that would be fine! Why would not Christ have said so more cheaply?

The right vine is Christ, that is, the wooden vine means Christ? It is more reasonable that Christ should signify, than that he should signify first of all, since that which signifies is always less than that which is signified, and all signs are less than the thing they signify; as all this is well understood even by fools and children.

But the Zwingel does not look at the word vera. in this saying: "Christ is the right vine. If he had looked at it, he could not have made an interpretation of the "is". For no language nor reason suffers it to be said that Christ signifies the right vine. For no one can say that in this place the right vine is the wood in the vineyard. And so the text forces by force that "vine" here is a new word, which means another, new, right vine, and not the vine in the vineyard. Therefore, "is" here cannot be an interpretation, but Christ is real and has the nature of a true, new vine. Even though the text reads, "Christ is a vine," I do not mean to say that Christ means the vine, but rather that the vine should mean Christ.

So also this saying: "Christ is the Lamb of God" [Joh. 1, 29.], cannot be understood that Christ means the Lamb of God, because then Christ would have to be less than a sign than the Lamb of God. But what then is the Lamb of God that signifies Christ? Should it be the paschal lamb? Why did he not turn it around and say more cheaply: The Lamb of God is Christ, that is, "Paschal Lamb" means Christ, as Zwingel interprets? But because the little word "God" is next to the word "lamb", it forces by force that lamb here is another, new word, also means another, new and the right lamb, which is truly Christ, and not the old paschal lamb.

37. and so henceforth, what they lead more for examples, as: "The seed is God's word" [Luc. 8, 11. ff.], "the field is the world" 2c. [Matth. 13, 38.], they cannot make an interpretation out of the "is" with good reason; but the children in school say that seed is the world.

and Acker are Tropi or negated words after the Metaphora. Because Vocabulum Simplex et metaphoricum are not one, but two words. So seed here is not called grain nor wheat, but God's word, and field is called the world; for Christ (says the text itself) speaks in parables, and not of natural grain or wheat. But he that speaketh in parables maketh common words into common words, new and different words; otherwise they were not parables, where he used the common words in the former interpretation: That there is a foolish spirit without understanding, which will take the words in parables according to the common interpretation, contrary to the nature and manner of the parables, he must then gain by interpretation and jugglery.

Item, also the saying from the first book of Moses: "Seven oxen are seven years, and seven ears of corn are seven years. [Since the text itself says that it speaks of a dream, and of a likeness or sign of the seven years, the words "seven oxen, seven ears" must here also be metaphorae and new words, and mean just the same as these words "seven years"; that therefore these words "seven years" (according to common interpretation), and these words "seven oxen" (according to new interpretation) mean one and the same. For the seven oxen do not mean seven years, but they themselves are essentially and truly the seven years; for they are not natural oxen that eat grass in the pasture, which are called "seven oxen" by old common words. But here it is a new word, and are seven oxen of hunger and plenty, that is, seven years of hunger and plenty. Summa, they may well say, "Here is interpretation," but they will never prove it in any way, just as they have never yet had the courage to prove it; they think it is enough when they say, "Here is interpretation. But it is not enough for us, because we do not believe in a constraint or a few people; we want to have reason and proof.

39 But here the other group will perhaps boast and say: Hereby you will confirm the sign of Oecolampadii, because he, according to such a teaching of Horatii, also has a new word.

and Tropum makes of the common one, and says: "my body" here means "my body's sign". To this is soon answered: that the Grammarians, and also all Christian teachers, forbid that one should never depart from the common old interpretation of a word, and adopt a new interpretation, unless the text and the understanding compel, or are proved by force from other places of Scripture; otherwise one would never retain a certain text, understanding, speech, or language. As when Christ says: "John is Elijah"; here the text and faith compel that Elijah must be a new word, because it is certain that John is not nor can be the old Elijah. Item, "Christ is a rock", again the text itself and the faith force that "rock" here is a new word, because Christ is not nor can be a natural rock.

(40) That Oecolampad here makes the word "body" into "sign of the body" is not to be confessed to him, for he does it willfully, and cannot prove that the text or faith so compels. Just as if one would willfully tropisize or deny the words "The gospel is God's power," Rom. 11, 16, so much should apply: the gospel is Roland's sword. So if someone wants to call Christ Belial, Paul Judas or interpret, who wants to prevent him? But one does not accept it, he proves it then, and forces it from the text. So Oecolampad does not argue any further than that he makes vain bread and wine in the Lord's Supper. But if he already contends for the same (as he is not able to do), he still cannot contend nor prove that "body" means sign of the body, as I also indicated in the previous booklet, and thus Oecolampad must remain without certain text and understanding of the Lord's Supper. Now one must have a certain text and understanding here, even if there should be straw and chaff in the Lord's Supper. But who will give the same? They do not, do not want to, and cannot.

(41) Well then, let us stick to 1) ours, and admonish all who wish to be admonished to beware of such uncertain, unstable tropists and dentists;

For it is not enough that they say: bread is bread, and wine is wine, but they must and should prove how the text is to be read and understood, "this is my body", whether it should thus stand: this means my body, or: this is my body's sign; or: this is my body. We do not let ourselves make a child's game or small things (as they like to do) out of this text. They are Christ's words, we must know what they hold and give. Summa, it is as I said, they do not want to answer where they should answer, and in the meantime they chat about their own thoughts.

42. to the third: Although the spirit of the covenants 2) knows well that I understand by God's grace how one must explain one place of the Scriptures by another, as I, before Zwingel's name arose, have stated in so many writings before all the world: nevertheless, he must teach me this through almost many leaves, only so that one should think that he wants to answer once. Now God knows that I have answered all my objections, and have not desired such art from him, nor do I know how to thank him for it. But that is what I would like even today, that he teaches himself and his own, who would be better off than I, such an art, and also shows it in the text of the Last Supper, since 3) it is necessary for him.

(43) He scolded me for doing the part "this is my body" alone, and leaving the following "which is given for you," and washed horribly how that following part explained the previous part. Well, I understand very well that one place explains the other; so I was in the bath the other day, and washed my ears, so that I can hear how in the text of the Last Supper the following piece "which is given for you" should explain the preceding piece "this is my body. But I ask, how such explanation is proved or comes about? There hear once a master, you have never heard one.

44) Christ's body (he says) is visibly given for us on the cross; because in the Lord's Supper it says: "This is my body, which is given for you", it should also be 4) visibly given in the Lord's Supper.

2) i.e. flush.

3) In the old edition of Walch and in the Erlanger: that.

4) So the Jena. Wittenberg and Erlanger: had to.

1) Thus the Erlangen. In the old editions: den.

If the same body, given for us, is to be the Lord's Supper, So the following piece explains the first, 1) that because Christ is not visible in the Lord's Supper, "is" must be an interpretation. Here tell me, dear brethren, whether this spirit is in earnest to answer us, or whether he does not rather make a mockery of this matter. But I thank thee, Jesus Christ, my Lord, that thou canst so masterfully see thine enemies in their own words, and put them to shame to strengthen our faith in thy simple words. This few pieces should reasonably deter anyone from this sect, when he sees such great gross blindness in such a high learned spirit. The boys in school know the quod refert substantiam, and this spirit says: quod refert qualitatem imo accidens communissimum et mutabilissimum. I have to speak German.

45, If and where I can say of Christ's body: "this is Christ's body, given for us", then it must also be visible: because it is given for us in no other way than visibly; but if it is not visibly there, then it is not there at all 2). Now point with my hand toward heaven, and say these words: There sits at the right hand of God the body that was given for us, so it must truly sit there visibly, or there is nothing at all. For the following words "which is given for you" thus declare, according to the art of this spirit. Item: Since Christ Joh. 8, 59. hid himself and went out to the temple- would like to say: There goes the body, which is given for us, but it is given visibly for us, therefore it certainly goes visibly there, and the evangelist lies when he says that it goes hidden there, or will not be there at all. And summa: Christ's body be where he will, it is the body that is given for us. Because he is visibly given for us, he cannot be anywhere, unless he is visibly there. What do you think? Did you once hear a master? Thou hast scripture and faith which our understanding cannot endure. Now believe this spirit, that he may teach thee rightly in the Lord's Supper. But so the devil must always keep his wisdom....

1) In the old editions: föddexst.

2) Erlanger: nothing.

and leave the stink behind, so that it will be known that it was there.

46 Therefore the poor body of Christ, because it is once visibly given for us, is so imprisoned that either it cannot be anywhere invisible; or, if it is invisible, it is not there. For where this hinders him to be in the Lord's Supper, that he is visibly given for us, and cannot be otherwise than visibly there, because the words are there, "This is my body which is given for you," he must of course be nowhere but visibly; for such declaration these words give, "Which is given for you." What does "He" mean? "The One?" The spirit says: It means as much as, as, or the form, as he hung on the cross. Now he hung there visibly before the eyes of the Jews, under spikes and steeds. If he were in the Lord's Supper, all the Jews, horses, spears, crosses, nails, and everything else would also have to be in the Lord's Supper, yes, also at the right hand of God and in all places where Christ's body is.

(47) Thus shall the scripture be expounded, and one place shall be judged by another. They are angry that I consider the devil to be speaking through them. Dear, how can reason say here that [it] is human error and not the devil's mockery? Especially because the Zwingel makes such great art, spirit, and blather out of it, as if it were one of his best main reasons and masterpieces. Muenzer was a foolhardy spirit; but this one is so foolhardy, spews out what falls into his mouth, does not even think what he says. But God warns us thus.

(48) Is it not to be pitied, then, that for such a trivial false reason one should deny the bright words of Christ, "This is my body," and thus profane the Lord's Supper? If a boy in school made such a syllogism, he would be given a shilling; 3) if a master among the sophists did it, he would have to be called a donkey; and here, in the spirit, it should be called divine Scripture and truth, of which they boast highly against our understanding. So one would also do such spirituality and say: Christ at the right hand of God is the Son, who was born of Mary; but He is born of Mary mortal, he must also sit mortal at the right hand of God. Herr Hans Ritter does not ride in a cuirass, therefore he is not a knight. Rachel has no veil on, therefore Rachel is no woman, Juxta regulam novam: accidens est substantia, nec potest abesse suo subjecto.

3) This is no doubt ironically spoken instead of: "Schelle" (Maulschelle).

In the fourth place he comes to the words of the Lord's Supper, and divides them into two parts. Out of some he makes a command, which tells us what to do or command, as these: "Take, eat. Out of some he makes speech or conversation, which tells us badly what is to be done. But here I must use his filthy, hostile German, which he likes much better than the stork's rattling, although one would sweat before he understood it. He wants to have stammered or coughed (I should say talked) so much: Where God gives, there are hot words, like: "You shall have no other gods" [Deut. 5, 7. 2 Deut. 20, 3.]. But where he does something, there are actually words, as Gen. 1, 14: "Let there be light" 2c. So he would like to say so much, if he could speak: Wherever there are words, even if I speak them, nothing will come of them, as if I speak from Genesis 1: "Let there be sun and moon," nothing will come of it. So even if Christ gave his body in the Lord's Supper when he said, "This is my body," it does not follow, if I repeat it, that Christ's body will also become his body immediately; for Christ has nowhere said that from my word his body will become 2c.

50 O poor wretched spirit, how he wrestles and writhes, and yet has nowhere to turn! Now, we first assume that he admits that Christ gave his body to the disciples in the Lord's Supper; for he confesses that these are the words: "This is my body," which happened that time, and we thank them kindly for letting us keep the first part of the Lord's Supper. But if we have this, let the others also remain with us. We also want to take the same first supper from them with force and by their own words, in this way:

51 Zwingli keeps the words in the Lord's Supper the same as he wants, it may be hot words or lassel words, Thätelworte or Leselworte; since

I have no interest in them. But this is what I ask: whether these words of Christ are lies or true words? If they are lying words, then Christ himself is responsible for them, and they do not concern us. But if they are true words, we cheerfully answer that even the spirit of error must confess that Christ gave his body in the Lord's Supper; for they are words of truth, which Christ speaks for the first time, and does not deny when he says: "Take, eat, this is my body" 2c. Just as the sun and the moon stood there when he spoke Genesis 1:14: "Let there be sun and moon," and was not a lying word: so his word is certainly not an epilogue, but a word of power, which creates what it says, Psalm 33:9: "He speaks, so it is written"; especially because it is spoken here for the first time, and is supposed to be a phalanx word. Thus we have received the first few suppers, which they themselves also give and confess.

Now let us also see how the tender spirit, from the words of the word, 1) wants to make "is" a word of interpretation and take our understanding. Where words are used, it does not follow that this is what happens when we speak them, but remains bad speech about what has happened. If we say in the Lord's Supper: "This is my body," it does not become Christ's body. Therefore, of course, there must be bread of the same kind. If there is vain bread, then "is" must be an interpretation. So our understanding is nothing, and the enthusiast is right. Here he does not dispute further, because in the first supper our understanding is right, but not in the other following 2c. If I now ask here: who has given the Spirit the power, or by what means he wants to prove that the words in the Lord's Supper should thus be separated and separated from one another, some hot words, some pent-up words: then he gives no other answer, but says: he hopes that no one may say that in the Lord's Supper there are hot words, by which one makes Christ's body. Thus his proof is based on his hope, which always boasts that it is based on God's Word and bright Scripture. Whoever now wants to build on the hope of the spirit, may at least believe that there is vain bread in the

1) Thus the Wittenberg and Jena editions. In the old edition of Walch and in the Erlangen edition: "aus dem Thätelworte."

The Lord's Supper: for such faith shall have just cause.

(53) But we say against this, that this spirit teacheth us once which we know, and leaveth that which he ought to teach, and needeth sacrilege to divide and separate the words of the Lord's Supper thus. He should prove that they are to be torn apart from one another in this way, since they all stand in one place after another: "Take, eat, this is my body," 2c., and are not our words at all, but Christ's own words.

54 Although these words, "This is my body," would themselves be words of the baptism, where they would be forced out and set apart in a dungeon from the others, they are nevertheless hot words, because they are embodied in hot words. For I also hope, indeed I know, that all Christians are guilty, from the institution and commandment of Christ, of speaking such words in the Lord's Supper, and do not think the revelers themselves so bold as to leave them outside with a clear conscience. If they must be had and spoken in the Lord's Supper, then they are truly hot words, because they are put into 1) hot words, and it is not valid to separate them from the hot words, as the spirit does. But when the words of the sacraments are thus put into hot words, they are no longer bad words of the sacraments, but also hot words, for everything they say is also done by the power of the divine hot words by which they are spoken.

55. as Matth. 21, 21. there is a word that the disciples should say: "Lift yourself up and throw yourself into the sea", which, if someone speaks badly, certainly follows nothing from it and remains a word. But since Christ puts it into a hot word and says, "If you will say with faith to this mountain, 'Lift yourself up,'" 2c., then it truly no longer has to be a word for the purpose of baptism, but happens as it reads when it is spoken according to his command. Item, when the priest baptizes and says, "I baptize you," 2c., this is certainly a mere word of baptism; but because it is put into the hot word, where Christ says [Matth. 28, 19.], "Go and baptize," it must be nevertheless be a baptism before God. And if Peter or Paul said: "Your sins are forgiven you", as Christ said to Mary Magdalene [Luc. 7, 48.], well, that is a loud word; nevertheless, the sins are forgiven, as the words say; therefore, that [it] is commanded in the hot word, since Christ says Joh. 20, 22. 23: "Take the Holy Spirit, to whom you forgive sin" 2c.

1) Thus the Wittenberg. Jenaer and Erlanger: in.

And if the word Genesis 1: "Let there be a moon and a sun," would also be put into a hot word and commanded to be spoken, then you should see whether God would lie and not become a sun, where I would speak it to the sterile or sky. But now that there is no hot word, it will certainly not become a sun.

So also, if a hot word were, that I should speak to the water these words, "this is wine," thou shouldst well see whether there should not be wine. Therefore it is a loud division of wills 2) and useless chatter, that this spirit separates the words of the bawd from the words of the beast in one and the same text, since they are taught and commanded to be spoken to the words of the beast, and equates them with other words of the beast, which are without command and are words of the beast. This is called acting sophistically and maliciously in God's words; but with them it is called Scripture and faith, which our understanding does not like.

(58) Since this does not prove an interpretation, nor does it overthrow our understanding, let us now ask whether Christ has called us liars, since he commands and calls us to speak these words: "Take, eat, this is my body," because they are all spoken in his person and as his own words? If he calls us liars, then he watches; but if he calls us truthful speakers, then his body must of course be present in the Lord's Supper, by virtue, not of our speaking, but of his commanding, heating and working. And so we have not only the first and only supper, but all the others, which are kept according to the command and institution of the Lord Christ.

59. if then they ask, Where is the power that makes Christ's body in the Lord's Supper, when we say: "This is my body"? I answer: Where is the power for a mountain to rise and throw itself into the sea, when we say: "Lift yourself and throw yourself into the sea"? Certainly, it is not in our speaking, but in God's hotness, who connects His hotness to our speaking. Item, where is the power for water to come out of the rock, because Moses does nothing but strike it? If striking should be enough, then we would also make all the stones water; but there is God's command and Moses has nothing, because he may speak the word: I strike the rock. Which I also could speak well and follows nevertheless only water; because the hot word is with Moses and not with me.

2) Erlanger twice: Tillens.

(60) So also here: If I were to say about all the bread, "This is Christ's body," of course nothing would follow from it. But when we say in the Lord's Supper, "This is my body," according to its institution and sanctification, it is his body, not because of what we say or do, but because of its sanctification, that he has thus commanded us to speak and to do, and has bound his sanctification and doing to our speaking. If, however, according to the Spirit's highly praised art, God's command and our speaking were to be torn apart from one another, then he would not be allowed to teach us, as then our speaking would be of no avail, as we would well know. But then he should answer and prove art, where hot and speaking are together, that God would have to lie and deceive, and nothing would come of it. 1) The great spirit must always speak differently than one asks or the matter demands.

But if I had intended to write against the Spirit, I would also do here a strange question, namely, because the Spirit fights so high: Quod verbum facti non efficiat factum, sed narret factum, that the word does not create what it reads, but only preaches about the business. So he admittedly confesses that it happened in the first supper of Christ, that Christ's body was given to the table; what else could he torture himself with, as these are words of the word, that is, that speak of history. It would be quite a vain babble, because he puts it all on the fact that words of tidings are the are those who say of the deed that it happened once (otherwise they would not be words). Well then, the Spirit herewith confesses that in the first supper Christ's body was given to eat, and such a thing happened once; but it has no consequence where it is spoken of afterwards, as he does not deny it above.

62 Now I ask where this spirit has left forehead, reason, discipline and shame? if he says above that his reason and cause that Christ's body is not in the Lord's Supper is that the Scriptures and faith may not suffer such understanding of Christ's words: Absurditas hujus sensus repugnaret intellectui etiam fidei. Can the first supper have Christ's body, how can it be contrary to Scripture and faith? If it is contrary to Scripture and faith that Christ's body is in the Lord's Supper, how can he be in the first supper? For I speak not here of unworthy ministers, whether they confect or not, but of the words of Christ, "This is my body," of which they say, cry, and prate, that it is contrary to faith and scripture that Christ's body should be there, as they [the words] are, though there were saints of the same kind.

(63) And yet here again the spirit bites its tongue, and admits that it is not contrary to Scripture nor to faith, that, according to its sound, Christ's body is present in the first supper; but only that it does not follow that therefore it is also in other suppers. So they should not cry out and boast that our understanding is contrary to Scripture and faith (as they so gloriously insist), but contrary to the consequence and other communions. For this is much another question, whether I or thou have Christ's body in the Lord's Supper, and whether the old understanding is contrary to Scripture and faith. If it is not contrary to Scripture and faith, as the first supper proves, even with the confession of the Spirit, then we ask very kindly that they grant us to teach and believe, which they themselves confess contrary to themselves, that it is not contrary to Scripture or faith. But if they have Scripture and faith against it, that they themselves would answer it, as they so nearly strive against such their confession. We are told that they themselves admit that it is not against contrary to scripture and faith, how they chatter, so that they reveal themselves as the liars, and cannot hide their false sense.

64 Because we here seize the lying spirit, that it lies against itself, and confesses to us that our understanding is not against Scripture nor faith (as it nevertheless denies), that Christ's body is in the Lord's Supper, but only against the consequence: so we will stay with it. For since it is not contrary to Scripture or faith that the words of Christ, according to our understanding, give Christ's body in the first supper, we see no reason why it should be contrary to Scripture and faith in other suppers. What is not contrary to Scripture and faith is not contrary to any consequence.

(65) Is not this a fine, cautious spirit? In the very passage in which he wants to prove that our understanding is contrary to faith, he takes before him and proves that words of the baptism are in the Lord's Supper, and does not see that he thereby proves against himself that our understanding in the first Supper is right and not contrary to faith. For words of the baptism first give what they say, or are not words of the baptism, as he himself confesses. So he smuggles against himself, either that there are no baptismal words in the first supper, or that our understanding is right in the first supper.

(66) But if anyone should say, Christ did not command these words to be spoken in the Lord's Supper, "This is my body," answer, This is true; it is not written in the text, You shall speak: This is my body; nor is there a hand painted pointing to it. But let them be so bold as they will, that they let such words stand without and for unbidden words. For it is not written in the text: Ye shall say: Take and 'eat; item: It does not say: You shall take the bread and bless 2c. But let it be seen who will be so bold as to say, Ye shall not take bread, nor bless it, nor say, Take and eat.

67 So I hear that Christ must put these words by every letter, Thus shall ye speak and do, and shall it not be enough that he should say at the end, Do this in remembrance of me? If we shall do such things as he hath done, verily, then we must take the bread and bless it, break it and give it, and say: "This is my body", because it is all put into the hot word "Such things do", and we do not have to leave the words outside; because St. Paul also says, "he received it from the Lord, and so gave it to us" 2c. 1 Cor. 11, 23. ff. Which, of course, are also hot words, and do not allow us to tweak or change some of them.

68 So it is true that nowhere did Christ tell us these letters: "You shall make my body out of bread. What need is there? But he has told us to speak these words in his person and name, out of his command and decree, "This is my body," since he says, "Do this." Neither do we make his body of the bread, as the Spirit leans upon us. Neither do we say that his body is made of the bread; but we say that his body, which was made long ago, is here, when we say, "This is my body," for Christ does not say, "This is my body," or, "Make my body," but, "This is my body."

69 And because we have spoken of the hot words, we must do something else to protect our people against the chatter of the spirits. For it is not possible to shut the devil's mouth; he is like the wind, which finds (as they say) very narrow holes. 1) Hot words are of two kinds, some of which involve faith, such as Matt. 21:21, about moving mountains, and Marc. 16:17, about the signs that follow the faithful. Now if someone without faith were to say to the mountain, "Lift yourself up," and say that he was doing it from the word of God, it would not happen, because Christ binds faith into the word of God.

70 The others are not included, since faith is not involved, as these words in the Lord's Supper: "Take, eat," for here also the unworthy and unbelieving eat Christ's body, as also Judas and many of the Corinthians did. Therefore it is not necessary for those who take this supper to have faith, just as those who baptize do not have to believe. Item,

1) Erlanger: "gar enge Löcher, (as they say)."

Those who preach the same, and all those who hold public office: for Christ has put all these things in his word, and not in men's holiness, that we might be assured of the word and of the sacraments 2c. This is why I say that the greatest annoyance is of course the enthusiasts who baptize the unworthy, celebrate mass, preach 2c., and do not consider that they themselves may be worse before God, or that no one can ever know how pious they are, that they must let the sacraments stand and go in God's words and command alone.

71 After this he points my finger, as a blind man, to the word "such", or "that doeth", which St. Paul is supposed to explain thus: "As often as ye eat the bread" 2c. From this he wants to have decided that Christ, by the word "that doeth," points to eating bread, and not to eating Christ's body. Indeed, if St. Paul were to say: "As often as you eat this bread, which is not the body of Christ (which the Spirit adds from his head), do not put your finger on it, I would have seen it long since over five steps. I always hope they should lead scripture; so they lead their own dreams. Therefore I say again: I would also like them to put their fingers on the previous word, since Christ points to the bread, and yet says: "This is my body." There is also a "that" here, and they would gladly let themselves be grasped with the fingers of the enthusiast's spirit, which urges me harder and more powerfully that Christ's body be eaten in the bread, because his "that," by which he wants to make bread vain, since my "that" and his "that" point to the same bread, as they confess, and yet with my "that" it says "it is my body", but with his "that" it does not say "it is not my body", but he himself must put it with it, and jumps over that which is with my "that", the faithful diligent scribe.

Now let all the world be judge between me and this spirit, which bread shall give way to the other. My bread has with it the text: "Eat, this is my body," and declares itself with expressed words that this bread is the body of Christ. The bread of the Spirit has with it the text, "Do this," or "as often as you eat the bread," and does not declare itself to be vain.

The Spirit must amend the text, and say: it is not Christ's body, as he then has commanded to do; yes, from the devil! If then one "that" is to give way to the other, let its "that" give way to mine, as it is bare and naked, without explanation, but mine has its explanation with it, or else it must sweat in another way, if it is to prove that my "that" is to give way to its "that"; with pointing fingers it is lost.

73 And if he were willing and faithful, he should not show us with his fingers how his "this" points to bread; we would probably find this without his spirit, explanation, and art; but he should first reject this text: "Eat, this is my body"; if it were rejected that bread was not preached as Christ's body, then we ourselves would know that his "this" should point to the same bread. But since he does not do this, it is petitio principii, and lost chatter, that he should not answer, since one asks and desires, as I always complain. For we say that where the first "this" points to the body of Christ, his "this" afterwards 1) must also point to it; because both "this" points to bread, and yet the first at the same time brings Christ's body, as the words read: "Eat, this is my body.

74 We do not admit him to say that where Christ says, "these things," or "these things do," it is as much as when Paul says, "As often as ye eat this bread. The Spirit says it, but he does not prove it, as is his way. For these words, "as often as ye eat this bread," 2c., speak only of eating and drinking. Now if another spirit were as quarrelsome as this spirit, he would probably want to argue that one should not take, give thanks, break, give, and bless the bread, but only eat it, as the words say, and thus grasp the bread with the mouth from the table, or bite it out of the oven. But if the words "as often as ye eat this bread" can suffer that it must be taken, broken, given thanks and blessed: Dearly beloved, they shall also suffer the other certain piece, which is the blessing, when Christ saith, This is my body. 2c. But if the same some part shall not be suffered in it; then

1) Erlanger: after and.

I also want to argue just as powerfully that, according to the letter, one should eat it alone, not take it, not break it, not bless it, not give it. For St. Paul does not say, "As often as you take this bread, break it, give thanks, or give," but only, "As often as you eat it.

Seest thou how fine a thing it is to patch and burst oneself thus with letters? And such things must then be called the Scriptures, which are contrary to our understanding. Therefore we say that Christ, by the word "these things" or "that doeth," does not command the eating of bread alone, but the whole text of the Lord's Supper, and St. Paul also, though he alone sets the letters of the eating of bread; for he certainly intended to call the eating of bread as Christ set it, and not as the swarming spirit fools, though he could not comprehend such a manner in the letter "eating of bread," but he had taught it before in many words enough.

In the fifth place, he wants to prove that our understanding is contrary to faith, and once again he has much to do to teach us how Christ died for us. For the Spirit must always teach me what I have taught so long and often, and in the meantime leap over when he should answer. For I well know, by the grace of God, that our faith is as Christ redeemed us from sins by his suffering; all this he ought not to teach us. But how our mind is against such faith in the Lord's Supper, as it throbs and boasts, I would very much like to hear; there my dear spirit is silent as a mouse, yes, it leaps over as a deer. But that he says, If one teaches that Christ's body eating bodily forgives sin, 2c. that is against faith, I answer, "I truly think so too; indeed, I have said more, namely, that Christ's body eating bodily, without spirit and faith, is poison and death. To what then does the spirit answer, or against whom does it contend? Do you also think that he is in his right mind, who wants to fight against Luther, and fights against no one?

For let it be understood that Christ's body is not eaten in the Lord's Supper because of our sin, how does it follow that his body is not eaten in the Lord's Supper, or that it is contrary to faith? If Christ therefore

I will also conclude from this art that it is against the faith that Christ is in heaven, and I will lead all the sayings of this spirit thus: St. Paul does not say that Christ went to heaven for our sin, but that he was crucified for our sin; therefore he is not in heaven, nor does he forgive sin there. Item, Paul does not say: Christ was born for our sin, nor did he live; but died: therefore he was not born, nor did he live. All the same as the Spirit here casts, Christ's body is not eaten for our sin, but died for our sin; therefore it is not to be eaten in the Lord's Supper. So let us make of Christ nothing but one who eternally suffers on the cross for our sin, lest we act contrary to faith, believing in other articles that Christ is there and forgives sin, which this Spirit alone wants to have on the cross.

The blind mad spirit does not know that meritum Christi and distributio meriti are two things, and mixes them together like an impure sow. Christ once earned forgiveness of sins on the cross and purchased it for us; but he distributes it where he is, every hour and in every place, as Lucas writes Cap. 24, 46. f. Thus it is written, that Christ suffered, and rose again the third day (there is his merit), and preached repentance and remission of sins in his name" (there is his merit); therefore we say, that in the Lord's supper there is remission of sins, not because of the food, or that Christ there merits or acquires remission of sins; but because of the word, by which he distributes such acquired remission among us, and says: "This is my body, which is given for you." Here you hear that we eat the body given for us, and hear and believe this in the meal; therefore forgiveness of sins is distributed there, which was nevertheless obtained at the cross.

79 Otherwise, I would also want to deceive, as the Spirit does, and say, "Christ has not redeemed us through our preaching; therefore it is against faith that one should receive forgiveness of sins.

sins in preaching. Where, then, should we seek them, since Christ says that the forgiveness of sins should be preached in his name? For Christ did not redeem us by faith; therefore it is contrary to faith to seek forgiveness of sins by faith. Wherefore then shall we seek it, seeing Christ saith, He that believeth shall be saved [Marc. 16:17]. Item: Christ did not save us through our baptism, therefore it is against faith whoever seeks remission of sins in baptism. Dear, why then does Paul call baptism a washing away of sins? Christ has not redeemed us through the Holy Spirit; therefore it is contrary to faith to seek forgiveness of sins from the Holy Spirit. Dear, where then? But he who is blind must see nothing. The spirit has been misled and blinded by the sacrament, therefore he does not need to know any part of the Christian doctrine. But we know that Christ died for us once, and such a death he passes on 1) through preaching, baptizing, the Spirit, reading, believing, eating, and as he pleases, where he is and what he does.

80 I have so diligently written in the next booklet how our Lord's Supper has two parts, namely, word and food, and how the word demands faith and spiritual food, besides the bodily, and I have asked them to prove how it is contrary to faith. The spirit is still allowed to shout out these lies so often in all books, that I do not teach spiritual food nor faith, but only bodily food. Read my booklet, and you will have to say that this spirit is a false, lying spirit, who blames me for teaching forgiveness of sins only through the bodily eating of the body of Christ, if he knows and has read otherwise. For he alone seeks to chat with such lies, that he only need not answer, as our understanding is contrary to faith. Well, with such tricks they will not take away our understanding, but rather strengthen us, because they attack us with public lies. For we do not believe that Christian faith and public lies are one thing.

1) In the old editions: "he hands out."

(81) In the same way, I have written diligently against the heavenly prophets, how the history and custom of Christ's suffering is not one thing, factum et applicatio facti, seu factum et usus facti. For Christ's suffering happened only once on the cross; but to whom would this be useful, if it were not divided up, applied and brought into 2) use? But how should it come into use and be distributed without Word and Sacrament? But why should such high spirits read my little books? They know better. Well then, they also have this to reward them, that they consider factum et usum to be one, and make fools and disgraces of themselves about it; they do not see that in the Lord's Supper usus passionis et non factum passionis is acted upon. It serves them right who read nothing, or read beyond what is written against them, with great arrogance and certainty.

The impotent spirit should prove that Christ's body is not in the Lord's Supper; he leaves that pending 3) and proves that we are not redeemed by eating his body, but by his suffering. Who would know such a new art if the Spirit did not produce it now? It is the Spirit's way, he must spit out other things, because one asks, and always teach us what we know, so that he does not have to prove what he has done and is guilty of, but so that he always strengthens us the more, as a spirit fleeing from the field, which must not go right under the eyes of its opposite. We know well that Christ did not redeem us by our food, and no one has ever heard it otherwise from us; but that it should follow from this that there is only bread in the Lord's Supper, we would be eager to hear that, and would praise the Spirit if he proved it.

That he is also angry when we warn that one should not ask how it is that Christ's body is in the Lord's Supper, but should believe the words of God, which we have not done to the simple (for they must not), but to the arrogant, and even to the enthusiasts themselves. But as they will, let them search and rise; only that they may do enough for their glory, and prove how our understanding is contrary to faith;

Which they will do on the day of the devil's ascension. But "I leave the world and go to the Father"; item, Joh. 17, 11: we can see that they become public liars above their "I am no longer in the world, but they are in the world", and research and dispute what they themselves invent and no what is more of the sayings, since Christ is preached to be one teaches. It is to be noted that they rise too high and in heaven. Well, this we also believe and say, and would get the spirit of deceit, that they finally take quod pro have been no need to teach us. But this would be needless qualiter; item, mix factum unb usum into each other, like to teach, that because Christ is in heaven, his body cannot be in the Lord's Supper. If they were to prove this the right sow cooks, in addition to which they are divided among themselves and become uncertain in all their ways, and always fall from one error into the other without stopping. Such shall be the reward of those who do not believe God's word, but seek it out. were contrary to our understanding. Now we are always taught with much verbiage that we know, and masterfully silent that we demand; therefore we must remain on our understanding.

In the sixth place, he wants to prove how the Scriptures are also against our understanding. The first is this very saying: "This is my body, which was given for you. Now it is not true that his body is as it was given for us, for it is visibly given for us. To this is answered above, how the Spirit makes of quod quale, vitiosissimo syllogismo, in quo quatuor termini, nullum dici de omni, nulla praedicatio in quid aut distributio, and much other vitia, as the Logici well know that sub termino substantiali non potest subsumi accidentalis. Such, however, is called Scripture and God's word in this spirit.

In other words, we do not say that in the Lord's Supper Christ's body is given to us in the same form or shape (for who would say that?), but that it is the same body that is given to us, not in the same form or shape, but in the same essence and nature. Now the same being can be visible here and invisible there. Oh, it is the work of fools! They do not want to answer us, but they only want to talk and boast uselessly.

86) Item, it should be against the text: "As often as you eat the bread" 2c.; because here "this" points to bread, so should it there, "this is my body", point to the same bread 2c. Answer: it does not have to do anything everywhere, nor is such a must proven; but above we have proven the contradiction that both "this" points to bread, which is Christ's body, and neither to vain common bread.

Item, Marci 16, 19.: "The Lord is taken up to heaven"; item [Joh. 16, 28.]:

(87) And what is meant by "being in the world" is explained by Christ Himself in Luc. 24:44, when He says: "These are the words that I spoke to you while I was still with you. How? Is he not with them? and yet eats with them after his resurrection? But certainly he is no longer with them, as he was with them before, mortal, and who had to need this life in the world, as Paul 1 Cor. 15, 44. speaks of the natural and spiritual man. But from this it cannot be proved that he therefore should not be there in the flesh. For, as it is said, he sat and ate and talked with them, and yet is not in the world. So also: "You always have the poor with you, but you do not always have me with you. What is meant by "with you" is given by the text itself, and is well to be reckoned, namely, as the poor are with us, so he is not with us. And so henceforth, 1) what they of the Proverbs more bring forward, is soon said: Christ is not with us, as the poor, mortal and worldly.

(88) Therefore, they cannot yet say that our understanding is contrary to Scripture, but it is to use Zwingel's logic, substantiam pro accidente, quod pro qualiter; as if I said, Christ is not in some form in the Lord's Supper, therefore he is not bodily in it. Christ is not with us in some form, therefore he is not with us in all things, fresh a particulari ad universale.

1) In the punctuation, we have followed Zwingli's counter-writing, which there in § 152 crtit this passage. In the editions, the words "und so fortan" are added to the previous one and followed by a period.

The sheriff is not in the bath with red pants, therefore he is not in the bath. The king does not sit crowned over tables, therefore he does not sit over tables. This is children's play and jiggery-pokery, as the schools well know; but with the spirits such must be Scripture and Christian faith.

(89) And if they stand on these sayings, that Christ is no longer with us, they must also conclude that Christ is not with us spiritually either; for the words stand dry: "I am no longer with you" [John 16:4, 12:8, 17:11], which means that he is not with us at all. Yes, they say, we have clear sayings against him being with us spiritually, such as John 14:23: "We will make our abode with him"; and Paul Eph. 3:17: "Christ dwells in your hearts" 2c. Answer: Dear, can they find such sayings against those: how can they not find the text in the Lord's Supper against the same? If Christ can be with them in some ways, so that the text does not hinder them, "I am not with you"; he can also be with us in the Lord's Supper, so that the same text does not hinder us, "I am not with you"; but if such a text does not overthrow their sayings about the spiritual nature of Christ, it does not overthrow our text in the Lord's Supper about the invisible nature either.

90 Thus their objection is as strong against them as it is against us, and by their working themselves loose, they make us loose also, and our mind remains firm, "This is my body. For if they prove many things with their sayings, they prove that Christ in the Lord's Supper is not visible, mortal, and worldly; which is not at all necessary to prove, for we confess all these things. But that which they should prove, namely, that our understanding is false, and that Christ lies when he says, "This is my body," no one wants to come to that, they are vain, fleeting, fluttering spirits; meanwhile they cheat a lot of good paper with useless, futile words, and fool the poor, simple Christian.

91) What he then says about the Passover, since Paul calls 1 Cor. 5, 7 Christ a Passover, and wants to conclude from this: just as Christ in that place is not the natural Passover, but per tropum a new Passover; thus

Even in these words, "This is my body," a tropus, nothing is said. For it is known beforehand from himself that it does not follow whether there is a tropus in a place, that therefore there is also a tropus here; but one should prove such a consequence, and we have written enough about the tropis above. It is all to be done to the mind, that it may only write a book, and court its own, that it may not answer what it ought and owes, and yet have a standing as if it answered. He is to prove that our understanding is contrary to the Scriptures; so he teaches us that Christ is Passover, that is, he is a transgression. Let them speak and do as they will, for this does not answer how our understanding is contrary to the Scriptures.

(92) After this the Spirit is very wroth, because I have mocked their preaching so cheerfully, and reproacheth me evil. But to rebuke and to be angry, or to rage, is not scripture with us, which is against our understanding. But he that cannot answer, rageth and rageth justly, as that mother taught her child: Dear child, if thou canst not win, bear grudges. I have thrown the shillelagh among the dogs, and by the shouting I know which one I have hit.

It reminds me of the spirit, as if a mad man had a crossbow, and took the winds with great shouting and being, and stretched the crossbow, threatened with excellent words to split the iron nail in the blade 1) and did not put an arrow on it because of great haste and joy, and thus pressed it, and when he heard the string click, threw the crossbow around, and said: There it is, the nail is broken. And when the others laughed and said that there was no arrow, he peeled it so that they would not consider it an arrow. This spirit does the same: with great splendor he pretends to answer and to hit, and always forgets the arrows, so that he does not even answer correctly. But nevertheless he likes the rattling of the mouth, and wants to think that it was an arrow, and has shot the nail in the leaf. But we are used to such foolish shots; even if they put an arrow on the crossbow, we still want to be sure that they will be shot before the arrow hits the nail.

1) Leaf - the disc. The "nail" the Centrum.

into the ashes, or shoot three cubits over the rampart before they hit us.

94. as when they say the words of St. Paul, Col. 3:1, 2: "If ye be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ is, sitting at the right hand of God; be mindful of those things which are above, and not of those things which are on earth. There, there, you carnivores and blood drinkers, hear that Christ's body is not to be sought in the Sacrament; for the Sacrament is on earth, so Christ is above at the right hand of God.

Here it is not necessary for the Spirit to show us what St. Paul means by "on earth," since the power lies in this saying; but rushes over, plops down, as their conceited spirit drives them. If I now say, Why then do they go to the preaching and seek the gospel? Item, why do they keep the Lord's Supper? Why do they love and do good to their neighbor? Father, mother, master, servant, and our neighbor are all on earth; so let us not seek them, honor, obey, serve, or love anyone. Is it not fine? Is not all this on earth? And St. Paul says, "Do not seek what is on earth. Truly the apostles did all wrong in following Christ, for he was on earth, and Christ himself comes on earth, even Paul himself preaches and visits Christians now and then on earth. What do you think? Have they not strained the saying?

But now we are used to the devil, that he only mocks us, and out of great arrogance does not esteem us worthy to whom he should answer, as otherwise he can get enough disciples with useless mocking. So we accept his mockery again, and offer him defiance against it, that he overthrows our understanding with mockery, and let it be a strength of our faith, because he can muster nothing against us but his melancholy, impotent mockery.

97 St. Paul calls "on earth" the earthly life, as the world lives, in fornication and all kinds of immorality. For he speaks of the killing of the old Adam, as his words stand there, and brightly read: "Have you died with Christ" [Col. 3, 1]. And afterwards v. 5: "Mortify therefore your members which are of the earth, fornication, uncleanness, unchastity, covetousness" 2c.

There we hear that he is called "on earth" an earthly, old life after the old Adam, as one lives in the world without the Spirit of God. For this is how the old Adam lives; we should not seek this, (says St. Paul), for we, having died to the world and earthly life with Christ, should henceforth live heavenly in Christ.

98 Therefore we cheerfully say that our Sacrament is not on earth, nor do we seek it on earth. But if the devil shall prove that we hold our sacrament and the body of Christ to be fornication, covetousness, hatred, and vain iniquity, let us confess that we do wrong in seeking Christ on earth. But if he does not do this, we say that he is lying in his infernal mouth, and blasphemes St. Paul for this, so that he is called Christ's body on earth when he is in the sacrament. For that is not what St. Paul is called to be on earth, as we have heard. But there you have the enthusiasts, how finely they regard the Scriptures, and who is the Spirit that speaks through them. For the devil knows well what St. Paul means "on earth", and yet he drives his blinded enthusiasts to call Christ's body in the Sacrament "on earth". With such reasons they shall confirm their Lord's Supper, and overthrow ours.

99 The devil also makes such a mockery with the saying of Paul 2 Cor. 5:16, 17: "We no longer know Christ according to the flesh, and in Christ is the new creature. Such sayings must always conclude as much: Christ's body is not in the Lord's Supper. Well, we like to be mocked, let us see what the devil gains from it. The spirit of the swarm should indicate here what St. Paul means by the word: "According to the flesh"; since the whole power also lies with him. Yes, says the devil, I do not look at you, it is enough how my disciples lead, one must accept it. Well then, let us be so humble as to denounce the same.

St. Paul also speaks there of the death of the old Adam and wants to say that we should no longer live according to the flesh, but a new creature in Christ. Hear for yourself his words: "We consider," he says, "that if one died for all, they all died." 2c. [2 Cor. 5, 14.] What can

How can this be otherwise, for as he says in the next verse, Col. 3, 3: "We died with Christ"; and Rom. 6, 6: "Our old man was crucified with Christ"? And here it follows, "And therefore died for all, that they which live should not live 1) unto themselves, but unto him which died for them, and rose again" [2 Cor. 5:15]. What is this but that we should live anew in Christ?

101. follows v. 16: "Therefore from now on we know no one according to the flesh." Here let Paulum and the enthusiast speak to each other. The enthusiast says: "To know according to the flesh" is to respect something bodily present, or to be present for someone with his body, as Christ is in the sacrament; and such is wrong, and Paul denies it. Dear, why does Paul know his Corinthians live bodily before him? Why does he know his own body? Item: Why do the swarms know their companions bodily before them? Why do they know their bodily supper? Is it not all a bodily thing, and present according to the flesh? Now here St. Paul forbids to know after the flesh. But can they know their things according to the flesh, so that St. Paul must not be against them? Dear, why then should he be against us, that we know Christ bodily in the sacrament? But let the scoffer mock: he that mocketh another best, let him be master.

In this place St. Paul means "according to the flesh", which is carnal or fleshly, and not according to the spirit or spiritual, as he says in 2 Cor. 10, 3: "Though we walk in the flesh, we do not contend according to the flesh", that is, not in a carnal way. Secundum carnem non significat in carne, sicut somniant; sed more adverbii significat: camaliter, vel studio et affectu carnis, vel quomodo caro facit. "In the flesh" and "according to the flesh" is far from each other. Paul, Gal. 2, 20, lived "in the flesh", but not according to the flesh, but "in the faith of Christ". For Rom. 8, 6. 13. he calls "living according to the flesh" death, since he says: "If you live according to the flesh, you will die."

Therefore the text forcibly compels St. Paul that this is his opinion: "Because we have all died to the world and the flesh with Christ, we should no longer live or think according to the flesh, and thus know no one carnally, but only spiritually. For to know another carnally is to know him no further than flesh can; now flesh can do no more than seek its own in everyone, hating, envying, and doing all evil to the enemy, but seeking pleasure, favor, enjoyment, and friendship in everyone, for its profit 2c. In this way the world knows one another. But we Christians know no one in this way, for "we are one new creature in Christ" [2 Cor. 5:17] and know one another according to the Spirit, that is, each seeks not his own, but what is another's, for his own good; as he also teaches in Rom. 14 and Phil. 2:4.

104. "And though we had known Christ in the flesh, (saith he [2 Cor. 5:16]) yet now know we him no more." It is well to understand that he does not mean Christ personally in the flesh (as the spirit deceives); for Christ remains in the flesh forever, and all the angels in it must know him forever. But as we know our brethren spiritually, and no more carnally; so we know Christ much less carnally. But before, when we were holy in Judaism and in the works of the law (to which the false apostles are now drifting again), we knew nothing of Christ spiritually, but sought vainly carnally: "For we hoped that he should redeem Israel," Luc. 24:21, and look upon our holiness, and make us glorious according to the flesh. This, of course, was knowing Christ according to the flesh, and a right carnal mind. But all this has now passed away and died with him, and we no longer know him in this way, for all these things have passed away, and we are like new creatures in Christ. Paul himself will give you this understanding, just read and look at the text properly.

All who look at Christ in the flesh and know Him must be offended at Him, as happened to the Jews. For since flesh and blood thinks no further than to see and feel, and to see that Christ is a mortal man, it is not possible for them to know him.

1) "Hinsort" is missing in the Erlanger.

When a man is crucified, he must say: This is finished, there is neither life nor salvation, he is gone, no one can help him, he himself is lost. But he that shall not be offended in him must pass over the flesh, and be raised up by the word, that he may know in the spirit how Christ is made alive and glorious by his very suffering and death. And whoever does and can do this rightly is a new creature in Christ, endowed with new spiritual knowledge. Just as even now all are offended at Christ, when they look upon his supper in the flesh, as the devotees know it, and they themselves are (which they owe to us), who know Christ according to the flesh; for the flesh can neither say nor know any more than, here is bread and wine, therefore it must be offended at Christ, when he says, "This is my body," for it is an old creature in Adam. If it is not to be offended, it must go over such flesh and believe the words, "This is my body," and then it will understand that such bread is not bad bread, but the true body of Christ.

I am disturbed that the devil makes such a mockery of God's words, but it grieves me that the poor people should not see how they lay such loose thoughts at the foundation of their arrogance. They boast about how they have learned nothing from us, but they really should not, their writings show it all too much, if they were silent about the boasting, and we would be sorry that they should learn such things from us. And this is their way of interpreting the Scriptures and preaching in Zurich, Basel and Strasbourg, and where they teach, it would be desirable that they were still papal; for the same are now almost convinced throughout the world that they teach wrongly. Lord God, whom such public error and wrong understanding of St. Paul does not frighten nor move against these enthusiasts, what shall move him?

107 And as for the rest of the proverbs which they introduce, where Christ is preached that he has left the world, gone to the Father, ascended into heaven, and is seated at the right hand of God, 2c., they do not answer anything, except that they teach us what we have long known, so that we may not notice how they leap over when they are to answer. But that they should teach and prove that therefore our mind is wrong and these words of Christ "this is my body" are false. They say that it is contrary to one another that Christ is the body in heaven and in the Lord's Supper, but they do not prove it. Therefore we say it is not contrary to one another, because Scripture says it both ways, and our no is as strong as their yes; for we cannot deny the bright clear words for the sake of their bare, naked, bad yes. It has been known longer than a thousand years ago that Christ ascended into heaven, without all the teaching of this new spirit; nor has it therefore been denied that Christ's body in the Lord's Supper or Christ's word are true. Now if this Spirit were lacking, he ought to show us and teach us; but this will not come out.

(108) But I will tell you the truth, dear friends: If the Spirit is in earnest, and does not wilfully deny that our understanding is contrary to the Scriptures, then I will have lost all my things. I will prove it thus: First, the Spirit allowed Christ to give his body to be eaten in the first supper, since he makes the word of the cup in the supper, as has been sufficiently heard. Tell me, then, how can he seriously say here that it is contrary to Scripture and false, when he himself confesses above that it is right and was done once? For if he were in earnest, he would also attack it in the first supper with scriptures, and not make a word in it, which he does not do, but lets our understanding remain. If then our understanding remains in the first supper, there can be neither interpretation nor signification in the words, but as they stand and read, so they interpret, and so all their tempest and raving is in vain, that they seek interpretation.

109 Secondly, no one can deny that Christ took the first supper while he was in the world, before he went to the Father. Tell me, then, how can the Spirit seriously say that the sayings which speak of Christ's going to the Father contradict the text of the Lord's Supper? For he must confess that none of these sayings has yet been fulfilled, and that Christ did not sit up in heaven. When Christ comes down from heaven after the Ascension

If the Lord's Supper had been instituted, then the false prophets would have their appearance; but now Christ acts as if he should say: "There will be false prophets who pretend that my Lord's Supper is contrary to the sayings, who say of me how I am going to the Father and am no longer in the world. For this reason I will come before them and institute my supper, because I am still in the world and on earth, so that before they know it they will be taken as public liars in their own words, and you, little children, will be strengthened in the right faith.

How will they stand here? They must abandon all such sayings as they have hitherto so valiantly defied, and as public liars confess that because Christ is not in heaven when he takes supper, such sayings may not have moved them in earnest to deny that Christ's body is in supper, but are deceived by the devil into thinking that they saw what they did not see; for sayings do nothing to prove that Christ's body is in supper or not, any more than these sayings do: Jesus was born in Bethlehem, and fled into Egypt.

But I will give them good advice, they must now think of other scriptures, namely this one: In the evening Jesus sat down at table with the twelve, and what is more of those who speak of sitting at table. From which they must conclude: The Scripture says: Christ sits above tables, therefore he cannot be in bread. If they say this, then it is enough, and it is not necessary that they also prove to us how it is against such Scripture, as they also do with the previous sayings. For what the Spirit saith is right, wheresoever he listeth. But we will answer, Too slow, dear spirit, too slow; for these writings of sitting over tables have not moved thee hitherto to thy error, neither hast thou ever thought, hold thy peace, that they should move thee. Since these have never moved you, and those have not been able to move you in earnest, tell me what has moved you? Dear spirit, seize us also so on public lies, so we want to have lost.

112 But whether they speak: If equal the

If the first supper is not contrary to the scriptures we have heard, then the other suppers after the ascension are. I answer, I do not inquire now; it is enough for me this time that I have received the first supper, which cannot be contrary to the sayings of the ascension of Christ, and the Spirit has been publicly absent. For now that I have this, that the sayings of the ascension of Christ cannot induce anyone to deny the first supper according to our understanding, let us also receive the other suppers. For who will believe the enthusiasts that the sayings of the ascension of Christ seriously move them against the Lord's Supper after the ascension, if they are overcome, that they are not moved by them against the Lord's Supper before the ascension? If Christ's body can sit over tables and still be in the bread, he can also be in heaven and where he wants to be, and still be in the bread; there is no difference between being far or near the table and being in the bread at the same time. Well, that is publicly found to be lying; but they will not yet give way, or confess their error, that they honor the truth for God's sake.

Let this be enough, that our understanding is not contrary to Scripture or to faith, as the mad spirit is in control of itself. Then he comes to the two main points which I have attacked most severely, namely: that Christ is at the right hand of God, and flesh is of no use 2c. There he should prove how the two pieces could not suffer Christ's body to be in the Lord's Supper, as I had drawn it with large letters, so that they would not jump over it. So the dear spirit comes here, and brings his figure Allöosis, by which he wants to make everything bad, teaches us how in the Scriptures one nature is taken for the other in Christ, until he falls into the abyss, and smuggles that this saying, "the Word became flesh", John 1:14, must not be understood as it reads, but thus: the flesh became Word, or man became God 2c. This is how one should take the scripture in the mouth.

I cannot attack all the errors of the spirit this time. But this I say, whoever wants to be warned, let him beware.

from the Zwingel, and avoid his books, as the infernal Satan's poison, because man is completely wrong, and has lost Christ purely from. The other sacramentals remain on one error; this one does not produce a book, it pours out new errors, the longer the more. But he who will not be warned, let him go so far as to know that I have warned him, and he is excused.

(115) Thou shalt not believe nor suppose that the trope of allosis is in such sayings, or that one nature is taken for another in Christ. The nonsensical spirit invents such things, that he may also rob us of Christ; for he proves it not to thee, neither can he prove it to thee. And even if such an error of his were true and right, it still does not prove that Christ's body cannot be in the Lord's Supper. For I have insisted that they should show reason why these words would be false, "this is my body," as they read, even though Christ is in heaven, because God's image is not conscious to us, and he may well find a way that both are true, namely, Christ in heaven and his body in the Lord's Supper. That was the most noble question, I demanded, so I wrote big letters to show how the two were against each other. Then he is silent, 1) he does not remember it with a letter, as if it did not concern him, and in the meantime he is talking about his allöosi.

For the reason that I have shown how Christ's body is everywhere, because God's right hand is everywhere, I have done this (as I have publicly stated there), so that I might indicate a certain way in which God might enable Christ to be in heaven and his body in the Lord's Supper at the same time, reserving to his divine wisdom and power more ways by which he might accomplish these things, since we do not know the end or the measure of his power.

(117) Now if they would or could have answered, they should have proved to us constantly how God neither knows nor is able to know any way that Christ is in heaven and at-

like his body in the Lord's Supper; there lies the knot, there they jump, the good fellows. For they should not teach us the visible way, that heaven is high above according to the eyes, and that the Lord's Supper is here on earth; we know it well ourselves, that to reckon according to the eyes cannot be here above what is here, and again; for that is a human, visible way. But God's word and works are not according to the sight of our eyes, but are incomprehensible to all reason, even to the angels. So also Christ is neither in heaven nor in the Lord's Supper in a visible way, and as the eyes of flesh judge something to be here and there.

118 And of course it is an impotent spirit that judges God's word and work according to the eyes, for in such a way even God Himself is not, wherever He is, be He at all ends, or at some ends. Dear, why then does the spirit attach itself to the certain way indicated by me? First, because he was afraid that his belly would burst with great art. Secondly, so that he would deceive the simple, so that they would not see how he would jump over when he was supposed to answer, and so start another game, so that he would pull us off course, so that we would forget the thing that frightens him. If I now argue with them about the same of my indicated way, then they would have won game. Why? Because that would give them cause not to answer the right knot that presses them, and at the same time to write book after book, spouting their useless chatter into the world; for they think that spouting a lot and writing useless books is right answering, and they deceive the poor people.

119) Therefore you should protect yourself against them, if they constantly prove to you that divine power and wisdom is no further than our eyes are, and no more capable than we can see and judge bodily with our eyes, and grope with our fingers, then you should keep it with them; so I also want to believe that God no longer knows a way like Christ in heaven at the same time, and that his body be in the Lord's Supper. Urge and demand this of them; they are obliged to do it, and their doctrine may not stand before they have made this clear and certain, for their doctrine stands on it.

The devil feels well that he cannot do it, therefore he rumbles with useless chatter that we should not push him there, and in the meantime he spends art that no one desires. For if he could overthrow the way I have indicated (which he cannot do), he would still have accomplished nothing, because it would still not prove that the two are opposed to each other: Christ in heaven and his body in bread. He must prove that not only the same way is impossible, but also that God Himself no longer knows or is able to do any other way, as I also demanded in the previous book. Since he does not do this, we say: God is almighty, able to do more than we see; therefore I believe his words as they read. Behold, then, the spirit stands, and has entrusted himself with all his art.

121 For to all his useless spouting, which he does against my indicated way, I answer with a single word, that is, no. For he brings his all-eosiness, which no one confesses to him in the article; and it needs to be proven just as much as his entire doctrine of lies. But if he proved it, then one could answer him further. So my indicated way (for the sake of his Allöosi) still stands out from all the others; for that he says it is Allöosis, one does not give a damn, he would like to say that it is Ironia or another trope. It does not apply so Troppens or Troppeln in the scripture, one must prove the Tropos first that they are there, before one argues with it. Ah, it is as I said, the devil is struck that he cannot answer, therefore he wanders about with vain words. Praise and thanks be to God, who knows how to equip us so well against the devil.

But you, dear brother, should keep this instead of the allöosi: because JEsus Christ is truly God and man, in One Person, let no nature be taken for another in any place of Scripture; for that is called Allöosin, when something is said of the deity of Christ, which nevertheless belongs to mankind, or again; as, Luc. 24, 26.: "Did not Christ have to suffer, and thus go to 1) his glory?" Here he gules that Christ is taken for human nature. Beware, beware, I say, of the Allöosi, it is the devil's larva; for it finally brings about such a Christ, after which I would not gladly be a Christian, namely, that Christ henceforth be no more, nor do with his suffering and life, than another bad saint. For if I believe that human nature alone has suffered for me, then Christ is a bad savior to me, so he himself needs a savior. Summa, it is unspeakable what the devil seeks with the Allöosi.

This piece is a higher article, and should be in a special book, and does not belong in this matter. But recently, let a simple Christian be satisfied with the fact that the Holy Spirit knows how to teach us how we should speak, and must not be a fool or a foolish man. 2) And thus says the Holy Spirit Jn. 3:16: "God so loves the world, that He gave His only Son"; Rom. 8:32: "He did not spare His own Son, but gave Him for us all." And so henceforth, all works, words, sufferings, and what Christ does, does, works, speaks, suffers, the true Son of God, and is rightly spoken: Son of God died for us, Son of God preaches on earth, Son of God 4) washes the disciples' feet, as the epistle, Heb. 6, 6. says: "They crucify to them even the Son of God." 1 Cor. 2, 8. "If they had known, they would never have crucified the LORD of glory."

124) If the old weather-maker, Mrs. Reason, the grandmother of Allöosis, would say: Yes, the Godhead cannot suffer nor die, you shall answer: That is true; but nevertheless, because Godhead and mankind in Christ are not the same, you shall say: Yes, the Godhead cannot suffer nor die.

1) Erlanger: in.

2) Toppeler - cheating dice players.

3) Wittenberger: "has loved" and "gave".

4) Here the words are missing in the Erlanger edition: "died for us, GOD's Son preaches on earth, GOD's Son".

One person is, so the scripture, for the sake of such personal unity, also gives to the Godhead everything that happens to mankind, and again. And is also thus in truth. For this you must say, the person (show 1) Christ) suffers, dies; now the person is truly God; therefore it is rightly said: The Son of God suffers; for although the one part (that I speak thus), as the Godhead, does not suffer, nevertheless the person, who is God, suffers in the other part, as in humanity.

(125) Just as one says, "The king's son is sore," yet his leg alone is sore. Solomon is wise, yet his soul alone is wise. Absalom is beautiful, yet his body alone is beautiful. Peter is gray, yet his head alone is gray. Because body and soul are one person, everything that happens to the body or soul, even to the smallest member of the body, is rightly and well done to the whole person. This is the way of speaking in all the world, not only in the Scriptures, and is also the truth; for in truth the Son of God is crucified for us, that is, the person who is God, for he is, he (I say), the person, crucified according to mankind.

(126) Thus, what happens to the other part of the person is to be appropriated to the whole person, for the sake of both being one person. Thus speak all the old teachers, all the new theologians, all language and all Scripture. But the cursed allosis turns such things upside down, and wants to change, and to appropriate to the pieces, that which is assigned to the whole person in the Scriptures, makes its own tropos, to turn the Scriptures upside down, and to separate the person of Christ, as it also does with the "is", only that it teaches something new and brings its foolish thoughts also to the sun.

And because he likes to trope so much, why doesn't he stick to the old trope, which the 2) Scripture and all teachers have used here so far? Namely, synecdoche, as, Christ died, after mankind 2c., but that would have been nothing new, and was no glory to hunt in it, would not have liked either.

bring new error. That is why Allöosis had to come forth and teach us that one nature would be taken for the other. As if the apostles had been mad and foolish, that they could not have spoken of the Godhead, they had to call it mankind, and again. If John had wanted to consider 3) Allöosin, he could also have said: The flesh became word, since he said: 4) "The word became flesh."

But is this not a sacrilegious spirit, which so foolhardily goes forth, and makes us allöosin at these oerterns? Who ordered him to do it? How does he prove that Allöosis is here? No, that is not necessary, but is enough when he says: I Zwingel say that here is Allöosis; therefore it is so; because I was yesterday in the bosom of the Godhead, and now I come from heaven, therefore one must believe me. He should prove beforehand that here is Allöosis; he leaves that and accepts it as if he had fought for it a thousand years ago, and there is no one who may doubt it; but it is much more necessary to prove that here is Allöosis than that which he wants to confirm with it. That is from the Zwingelian Logica, incertum per incertius, ignotum per ignotius probare; O beautiful art, which even children should throw out with dirt.

If this is true, that he may troll and play with figures of his will, and what he says must be right, what wonder is it if he makes a Belial out of Christ in the end? Who may say everything he likes (and does not have to show reason), dear, what shall he not conclude? It is not different, because as I lament, the spirit boasts scripture to smear the people's mouth, and yet leads vain own dreams and his great conceit against the scripture. But we condemn and curse the Allöosin in this place to hell, as the devil's own input, and want to see how he wants to confirm it; because Scripture and good reason we want to have, not his own snot and slobber.

not true. We do not say that Godhead is humanity, or a way that it can be and therefore is, until the enthusiasts divine nature is human nature, which would be nature prove otherwise.

mixed into one being. But we mix the two different natures For if the allosis existed, that one nature should be into one person, and say: God is man, and man is God. taken for another, this would only concern the works or But we cry out again against them, that they divide the transactions of the natures, and not the essence of the person of Christ, as if it were two persons. For where the natures. For although in the works, when one says: "Christ allosis is to exist, as it leads Zwingel, Christ will have to preach, drinks, prays, dies" [Christ] may be taken for the be two persons, one divine and one human, because he human nature, it cannot be so in the essence, when one shows the sayings of suffering to the human nature alone says: God is man, or man is God. Here there can be no and turns all things from the Godhead; For where the allöosis, yes, also no synecdoche or some trope; for there works are divided and separated, the person must also God must be taken for God, man for man. Now, when I be divided, because all works or sufferings are not wrote that Christ's body was everywhere, I did not speak assigned to natures, but to persons; for it is the person of the works of natures, but of the essence of natures. who does and suffers all things, one according to this Therefore, neither alloesis nor synecdoche can overthrow such things for me; for essence is essence, each for itself, nature, the other according to that nature, as all this is well known to the learned. Therefore we hold our Lord none for the other; and whoever wants to overthrow it for Christ to be God and man in one person, non me must not bring alloesis, synecdoche or tröpos, they confundendo naturas, nec dividendo personam, so that accomplish nothing here, but he must overthrow my we do not mix the natures, nor separate the person. reasons, on which I stand in the piece.

Now this is enough of an accidental thing, for it serves a piece, are these. The first is this article of our faith: Jesus Christ is essentially, naturally, truly, completely God and man in One Person, undivided and undivided. The other, that God's right hand is everywhere. The third, that God's word is not false or lies. The fourth, that God has and knows many ways of being in one place, and not only the few that the philosophers call localem. For the nothing here without the spirit being so full of error that it seeks cause everywhere to abuse the simple, and in the meantime drives the right thing out of its place. We stand on this, because the righteous spirit will not nor can prove that the two are against each other: Christ is in heaven, and his body is in the Lord's Supper, so let the words "this is my body" remain to us as they are; for one letter in it is more certain and better to us than all the books of all the Sophists speak of this rightly, since they say: There are gossips, even if they wrote the world full of books. three ways to be in one place, localiter or circumscriptive, 132 Item, because they do not prove that God's right definitive, reple- tive, which I will thus translate for the hand is a special place in heaven, my indicated way also sake of easier understanding.

still remains firm that Christ's body is everywhere, First, a thing in a place is circumscriptive or localiter, because he is at the right hand of God, which is apprehensible, that is, when the place and the body within everywhere, although we do not know how that happens; rhyme, meet and measure with each other evenly, just as because we also do not know how it happens that God's in the barrel is the wine or the water, since the wine no right hand is everywhere. Of course, it is not the way we longer takes up space, nor does it take up room. see a thing with our eyes, as the devotees look at the sacrament; but God has certainly the barrel gives more space than so much of the wine is; thus a wood or tree in the water does not take more space, nor does the water give more than so much of the tree is inside. So a man, walking in the air, does not take more space from the air around him, nor does the air give more, than so great the man is. In this way, place and body measure themselves off against each other from piece to piece, just as a pitcher measures, feels and grasps the pots in his form.

Secondly, a thing in a place is definite, incomprehensible, if the thing or body is not tangible in a place, and does not measure itself according to the space of the place where it is, but can occupy about much space, about little space. So, they say, the angels and spirits are in places or locations; for thus an angel or devil can be in a whole house or city; again, he can be in a chamber, chest or box, yes, in a nutshell. The place is corporeal and comprehensible and has its dimensions, according to length, width and thickness; but that which is inside does not have the same length, width or thickness as the place in which it is, indeed, it has no length or width at all. Thus we read in the Gospel that the devil possesses men and drives into them, and also drives into the swine. Yes, 1) Marci 5. says that a whole legion was in one man, that was about six thousand devils. This I call incomprehensible in one place; for we cannot comprehend it nor measure it, as we measure the bodies, and yet it is nevertheless in the place.

137) In this way was the body of Christ, when it came out of the closed tomb and came to the disciples through the closed door, as the Gospels show; for there is no measuring nor understanding in which place its head or feet were, when it passed through the stones, and yet had to pass through; it took no space, so the stone gave it no space, but the stone remained stone, whole and solid, as before, and its body also remained as large and thick as it was before. Besides, it could also be seen in places, as it wanted, because it took space from the place and could be measured.

In the same way, Christ is and can be in the bread, although he can also show himself understandably and visibly wherever he wants. For as the sealed stone and the closed door remained unchanged and unchanged, and yet his body was at the same time in the place where the stone and the wood were: so also he is in the sacrament at the same time, where there is bread and wine, and yet bread and wine for themselves remain unchanged and unchanged.

Thirdly, a thing in places is repletive, supernatural, that is, when something is at the same time completely in all places and fills all places, and yet is not measured and comprehended from any place, according to the space of the place where it is. This way is attributed to God alone, as he says in the prophet Jeremiah 23:23: "I am a God from near, and not from far; for heaven and earth I fill" 2c. This way is beyond all measure, beyond our reason incomprehensible, and must be kept in the Word by faith alone.

139) I have told all these things for this reason, that it may be seen that there are more ways of being a thing 2) than the one, comprehensible, bodily way, on which the scribblers stand, and it is enforced by the Scriptures, that Christ's body must not be solely comprehensible or bodily in a place, where it takes up and gives place according to its greatness; for it was in the stone of the tomb without such a comprehensible way, likewise in a closed door, as they cannot deny. If then he could be there without room and place according to his greatness, why should he not also be in bread without room and place according to his greatness? But if he is in this incomprehensible way, then he is outside the bodily creature, and is not grasped nor measured in it. But who can know how this happens? Who can prove that it is wrong for a man to say and hold that, because he is apart from the creature, he is indeed where he wants all creatures to be, as continuous and present to him as another body is to its bodily place or location?

2) etwo == somewhere. The Wittenbergers and the Jenaers offer: about.

1) "Yes" is missing in the Jena.

See our bodily eyes and faces. When we open our eyes, our vision is present in an instant for five or six miles, and at the same time in all the places that are within those six miles, and yet it is only one vision, one eye. Can a bodily vision do this, don't you think that God's power can also find a way that all creatures are also present and pass through Christ's body? Yes, you say, so you do not prove that it is so? Thanks be to you, but I prove so much with it, that the scribes also cannot overthrow nor prove that such a thing is impossible to divine power, which they nevertheless must and should prove. They should prove that God knows no way in which Christ's body can be other than bodily and comprehensible. If they do not do this, their teachings are disgraced; now they can never do it.

Since we prove from Scripture that Christ's body can be in more ways than this bodily way, we have thus sufficiently established that the words "this is my body" should be believed, because it is not contrary to any article of faith, and is also in accordance with Scripture, as when Christ's body was led through a sealed stone and a closed door. For since we can indicate a way above the bodily, comprehensible way, who would be so bold as to measure and encompass God's power, as not to know other more ways? And yet, the enthusiasts' argument cannot stand, for they prove that God's power is to be measured and encompassed in this way, because all their reasoning is based on the fact that Christ's body alone must be in one place, in a bodily and comprehensible way. But here it is not a matter of answering, but of jumping, and meanwhile chatting about Mrs. Allöosi.

And that I come to my things, because our faith holds that Christ is God and man, and the two natures are one person, so that the same person cannot be separated, he can certainly show himself according to the bodily, comprehensible way, in which place he wants; as he did after the resurrection, and will do on the last day. But in this way he can also be

The first is the need for a different, incomprehensible way, as we have seen from the Gospel in the tomb and the closed door.

But now that such a man is supernaturally one person with God, and apart from this man there is no God, it must follow that he also is and may be according to the third, supernatural way, wherever God is, and that everything is fully Christ through and through, also according to humanity; not according to the first, bodily, comprehensible way, but according to the supernatural, divine way. For here you must stand and say: Christ according to the Godhead, where he is, there he is a natural divine person, and is also naturally and personally there, as this well proves his conception in the womb. For if he was to be the Son of God, he had to be natural and personal in the womb and become man. If he is now natural and personal where he is, then he must also be man there. For there are not two separate persons, but one single person. Where it is, there it is the one undivided person. And where you can say: Here is God, you must also say: so is Christ the man also there.

144. And if you were to show a place where God is and not man, then the person would already be separated, because then I could say with truth: Here is God, who is not man and has never been man. But not to me of God! For from this it would follow that space and place separated the two natures from each other and divided the person, when death and all devils could not separate them nor tear them apart. And there should remain for me a bad Christ, who would no longer be a divine and human person at the same time, and in all other places he would have to be a mere separated God and divine person without humanity: No, journeyman, where you put God for me, there you must put humanity with me; they cannot be separated from each other, it has become one person, and does not separate humanity from itself, as Master Hans unzips his skirt and puts it away when he goes to sleep.

1) Thus the Jena. Wittenberg and Erlangen: had to.

For that I may give the simple a rough similitude, Godhead with it, which words speak clearly of the bodily, mankind is more closely united with God than our skin comprehensible way in which a peasant is in doublet and with our flesh, yes, 1) more closely than body and soul. pants, since doublet and pants are stretched out so that Now, as long as man lives and is healthy, skin and flesh, they surround the body and thighs. body and soul are one thing and person, so that they Lift thyself up, thou coarse spirit of enthusiasm, with cannot be separated, but where the soul is, there the body such idle thoughts; if thou canst not think higher nor must also be; where the flesh is, there the skin must also otherwise here, then stay behind the stove and roast be; and you cannot give a special place or space to the pears and apples in the meantime; leave this matter in peace. Christ passed through a closed door with his body, or to the flesh without the skin, as an inheritance without and yet the door was not extended, nor was his body a shell; but where one is, there the other must also be. So drawn in; how then should mankind be extended here, or you cannot peel off the divinity from the humanity and put the Godhead fenced in, since much is another and higher it there, since the humanity is not with it; for in doing so way? you would separate the person and make the humanity a shell, even a skirt, which the divinity would take off and Yes, I also complain that these carnal spirits, who can put on, after which the place or space would be, and hardly crawl on earth, untried in faith, inexperienced in should the bodily space here be capable of so much that spiritual matters, want to fly high above the clouds, and it would separate the divine person, which neither angels measure and judge such high, secret, incomprehensible nor all creatures can separate. things, not according to God's words, but according to their crawling and walking on earth. So it is with them, as the poets say of the Jcaro; for they have also stolen

146. here you will speak with Nicodemo [Joh.3, 9.]: foreign feathers (that is, sayings of the Scriptures), and "How can this happen?" Shall now all places and space glued them on with wax (that is, made even with reason to their sense), and thus fly aloft. But the wax melts, and become One space and place, or (as the foolish spirit dreams according to his coarse carnal sense) shall the they fall into the sea and are drowned in all kinds of error humanity of Christ spread out and stretch like a coat as 2c. far as all creatures are? Answer I, you must take off the old shoes with Moses here and be born anew with 149. Christ says: "If I have told you of earthly things, Nicodemo. According to your old conceit, which and ye believe not; how would ye believe me 4) if I told understands nothing but the first, bodily, comprehensible you of heavenly things?" Behold, this is still all an earthly way, you will not understand this; as the enthusiasts do, and bodily thing, when Christ's body passes through the who do not think otherwise than as if the Godhead were stone and door: for his body is a body that can be bodily, comprehensible way everywhere, as if God were grasped, as well as the stone and the door; yet no reason such a great spreading thing, which reached through and can comprehend how his body and the stone are at the over 3) all creatures. Notice that, because they blame us same time in one place, when he passes through, and for spreading and expanding mankind, and fencing in the here the stone is not enlarged nor extended further, and Christ's body is not drawn in smaller nor narrower. Here, faith must blind reason, and it must be removed from the bodily, comprehensible, and the spiritual world.

1) In Walch's old edition and in Erlangen's: each. 2) d. i. pea.

3) Erlanger: "through and over from". In the Wittenberg and in the Jena, the last two words are drawn together: "exceedingly." That the reading we have given is correct follows from § 169 of this writing. The opinion is: that reached through all creatures and towered above all creatures.

4) So the Wittenberg: "mir" fehlt in the Jena and in the Erlanger. Erlanger: "wollt" instead of: "würdet".

Way lift in the other, incomprehensible way, which it does not understand, and, nevertheless, cannot deny.

If then the other way must be understood by faith, and reason must perish with its first, comprehensible way; how much more must faith alone stand here, and reason perish in the heavenly, supernatural way, since Christ's body in the Godhead is One Person with God! For everyone will admit to me that there is a much different, higher way, since Christ's body is in the sealed stone and closed door, than since he sits or stands in the first way in his clothes or in the air around him. For here the air and the garments are stretched and spread out according to the greatness of his body, so that the eyes may see it and the hands may grasp it. But in the stone and door there is none.

151 Further, everyone must also admit to me that there is still a much higher being and way, since Christ's body is One Person with God, than since he is in the stone or door; for God is not a bodily thing, but a spirit, above all things. So Christ is not One Person with the stone or door, as He is with God; therefore He must be more and deeper in the Godhead than He is in the stone or door; just as He is deeper and closer in the stone or door than in the clothing or air. And so the stone or door must not have expanded or spread, nor fenced in the body of Christ; much less will here, in the most supreme way, mankind expand, spread, or fence in or draw in the Godhead, as the carnal mind dreams.

For the spirit must stand here and confess to me that Christ's body has a much higher, supernatural essence, since it is One Person with God, than it had when it was in the sealed stone and door; since this is the highest manner and essence, and nothing higher can be, than that a man is One Person with God. For the other way, as Christ's body was in the stone, will also become common to all the saints in heaven, that they pass with their body through all creatures, just as it is already common to angels and devils; for the angel came to Petro in the dungeon, Acts 12:7. 12, 7, so the poltergeists come.

The stone is the only thing that has been in the body of Christ. 1) So he must also confess to me that the stone has not expanded, nor has Christ's body been fenced in.

What then does he pretend about the supreme being and manner, since Christ is One Person with God, that there mankind had to expand and surround God, where it should be with God everywhere? Without indicating his coarse, fat, thick thoughts, that he never thought of God and Christ in any other way than in the first, bodily, comprehensible way. Rather, if mankind is in one place or in all places, it does not enclose the Godhead, much less as the stone, which was in one place, enclosed its body, but it is one person with God, so that where God is, there man is also; what God does, that is also done by man; what man suffers, that is also suffered by God.

So Christ of some body has three kinds of being, or all three ways of being. First, the comprehensible, bodily way, as he walked bodily on earth, taking space and giving according to his greatness; such way he can still use, if he wants, as he did after the resurrection, and will need at the last day, as Paul says 1 Tim. 6, 15: "Which will reveal in his time 2) the blessed God" 2c. and Col. 3-4: "When Christ, your life, will reveal himself" 2c., in such a way he is not in GOD or with the Father, nor in heaven, as the mad spirit dreams; for GOD is not a bodily space or place. And this is what the sayings lead the spiritualists to, how Christ leaves the world and goes to the Father 2c.

(155) Secondly, the incomprehensible spiritual way, since he neither takes nor gives space, but passes through all creatures where he wills, as my vision (that I may give a rough likeness) passes and is through air, light, or water, and neither takes nor gives space; as a sound or tone passes and is through air and water, or board and wall, and also neither takes nor gives space; item, as light and heat pass through air, water, glass, crystal, and so on.

1) "Kemnoten" synonymous with chambers.
2) "In his time" is missing in the Erlanger. The Wittenberg has the text of the Bible: "Which will show" etc. w.

and such like goes and is, and neither gives place nor takes place, and such like much more. He used such a way when he came out of a closed tomb, and came through a closed door, and in the bread and wine in the Lord's Supper, and, as it is believed, when he was born of his mother 2c.

156. Thirdly, the divine, heavenly way, since he is one person with God, according to which, of course, all creatures must be much more pervasive and present to him, because they are according to the other way; For if, according to the same other way, he can thus be in and with the creatures, that they do not feel, touch, measure or comprehend him; how much more will he be in all creatures according to this high, third way, that they do not measure or comprehend him, but rather that he has them present before him, measuring and comprehending! For you must understand this being. Christ, if he is one person with God, far, far apart from the creatures, as far as God is outside. Again, place him as deep and close to all creatures as God is within; for he is One inseparable Person with God. Where God is, He must also be, or our faith is false.

But who wants to say or think how this happens? We know that it is so, that he is in God apart from all creatures and with God One Person; but how it happens, we do not know, it is above nature and reason, even of all angels in heaven, only God is aware and known. Because it is unknown to us, and yet true, we should not deny his words beforehand, because we know to prove for certain that Christ's body of all things cannot be where God is, and that such a way of being is false, which the fanciers should prove, but they will leave it alone.

(158) Whether God has and knows even more ways of how Christ's body is, I do not want to deny herewith, but to show how coarse happens our enthusiasts are, that they do not admit Christ's body more than the first, comprehensible way. Even though they cannot prove that this 1) is contrary to our understanding; for I have said it in

I do not want to deny any way that God's power should not be capable of so much that one body may be in many places at the same time, even in a bodily, understandable way. For who will prove that God is not able to do this? Who has seen an end to his power? The enthusiasts think that God is not able to do it, but who will believe their thinking? With what do they make such thinking certain?

If thinking is enough, I will also think better than them, and thus say: If Christ's body would be in one place (as they say) in heaven, still all creatures before him and around him may be like a bright, transparent air. For, as has been said, a spirit sees, travels and hears through an iron wall as brightly and easily as I see or hear through the air or glass, and what is thick or dark to our face, as wood, stone and ore, is to a spirit as glass, yes, as bright air. As the poltergeists and angels prove, and Christ also proved in the sealed stone and locked door.

Now I have seen crystals or precious stones, where inside there is a little spark or flame, as in the opal, or a little cloud 2) or otherwise a little bubble, and yet that same little bubble 3) or little cloud appears as if it were at all ends of the stone; for wherever one turns or turns the stone, one sees the little bubble as if it were in the front of the stone, when it is in the middle. I do not speak now from the Scriptures, it applies to thinking, or let equal swarming apply. If Christ were to sit in the middle of all creatures, in one place, like the little bubble or sparkle in the crystal, and a place of creatures were presented to me, as if bread and wine were presented to me through the word, as if a place of the crystal were presented to my eyes, I should not be able to say: Behold, there is Christ's body truly in the bread; even as I say, Behold, there is the little spark just ahead in the crystal? Do you not think that God could much more wonderfully and truly present Christ's body in the bread (even if it were in one place in heaven),

2) Wittenberger: wöcklin.

3) In the old Walch edition and in the Erlanger: Blöslein.

1) In the editions: the same.

because the sparkle in the crystal is presented to me?

I do not think that this is certainly so, but that it is not impossible for God, so that I may give the enthusiasts something to mock and falsely interpret, as is their way, but nevertheless also show that they cannot preserve their thing, nor condemn our understanding, if it were true, since they say that Christ is in heaven in a different place. Although they neither know nor prove the same, so far are they from the certain truth, that even if their thinking were right (as it is not), yet they cannot thereby prove their supper, that there is vain bread, nor overthrow ours.

162 Further, that they may see how it is no art at all to think anything without Scripture, I take before me the similitude of Laurentii Vallensis. There stands a preacher and preaches, his voice is a single voice that comes out of his mouth and is made and is in his mouth; Nor does this same one voice, which is in one place, that is, in his mouth, come into four, five thousand, or ten thousand ears in one moment, and yet is no other voice in the same many thousand ears than that which is in the preacher's mouth, and is at the same time, in one moment, one voice in the preacher's mouth and in all the ears of the people, as if his mouth and their ears, without any means, were one place where the voice was.

Dear one, can God do this with a bodily voice; why should he not be able to do it much more with the body of Christ, even if he were in one place (as they say), and yet be true in bread and wine in many places at the same time, than in two ears? Because his body is much swifter and lighter than any voice, and all creatures pass through it more easily than the air of the voice, as he proved in the tombstone, since no voice can pass through a stone as easily as Christ's body did.

164 But I say and think no more of these things, forasmuch as the enthusiasts' thinking is true, that Christ is bodily and comprehensible in one place, that thou mayest see to the abundance, though they have obtained the same, that nevertheless his body can be in the Lord's Supper by divine power, because such things are not only possible to lesser creatures than voice and sound or reverberation, but also natural and ordinary, tangible and sensitive; therefore their dreams do not exist that there must be vain bread in the Lord's Supper, because Christ's body is in heaven.

One more thing. In the same way, it was taught among the pontiffs that if a mirror were broken into a thousand pieces, there would still remain in each piece the same whole image that had previously appeared in the whole mirror alone. Here is a single face standing before it and looking at it, and yet in all the pieces it is the same face, whole and complete in an instant. How if Christ were also like this in bread and wine and everywhere? For God can do this with the face and mirror, so that his face is instantly in a thousand pieces or mirrors; why should he not also make Christ's body in such a way that not only his image, but he himself would be in many places at the same time, even though he is in heaven in one place, because his body is much easier to enter into bread and wine than a face into the mirror, as he also enters through stone and iron, through which no image or face enters?

166) O desperate 1) pope! they will shout here. Well! shout, whoever shouts, with shouting one will not answer for a long time, nor will one 2) overthrow anything; otherwise the geese or donkeys or full peasants would probably also be theologians. So I have not yet seen a single piece that the enthusiasts, the great Rolands and giants, would have knocked off the pope, so that they could boast so highly or cheaply against the papists. The poor woods and stones, the images, they have mewed a little, but not bitten. They are now attacking baptism and the Lord's Supper, but it has not yet been done.

I also know almost well that they may say hereupon: The images in the mirror are not the face itself, but its likeness, as bread and wine are signs of the Lord's body;

1) So the Wittenberg and the Jena. The latter gives the reading: "zwiefältiger" in the margin as Conjectur. The Erlanger has this, just like Walch, in the text.

2) ichts - something. Erlanger: "nothing".

Therefore such a likeness is more for them than against them. But I also know that bread and wine are not equal to the body of the Lord, as the image in the mirror is to the face. Therefore, my equation is: If God can make so many images of a face in a mirror in a moment, and such a wonderful thing happens naturally and visibly; then it should be much more believable that he can make Christ's body truly in many places in bread and wine, even if he were in a bodily place, as they dream. 1) That I may show how nothing is their conceit, but that they think no more of Christ than in some intelligible way. And even if this were true, it still does not follow from it what they want to conclude from it. But now it follows much less, because Christ's body is not in heaven in such a bodily, comprehensible way, nor can they also prove that he is thus in heaven.

168) Now that the spirit swarms against me, if Christ's body should be everywhere where God is, then I would become a Marcionist and make a preached Christ, because his body could not be so large or extended that it would surround the Godhead, which is everywhere, 2c., 2) I answer first that the spirit perhaps speaks such things with great tickling and courage, because he does not prove that such follows from my speech; therefore I do not respect such washing.

On the other hand, he knows well that allegare inconveniens non. est solvere argumenta. If it were enough for one to say that it does not rhyme, then no article of faith, indeed no law, could exist in the world. But the proud, haughty spirit lets himself think, because he merely says that it does not rhyme, such and such would follow from it, so it must be and must not prove it. Thirdly, with this he reveals his crude foolish thoughts, that he thinks no differently of God's being in all places, than as if God were a great, vast being that filled the world and towered over it by all means. 3) Just as if a straw bag were full of straw, and yet protruded above and below, just after the first, bodily, comprehensible way. Of course, Christ's body would be a mere poem and ghost, as a big straw bag, since God would be inside with heaven and earth; wouldn't that be speaking and thinking of God roughly enough?

But we do not speak thus, but say that God is not such an extended, long, wide, thick, high, deep being, but a supernatural, inscrutable being, who is at the same time in every grain completely, and yet in all and above all, and apart from all creatures; therefore there must be no enclosure, as the spirit dreams. For one body is much, much too wide for the Godhead, and many thousands of Godheads could be in it. Again, also much, much too narrow, that not one deity can be inside. Nothing is so small, God is still smaller; nothing is so big, God is still bigger; nothing is so short, God is still shorter; nothing is so long, God is still longer; nothing is so wide, God is still wider; nothing is so narrow, God is still narrower, and so on, it is an ineffable being above and apart from everything that can be named or thought.

But to this the Spirit should answer, first, where the Scripture or reason is that Christ's body has no more way of being than the bodily, understandable way, like straw in sackcloth or like bread in a basket and meat in pots, especially because I have proved that he has other ways than in the tombstone 2c. Item, that God's right hand is a special place in heaven. How is it that the Spirit is so silent here, when the greatest need is to speak? For because he is silent here, he has lost; since his faith stands on this piece, that Christ's body must have no other way of being in heaven than localem, like straw in sackcloth; which, however, is publicly wrongly convinced by me. Here he should be wise and prove such. Yes, how can he? He has gone too far into mud, and cannot get out.

On the other hand, the spirit should answer: Because Christ is God and man, and his humanity has become One Person with God, and thus is completely drawn into God over all creatures, so that he sticks to him in the same way: how it is possible for God to be sth.

1) Walch and the Erlangeners: Aufs.

is not man? And how can it happen without separation of the person that God is here without mankind and there with mankind? Since we do not have two Gods, but only one God, and he is completely man according to the One Person, namely the Son. What is it that he otherwise chats a lot, and here, when it is necessary, jumps and is silent?

If God and man are one person, and the two natures are united with each other in such a way that they belong closer together than body and soul, then Christ must also be man where he is God. If he is God and man in one place, why should he not also be man and God in another place? If in another place he is also man and God, why not in the third, fourth, fifth, and so on in all places? But if the third, fourth, fifth place does not let him be man and God at the same time, then also the first place does not let him be man and God at the same time. For if a place or a place can separate a person, the first place does so as well as all the others. Here one should have answered; I urged this, since I indicated how God and man would be One Person, and Christ would thereby have received a supernatural being or way of being in all places.

If we want to be Christians and think and speak rightly of Christ, then we must think of him in this way, that the Godhead is apart from and above all creatures. Secondly, we must think that humanity (although it is also a creature), but because it alone, and none else, is so attached to God that it is one person with the Godhead, it must also be higher, above and apart from all other creatures, but under God alone. 1) Well, this is our faith. Now here we come with Christ apart from all creatures, both after mankind and Godhead; there we are in a different land with mankind, because when they walked on earth, that is, apart from and above all creatures, only in the Godhead. Now let faith judge and conclude here. Apart from the creatures there is nothing but God, and this humanity is therefore also apart from the creatures, so it must be, since God is, that is never missing; but essentially it cannot be God. But because it reaches above, out of, above all creatures, to the essential God and sticks to it, and is, since God is, it must be God at the least personally, and thus also be in all places, since God is.

1) The construction in this sentence is broken. The sentence should probably read like this: Secondly, we must think that mankind (although it is also a creature, but because it alone, and none else, is so attached to God that it is one person with the Godhead) must also be higher, above and apart from all other creatures, but under God alone.

It is true that our reason is foolish to think here, because it is used to understand the word "in" in no other way than in a physical, comprehensible way, as straw is in the sack and bread in the basket. Therefore, where it hears that God is in this or in these, it always thinks of the straw sack and the bread basket. But faith hears that "in" is as much in this matter as over, out, under, through, and again through and everywhere. Oh, what do I say about such high things, which are unspeakable, and unnecessary for the simple, but for nothing at all for the enthusiasts, and also harmful! For they understand it as little as a donkey understands the psalter, unless they can pinch out a little piece that they blaspheme and desecrate, so that they go idly about the main things and skip over them, as the oppressor is fooling here, and from my discourse he is saying that if Christ is everywhere, then he cannot be received with the mouth, or the mouth must also be everywhere. This is called a real wilful wickedness, because the devil shows himself with it.

For this reason I will also stop speaking of this piece: whoever can be advised has had enough of this; but whoever does not want to, let him always go. The simple have enough of the simple words of Christ, which he says in the Lord's Supper, "This is my body," because the foolish have nothing certain or lasting to say against it, nor do they answer correctly to some of it. For whoever is found on some foul ground in this great matter, he is to be held reasonably suspect and shunned. Certainly because they arrogantly and confidently boast that they have Scripture and that everything is certain; how much more should they be considered as the erroneous, pompous, red-baiting spirits?

because they are not found on one alone, but for vain loose reasons, that they also lie so much publicly and answer no piece correctly.

177 And especially the heretic is henceforth not worthy of any more answer than to recant his blasphemous allies. For as it is said: A public lie is not worthy of an answer; so also he is to be shunned as a public heretic who denies a public article of faith. Now the Zwingel not only denies this highest, most necessary article, "that God's Son died for us," but also blasphemes it and says that it is the most outrageous heresy that has ever existed. This is where his arrogance and damned alliosis lead him, that he dissects the person of Christ, and leaves us with no other Christ than a sincere man who died for us and redeemed us. What Christian heart can hear or suffer such a thing? Surely the whole Christian faith and all the blessedness of the world is taken away and condemned. For he who is redeemed by mankind alone is not yet redeemed, of course, nor will he ever be redeemed.

But there is neither time nor space to go on about this now. I confess for myself that I consider Zwingel to be an unchristian with all his teachings; for he holds and teaches no part of the Christian faith rightly, and has become worse seven times than when he was a pope, according to the judgment of Christ, Matth. 12, 45: "It will be worse with such a man hereafter than it was before. I make this confession so that I may be excused before God and the world, as I am not in agreement with Zwingel's teachings, nor do I want to be for eternity.

Summa Summarum, we do not allow allöosin nor heterosin, nor Jthipöian 1), nor some gankelwerk, which Zwingel brings out of his gaukelsack. We want to have reason from Scripture, and not art from his poem. Ask nothing about the fact that he rages and foams so cruelly here, as if he were possessed with great anger. With anger and wrath one will not take our mind. That does not want to the angry spirit that we might be made sure how Christ's body might not be in heaven and the Lord's Supper at the same time, as the words read: "This is my body. Perhaps from great anger or from great moderation, he leaves the piece and rushes past, and in the meantime teaches us new tropos, without all distress.

180 For that he is slandering and therefore concludes: If my doctrine should exist, that Christ is body everywhere, per God, then Christ body would be alterum infinitem, an infinite thing, like God Himself 2c. He could well see for himself, where anger does not blind him, that such a consequence is nothing. If the world itself is not infinitem or infinite, how should it follow that Christ's body would be infinite if it were everywhere? To this end, the blind mind infers such a consequence in the crude, comprehensible way, and yet we know that God is able to hold something in place in more than one way, as has been proven above. An angel can be in heaven and on earth at the same time, as Christ testifies, Matth. 18, 10.: "Their angels always see the Father's face in heaven." If they serve us, they are with us on earth, and yet they always see the Father's face in heaven; yet they are not infinitem or infinite in nature.

The coarse spirit does not yet know what it means to be in heaven, and wants to make inferences about it. For since I said how Christ was in heaven while he was still on earth, as John 3:13 says, "the Son of Man who is in heaven," 2c., help God, how does he infer and juggle? How could (he says) Christ be in heaven at that time? Does one eat and drink also in heaven? Does one die and suffer in heaven? Do you sleep and rest in heaven? See, where you come, you mad Luther, fie your 2) times. How do you think about this victory of the spirit? Constantinople he has won herewith, and the Turk eaten, there goes his gaukelsack in jumping with vain Allöosin and Ithipöien.

and greater is that mankind is in GOD, yes, with GOD One Person, than that it is in Heaven? Is not God higher and more glorious than Heaven? Now Christ humanity has been higher and deeper in God and before God from the womb than any angel; so, of course, it has also been higher in heaven than any angel. For what is in God and before God is in heaven; just as the angels are when they are on earth, as is said in Matth. 18, 10. Unless God Himself is not yet in heaven. So I would also like to conclude and juggle from the Zwinglian art: Does one also eat and drink in the Godhead? Does one also die and suffer in the Godhead? Behold, whither comest thou, thou mad John the Evangelist, who wilt teach us that Christ is GOD and in the Godhead? For if with God there is no dying, nor suffering, nor eating, nor drinking, then Christ's humanity cannot be with God, much less be One Person with God. That is where I wanted to go (says the devil) with my jugglery; but you, hostile Luther, are here to ruin my jugglery.

If Christ can suffer and die on earth at the same time, even though he is one person in the Godhead and with God, why should he not be able to suffer much more on earth if he is already in heaven at the same time? If heaven should hinder it, much more would the Godhead hinder it. How can I say that not only Christ was in heaven when he walked on earth, but also the apostles and all of us who are mortal on earth, if we believe in Christ? First of all, there should be a rumble in Zwingel's bag of tricks. There he would conclude: Does one sin also in heaven? Does one also err in heaven? Does the devil also attack in heaven? Does the world persecute us even in heaven? Does flesh and blood also tempt us in heaven? and so on. For we sin and err without ceasing, as the Lord's Prayer teaches, "Forgive us our trespasses," and are always challenged by the devil, world and flesh. With this manner you should put the devil and the world, flesh and blood in heaven. Look where you are going, you mad Luther. Fie, will you not yet

Grab hold of the fact that our spirit is not a juggler, there you have it once.

How shall I do to him? St. Paul deceived me when he said Eph. 1, 3: "God has blessed us with all kinds of spiritual blessings in the heavenly realm." And again Cap. 2, 5, 6: "He has made us alive together with Christ, and has raised us up together with Him, and has seated us together with Him in the heavenly realm," and Col. 3, 3: "Our life is hidden with Christ in God. This, of course, must be in heaven; but the spirit can certainly call upon his magic bag here, that it may give him out an alloiosis or ithiopoeia, which teaches us to change here and to take one for the other, that heaven here should be called earth, as he also says in Joh. 6, 55, that Christ must be called flesh his Godhead. For the allosis is master in the Scriptures, and where we do not want to believe it, he will force it on us with inferences and say: "We did not go to heaven on Mount Oel, and from there to heaven, but here in German lands; therefore St. Paul must call heaven as much as earth. For this spirit is called heaven no more than that 1) he may show with fingers and eyes above him, where the sun and moon stand; and because they never stand still, I hold that they give Christ such a place in heaven, where he can never sit still. For I cannot think, nor bring out of them, what place they give Christ in heaven. But let what goes there go.

185: So to my saying from Col. 2, 9: "All the fullness of the Godhead dwells in Christ bodily" 2c., he must not say more than: bodily means essential, just as if Christ had not also been essential God before he [God] dwelt bodily in Christ. It is fine that the spirit may interpret what it wants, and must not prove it. Just like the saying Eph. 4, 10: "Christ descended and ascended into all the heavens, that he might fill all things. 2) Here he calls "fulfill" the holy Scriptures, and again shouts against the mad Luther, as if he had broken hell. But that he should prove it, that is not necessary, it is enough, that the

1) Walch and the Erlangeners: that.

2) Erlanger: "füllt" and immediately following: "fill".

Spirit says so, then enough is answered, and our mind is wrong.

But there he meets Luther right at first, since he proves his inference about the saying of Christ: "Where I am, there you shall be also. Behold, he says, if Christ is everywhere, we must also be everywhere. I am surprised that he does not also conclude: because we are where Christ is, we must also all be God and man; for Christ is, since he is God and man. Item, Christ passed through sealed stone and closed door, therefore we must also pass through it. Item, Christ is spiritually in us, so we also must be spiritually in us 2c.

(187) Yes, again he might well conclude, Where Christ is, there we cannot be. For it is no more true that many bodies are in one place than that one body is in many places; but since Christ has a place in heaven (as they say), each one must also have his own place. Since this saying, "Where I am, there ye shall be also," is contrary to Scripture and faith, where it should be understood, according to which it reads, Mrs. Allöosis or Heterosis, or perhaps the common figura Narrosis, must become godfather here, and help us to the right understanding. Can I not also finely drive her consequence?

Now a sow shall not be a dove, and the cuckoo must not be a nightingale. The proud devil acts as he pleases in the world, and indicates with such jugglery that, because he cannot answer, he wants to practice his flush on us. But we know that the Scriptures set this one man and no other at the right hand of God. Whether we will be the same where he is, according to the first or the second way, as shown above, we will not be the third way where he is, that is, at the right hand of God, one person with God, according to which way he is where God is. Yes, because he is everywhere, we are certainly where he is; for he must also be with us, if he is to be everywhere. If the inferential spirit has overturned this, it mixes it up and does not want to know more than the one, understandable way. He must know nothing about it everywhere and understand nothing himself, what he raves about.

That is enough of this first part; for from these sayings and answers of the spirit everyone can see that all their art is much chattering and shouting, but they can neither answer nor understand anything; and the more writing they have, the more they show their foolishness. Let us now consider the other saying, "Flesh is of no use," and hear whether the devil will answer or mock. 1)

First, since I had written that Christ flesh does not belong under the saying John 3:6, "That which is born of flesh is flesh," but under this, "That which is born of the Spirit is spirit," and had proved this very powerfully from our faith and gospel, since the angel says to Joseph, Matt. 1:20, "That which is born in Mary is of the Holy Spirit," and Luc. 1:35, "That which is born in you is holy," 2c. Against such thunderbolts of Scripture he does no more, but sets his bare and naked jealousy, and says: Christ flesh is also born of flesh, and I do wrong to make it spirit. This is not different (as I understand it), as if the hopeful devil wanted to say so much: You impotent, mad Luther, shall I answer you and lay your sayings? I do into thee. I say that Christ's flesh is born of flesh; let it remain so, and do not murmur a word against it.

191 Now I should say: Mercy-²⁾ Junker, what you say is right and must not be proven. If I were so little interested in the matter as the spirit, which, where it feels that it is struck by me, either jumps or is angry, or meows One word or two half, 3) and is then called an answer!

But we know that Christ's flesh cannot belong to the saying (that which is of the flesh is flesh), if it were ten times a zoom 4) or if it had fifteen allöoses vain change banks. It does nothing to the matter that a gnome is; because Christ speaks there of the new birth and condemns "the" fleshly old birth, that it can not see the kingdom of God 2c. Therefore be anathema and cursed, where it is said that Christ is born of flesh, since Christ flesh is not condemned, nor had to be born elsewhere to the kingdom of God, but is holy and has brought us the new birth.

Who brought the spirit to school, and taught him what flesh and spirit mean! For he calls the creature flesh, if it is not spirit, as it was created by God, as Christ says Luc. 24, 39: "that a spirit has neither flesh nor bone. How is it possible that he should understand with such a sense the sayings of John 3 and the like, where flesh and blood are condemned? Since we know that "all creatures of God are good", Genesis 1, and God does not condemn His creatures. After such a manner Christ's flesh and blood came from Mary's flesh and blood; but since flesh and blood, John 3:6, is condemned, since it cannot know the kingdom of God, it must certainly not be called the creature of God, since it is flesh, bone, skin and hair; for all these are good creatures of God.

194 For this reason flesh must be called here, not only blood, bone and marrow, as it is God's creature, but as it is without spirit and in its own power, work, custom, wit, will and ability. Therefore Christ would not be born of man's seed, that he might not be born of flesh, that is, of fleshly work, desire, will, or activity, but only of the power and activity of the Holy Spirit, and thus his flesh is spiritless, holy, pure; for what can holiness, purity, innocence be but spirit and spiritless?

But our enthusiasts call the spirit nothing more than a being that has neither flesh nor bone; therefore holiness, purity, innocence are not spirit with them. They are grossly unlearned humps in these matters, they want to teach a lot, and they understand the Words they do not speak. Christ, Joh. 3,6, 1) is also called all those spirit, who are born of the spirit, who must have flesh, bone, marrow, skin and hair. I have written enough of this in that book, for even if I write it a thousand times, my dear Junker enthusiasts do not read it or respect it, so I let them go.

The Spirit lays three great vices upon me over these words, "Flesh is of no use," so let us hear and see how the angry devil writes such poisonous lies through his deluded, wretched enthusiasts. The first is that I should be against myself, because I have taught from time to time that eating Christ's body in the flesh is of no use, and I teach here and there that eating Christ's flesh is of use. My little books are in the day, by which one can convince this lying spirit that he acts on me as befits such a disciple. Dear, what is the use if I write against this spirit forever, because he is busy acting with public insolent lies; let the devil go.

I have thus taught and still teach that Christ's flesh is not only of no use, but also poison and death, if it is eaten without faith and word. I have said more that God, and the Holy Spirit Himself, are poison, death, and no good, if they are received without faith; for there is written, "To the unclean nothing is clean," Titus 1:15. Item, Psalm 18:27: "With the perverse thou art perverse." For indeed the Jews did not become holy when they attacked and killed Christ. But again, the eating of Christ's flesh is blessed, necessary and useful, if it is eaten bodily together with the word and faith. For there it is written, "To the pure all things are pure." Read my booklet, and you will see that the lying spirit does not know how to answer, and therefore wants to make my booklet suspect with crude, impolite lies.

A child of seven years can well understand that these two are not contrary to each other: To eat Christ's flesh without faith is not useful, and to eat Christ's flesh in the flesh is not useful.

1) Here the Erlanger has improved Walch's wrong Bible quotation: Joh. 3, 16.

eating with faith is useful. Just as the two are not contrary to each other: Christ's flesh is of no use to the ungodly, and Christ's flesh is of use to the pious, as I have almost abundantly set forth in the next booklet, that in faith even death and all evil are found useful, except the flesh of Christ, which in itself is holy and useful, full of divinity 2c. Nor may the lying spirit lie publicly that I should have said that Christ's flesh is useful, enjoyed without faith, as he rages with his examples. For the touching was not useless, since the bloody woman touched Christ's hem; or we would also have to say that she did not touch Christ's hem, because touching is not useful; just as they are lying here: Eating Christ's flesh is not useful, therefore his flesh is not there; it is the devil's trickery.

199 The other bad thing, so he interprets me, is that I should not have translated the text correctly "meat is not useful", because in the Greek it says: the meat is not useful, and I have omitted the little word "that". Why the spirit makes such fools, I cannot know, without methinks he wants to twist himself on the place, and charm the people, that they should wonder at great 1) art of the Greek language in his head, when he has not forgotten much of the same. If he knows that such chatter does not matter at all, then it is a knavery; if he does not know, then it is an indication that he still needs a schoolmaster for a while; for both Latin, German, and Greek speakers must confess to me that this text, σαρξ οὐκ ωφελεί ουδέν, in the

Thus, the following must be interpreted into Latin: Caro non prodest quicquam, that is, "flesh is not useful", and cannot stand for "that" in Latin; as Erasmus and all the others interpret it.

The Germans must also testify to the fact that, according to our language, it is a very common custom and manner to add "that" or "a", or to let it stand. As when we say: man and woman is one body, it is just as much as, a man and a woman is one body; yes, it is more finely spoken:

1) Walch and the Erlangeners: larger.

Husband and wife is one body, for a husband and wife is one body. Item, Peter has house and yard, wife and child in Bethsaida, is as much as, Peter has house and yard, wife and child in Bethsaida. Item, master and servant is one cake, is equal to, the master and the servant is one cake; item, he gave me dog for dog, horse for horse 2), is equal to, he gave me a dog for a dog, horse for a horse; item, woman shall not be master in the house, is equal to, a woman or the woman shall not be the master or a master in the house.

201 Henceforth, there will be a lot of talking in the German tongue. And such words, which may be left out or added, are called "articles" by scholars. In the Latin language, there are none, and no one can set certain measures or rules as to when they are to be omitted or added, but one must set and leave them according to the common usage of the language. For it sometimes happens that it reads more delicately when they are omitted than when I speak of two equals: It is man against man, which is finer than when I say, It is one man against one man. Item, so one speaks: piece for piece, eye for eye, fist for fist, money for money, body for body. In which speeches the articles are better left out, than that they stand by.

Again, sometimes they are much more subtle than if they were left outside, as when I say, "A man is stronger than a woman," or, "A man is stronger than a woman. Although it would be just as much if I said, "Man is stronger than woman," it is not quite so true. The Zwingel is worse than the Oecolampad, is better, because so, Zwingel is worse than Oecolampad. An apostle is higher than a prophet, so it is better: Apostle is higher than prophet.

203 Yes, it happens that we Germans often have to put such articles, since they are not in the Greek, as Matth. 1, 1. is Βιβλος γενέσεως, that is, book birth of Jesus.

Christ, that is nothing at all 3) therefore must be

2) Gorre - bad horse.

3) Wittenberger and Erlanger: "ja" instead of: gar.

I translate it thus: the book of the birth, or even better: "This is the book of the birth of Jesus Christ. Item, Joseph did as the angel of the Lord commanded him. There is no article "of" in the Greek, but schlechts, the angel of the Lord, and must nevertheless stand in the German. Item, Matth. 3, 3. and Marc. 1, 3. Luc. 3, 4. we must say, "a voice or the voice of one calling in the wilderness", although in the Greek it stands badly xxxx xxxxxx, that is, voice calling.

Again, we must not put an article, since it must be in the Greek, as Matth. 1, 2. 23: "Abraham begat Isaac", there it is written in the Greek, Abraham begat Isaac. Item, "Emanuel, that is interpreted, God with us", here it is written in Greek: God with us. Take the Greek Testament before you and hold it up against the German language, and you will find, as I say, that articles are often written there, since they do not have to be written in German, and again, they are not written in Greek, since they have to be written in German.

I say this so that one may see how the oppressor deals with jugglery and bases his error on such loose talk; for where the article should be so necessary and give that something special or dependent on the forerunner would be spoken, as he drools, then it should also be right in Marc. 1, 3, since Marcus says: "Voice calling", since it is probably such a special voice and caller as has never come on earth. Item, should also stand Jn. 1, 6, since he writes: "There was a man sent from God. Now in the Greek it does not say: there was a man sent, but: there was a man sent. And so from now on, Zwingel will have to study Greek for five years before he can prove his dream of the articles, or before he will indicate where and when they are to be removed or added. I know of no other proof, for it may well be spoken in one way (as has been said) without articles and with articles, and this also gives one meaning; but one is more completely or finely spoken than the other, which must be recognized from the custom and usage of the languages.

206: So here also: "Meat is no good", is probably in the Greek: the meat is no good.

But because one is as valid as the other, as I have proved above with examples, and everyone may find plenty of the same in the Greek, I have also used both, and will also use both henceforth, because they are both right, and the belly of the spirit shall burst; although it reads more finely in German: Fleisch ist kein nütze, denn, das Fleisch ist kein nütze. It is as much the opinion of Christ as if I said, "Meat is of no use," or, "It is a useless thing about the flesh. You may speak such an opinion as follows: Flesh is of no use, or as follows: Flesh is of no use; one and the other are equally valid. Otherwise the Latin would never have to have this text, nor could they get it, because they would have to say without all articles that meat is not useful, and yet they would have the right interpretation. But the fact that Zwingel refers to some teachers who teach such things from the articles does not help him; for they do not teach like Zwingel in the play; so their proofs do not dispute anything either; nor is he serious, for he does not consider them so learned that they should advise or help him in this matter.

Now he does not let him suffice with such jugglery of the articles, but continues and interprets the article "that" in this place, "the flesh is no good" thus: just the flesh is no good, and "that" and "just that" shall apply equally. Will the opinion of Christ thus master/ just the flesh (hear, of which I said above, "my flesh is the right food"). Now the whole world knows that in German "eben das" is not an article, but a pronoun of good strength, which is relativum and demonstrativum at the same time, as the idem. Here the scholars understand well, what a gross ass piece this is, ex articulo pronomen demonstrativum et relativum facere. So Luther should be taught to interpret the text. What shall one do with such sacrilegious spirits, who take quod pro qualiter, articulum pro pronomine, carnem pro divinitate, and put everything they may think into the Scriptures? If he has learned such things from Cyrillo, Chrysostom and Erasmo of the articles, he has truly learned them in a dream or smoke-.

For no one teaches them in this way, he teaches them falsely.

There is a great difference between "the flesh is of no use" and "this flesh is of no use," or "the very flesh," or "the same flesh. 2c. For "the same" or "this" or "that" may not be omitted, like the articles, without change of mind. If I say: The man shall be lord of the house and not the woman, here it does not show me a certain present man or woman, but speaks freely in general of all women and men. But if I say: this man or this very man shall be master, and not this woman or this very woman, then it shows me a particular man and woman, excluded from all, as present; for this is what a pronoun is called, when it points to a particular, immediately as present, and separates the same from all others.

But the article does not indicate anything special or present, separated from others, but speaks freely, without signs or interpretations. As when one says: This man is pious, this woman is chaste, this bread is beautiful; here the speech points to special persons as present, and if one were to take away such pronouns or little words and say: Man is pious, woman is chaste, there would be neither sense nor understanding left of the previous. But if I say: The man shall be a man, the woman shall be a woman, I can well take off the articles and still have the sense as: Man shall be man, woman shall be woman, for the article shows nothing present or as present, as the pronoun does.

Because this spirit must confess that there is no pronoun, but an article: "the flesh is of no use," and yet he makes a pronoun out of it, not only with the interpretation, since he says that "this" is as much as "that," but also with the interpretation, since he says that in that place the same flesh should be called, of which Christ spoke above, Joh. 6, 55: "My flesh is the right food", he himself testifies that he falsifies God's word and deals evil with the simple. For an article is never from the former or the latter.

The word "flesh" does not speak of things as a pronoun, but speaks of them freely in general, so that it can be understood just as well when it is spoken of without an article, even though it does not read as well or as finely. Therefore it is impossible, according to grammar, that flesh here should be called Christ's flesh in particular, of which he speaks above; but must be called flesh in general, so that one could also speak of it without the article, namely, "Flesh is of no use.

We Germans also have such a difference of pronouns and articles in the sound or tone, which the Latin call accent. For there is many other "that" where Christ says Matth. 26, 26: "This is my body", and many other where he says Joh. 6, 63: "The flesh is of no use. The first "that" is a pronoun, and the letter a inside is strong and long, as if it were written dahas, as a Swabian or Algauian daas reads, and whoever hears it, it is as if there is a finger pointing to it.

212) But the other "that" is short, so that one hardly hears the letter a or does not know whether it sounds a, e or i, and there is no finger to show that it reads; just as the Bohemians short their letters and say: Przikasani, there you cannot notice whether he says Parzikasani or Perzikasani or Pirzikasani, so it reads nimbly. So, when a German speaks correctly: Wie ist das Korn so theuer, you can't tell whether he says das, des or dies Korn; for it reads as if the words were without middle letters: wie ist dsKorn so theuer, or thus: wie istds Korn so theuer, so briefly and nimbly it reads. As I now say of the "that," so one should also think of the other articles, as: this, the, the, the, the; if they stretch the middle letter long, as if it were in between, then they are pronouns; if they read nimbly, as if the middle letter disappeared, then they are articles; as if you speak: Dfrau, Drherr, Dskind, Dshaus, verhaufen auf kürzeste, there they are articles and do not point with fingers to something.

1) Wittenberger and Jenaer: "kündet"; Erlanger: "kunntet".

From this, every German can understand this quarrelsome thing, and notice the mischievousness of this spirit. For Joh. 6, 51: "That is my flesh", he makes a long Swabian dahas, or a pronoun, when it is an article and short "that", and in the proper German it reads: Das Fleisch ist kein nütze, or thus: Sfleisch ist kein nütz, as if only the single letter s stood in front of it. There you have actually and clearly the text Joh. 6. and what the articles are or are able to do. Now be the judge, who knows German, between me and Zwingel. Zwingel says that the text should apply as follows: the flesh is of no use, or the same flesh is of no use. Who is falsifying the text here? Who is so coarse that does not feel a great difference when one says: the flesh is no good, and the same flesh is no good? Do you understand what the evil spirit is dealing with? Further, if I now say in one place: "Meat is no good", and in another: Meat or flesh is no good, dear, what is the difference between them? One is spoken differently from the other, but the meaning is the same. It is as I say, the spirit must do a lot of useless talking, so that it smears people's mouths, as if it wanted to answer, so that one does not notice its jumping and flapping.

214. after that he takes up the matter with seriousness and wants to prove from the text Joh. 6, 63. that Christ speaks of his flesh when he says: "Flesh is of no use. Here let us hear art. First of all, he says, the disciples grumbled because Christ taught that they had to eat his flesh. Now they did not grumble against the spiritual mind, but against the bodily food; there it is. Tell me, dear one, does this prove that Christ's flesh is of no use? Or that such a saying is to be understood of Christ's flesh? Certainly, for in Zwinglian logic everything follows in all sorts of ways. Ah, it is a vexatious thing to deal with such boys in God's words.

215 We say that the disciples both murmured against the mind of the Spirit, and against the bodily eating of the flesh of Christ; for they understood none of them aright, thinking that they must tear his flesh with their teeth, as other perishable flesh. But from this it does not yet follow that Christ's flesh, as incorruptible, spiritual flesh, may not be eaten bodily with faith in the Lord's Supper. The Spirit should overthrow this; so he teaches us how the disciples understood to eat Christ's flesh bodily, just as if we did not know this without his mastery; he answers where he can.

216 Secondly, he teaches us that the disciples were offended at such talk of Christ eating his flesh in the flesh; from this it must follow that Christ, in his answer, speaks for and of his flesh. Dear, why does it follow? Because it says Zwingel; that is enough. Just as if Christ 1) could not speak of other flesh, when he wants to teach the spiritual mind to eat of his flesh, if he could not teach more subtly than to indicate two kinds of flesh and teach two kinds of eating, and thus say: Flesh and blood does not let you understand such eating of my flesh, because such flesh is not useful; but this flesh is life, quia unicum et optimum genus docendi est, bene dividere et definire. Therefore it follows rather that this saying, "Flesh is of no use," must be understood of other flesh, which Christ separates and sets against his flesh, as all right teachers are wont to do where they teach best.

217 To the third/Christ speaks: "If you now see the Son of Man going up, where he was before. What he means by this, I cannot think up, without everything that he speaks must serve the spirit for his lie. Perhaps he wants to sing a mean little song to her: Christ is going to heaven, therefore his body cannot be eaten in the Lord's Supper. What such talk is capable of, is said enough above. But that he thereby wants to prove that the saying, "Flesh is of no use," speaks of Christ's flesh, that is a pretty logic and a very beautiful consequence. As if I said: Christ went to heaven, therefore the saying of his body is to be understood: "All men are liars" [Rom. 3, 4. Ps. 116, 11.]. Doesn't it rhyme and follow well? That means in Swiss the Luther beaten, that not one footman remains, as Kleist boasts.

1) Erlanger: could.

218. fourth, "the Spirit is that quickeneth," John 6:63. There, there, that is short and good (he says), the saying shall conclude, if the Spirit alone quickeneth, then is Christ's flesh no good, because it is not the Spirit. So then we must say, Since Christ's flesh is not the Spirit, and therefore is not useful, since the Spirit alone is useful, how can it be useful if it is given for us? How can it be of use if it is in heaven and we believe in it? For if the reason is right and sufficient, that because Christ's flesh is not spirit it can be of no use, so it can be of no use either in the cross or in heaven; for there is no spirit either in the cross or in heaven, or in the Lord's Supper. Therefore, since there is no Spirit crucified for us, Christ's flesh is crucified uselessly for us; and since there is no Spirit, but Christ's flesh ascended into heaven, we believe in a useless flesh in heaven. For Christ's flesh, be it where it may, is not a spirit. If it is not a spirit, it is not useful and does not give life, as the devil is smuggling here. Behold, where the devil goeth forth, that is, to remove the mist from the eyes.

219. fifth, "the words that I speak are spirit and life" 2c. From this he concludes that Christ speaks of his flesh since he says, "Flesh is of no use." Awe yes, beautiful consequence, like the next one above! I fear that the wise man with great arrogance thinks that there is no man on earth, or considers all men to be vain geese and jackdaws, how else would it be possible that he should be so impudent and thirsty as to display such gross foolishness?

We know that Christ's words are spirit and life, but that it should follow that Christ's flesh is useless, no one will say, because he is mad and foolish, or because he despises the mind and thoughts of the world. The Spirit says it follows, but when does he prove such a consequence? Of course, these very words of Christ "Flesh is of no use," are spirit and life, for with them he enlightens us, and points us from the flesh to the Spirit which is a wholesome spiritual teaching that gives life. Now it would be a public blasphemy if someone wanted to say that Chri stus should reject his flesh, to which he nevertheless points us, and says: "My flesh is the right food", v. 55. It would be that Mrs. Allöosis here once again made God out of flesh for us; but we do not listen to the sinful.

221. sixth, Christ says: "But there are some of you who do not believe. V. 64. Item, Peter speaks there v. 68: "To whom shall we go? Thou hast words of eternal life." From these two sayings, he concludes and gags again that because such sayings speak of faith and the living Word, Christ's flesh must be understood in the saying, "Flesh is of no use," and he must not start a new one to speak of other flesh 2c. I have also heard many a foolish consequence or consequence all my life; but I have never heard a more foolish and sacrilegious consequence than this spirit makes, that because Christ speaks of faith and word, it must follow that the saying, "Flesh is no good," is spoken of his flesh. I truly believe that this spirit does not think differently in his heart, but thus: We Zwingel by the grace of God, giant and Roland, hero and victor in French and German lands, apostle of all apostles, prophet of all prophets, teacher of all teachers, master of all masters, scholar of all scholars, lord of all lords, spirit of all spirits 2c., say thus and thus, let it remain so; that and no other. For how could it be possible that he should walk so proudly, and infer and act in the Scriptures and God's Word everywhere, where he was not possessed with inhuman pride and iniquity?

222. we poor sinners and carnivores have nowhere and never said that Christ began a new thing when he said, "flesh is of no use," as the Spirit owes us, but confess even to this day that Christ, when he began from his flesh, spoke through and through, for and for, to the end of the chapter, John 6:51. of the spiritual eating of his flesh; but so we say: Because out of such a speech of his two disciples were made, some being offended at it, and murmuring, and running away from him, and some believing, and praising, and abiding with him, he hath at such a discord without all new beginnings, may say: "Spirit gives life, flesh is of no use. Which we have not understood otherwise, but thus: My doctrine is spiritual; he that will understand it carnally lacks, and such understanding is of no use; but he that understands it spiritually lives. Here is nothing new spoken of his flesh eating, but difference of the disciples, who heard such, indicated, and have always been ready to learn differently, where someone would do it with good reason.

223. as if I preached, Good works are not profitable for righteousness; here I get two kinds of disciples; some are angry, murmuring, running away, and saying, How? does this man forsake all good works? but others believe, praise, and remain. Here I also want to say: My doctrine of good works is spiritual, and spoken differently, namely, good works for righteousness, and good works for God's praise. He who understands them to be necessary for righteousness is lacking; but he who understands them to be necessary for God's praise meets the mark. Here I mean that this is not a new sermon, but is preached through and through, for and for, of good works, although I am preaching from two different disciples.

224 Christ does the same in John 6:51: He teaches about the eating of his flesh, and then deals with the difference between the disciples who hear this teaching. He finds some carnal, some spiritual, and pronounces the judgment on them in v. 63: "the flesh is of no use, the spirit gives life. He declares himself and says: "My words are spirit and life. Which can be nothing 1) but this: I must have spiritual disciples for my words; carnal disciples will not do, for they are disciples of the flesh, and not of my words; "But the flesh is of no use," and deceives them. For as the Spirit 2) is his word and doctrine, so must flesh also be the word and doctrine of the flesh. So the "Spirit", that is, his word and teaching, gives life, and "flesh", that is, the word and teaching of the flesh, "is of no use", of which I have written enough elsewhere.

225. the third virtue, so I have to

1) "nothing" put by us instead of: "not" in the issues.

2) In the Jena: so.

The reason for this is that my rule was wrong when I wrote: Where spirit and flesh are set against each other in the Scriptures, the flesh must not be called Christ flesh, but must be called the old Adam. Oh, here the great Christophel of Zurich tears down vain trees, and throws mountain and valley into one another. If I understand his filzicht, zötticht German correctly (which is truly difficult for me), then he makes a distinction between God's spirit and our spirit, which is as necessary to the matter as the fifth wheel to the wagon, without it serving to make the poor rabble think that the great giant of Zurich wants to answer, and is hidden in him vain art.

226 But we do not care whether it is God's Spirit or our spirit, so my rule still stands, that where in Scripture spirit and flesh are set against each other or in opposition to each other, flesh cannot be called Christ's flesh, for his flesh is not against the Spirit, but rather born of the Holy Spirit, and full of the Holy Spirit to boot. But since here Christ says: "Spirit makes alive" and "flesh is of no use", it is clear enough that he means such flesh, which is not spirit, nor has spirit, but is contrary to the spirit: for "to make alive" and "to be of no use" are contrary to each other as death and life, as I have explained further in that book 3).

227 But that the disciples teach me afterwards how the spirit and the flesh rhyme together, as John 1:14: "The Word became flesh", and 1 Peter 3:18: "Christ died according to the flesh, but was made alive according to the spirit", the dear God thanks him; for who could have found this without his help? So my rule holds: Where spirit and flesh are opposed to each other in Scripture 2c. In order that I may confess clearly enough that the spirit and the flesh are not opposed to each other at all ends. For even here the question is not whether flesh and spirit are compatible with one another in Scripture; but this is the question: Where spirit and flesh are not compatible with one another, as here happens: "Flesh is of no use, spirit makes alive," there (I say) flesh cannot be called Christ's flesh.

Here the defiant hero should answer; so he flutters by, and in the meantime another, and teaches us that spirit and flesh are not contrary to each other in some places of the Scriptures; nor is all this called answered; as the one asks: Where does the way go out, and this one answers: I cut out young woodpeckers 2c. Satan is hastening master to chat, where he cannot well answer.

I also urged the little word mea, that Christ should not say here, My flesh is not profitable, as he saith above, My flesh is meat. Then he gives me this notice: "Just as Christ does not say, 'My spirit gives life,' and yet it is his spirit, so he does not say, 'My flesh,' even though it is his flesh. Distort yourself once, little spirit, but Christ does not speak here of his own spirit, which he has personally, but, as the text reads, of the spirit that makes alive, that is, of the common spirit, which is in all believers. Although Christ gives the same, and is Christ's Spirit, yet here he is a common Spirit everywhere where he gives life, for he does not give life to Christ alone. So here flesh must also be the common flesh, which is without spirit and is of no use.

229 Therefore the oppressor needs a real sophistry and deception in the word "my", which is called fallacia figurae dictionis. For above, when Christ speaks Joh. 6, 55: "My flesh is the right food", "my" means his own personal flesh, which is not common to anyone. But when here the Spirit is called his Spirit, it is 1) not his own personal Spirit alone, but the common Spirit in all, which he gives. Therefore "flesh" here cannot be called his flesh, as the spirit is called his spirit; for his flesh is not the common flesh in all. But he who knows nothing to answer must thus make do.

(230) That is enough of the other main thing, in which everyone can see that the swarming spirit cannot bring this saying, "Flesh is of no use," upon Christ's flesh, and how he stands over it with shame, and so can answer nothing at all. For he leaves all the examples in place and remains silent, Since I had so abundantly proven how Abraham, Sarah, Isaac and the rest of the holy flesh would have been of use for faith, and was thus powerfully convinced that much more of Christ's flesh would have to be of use, 2c., I must give him credit for this; it is better that he remain silent and pass by, than that he should suffocate over it and lie down in public; he well feels that it would not help to be angry and blasphemous.

231 So also that he does not answer to the fathers' sayings, but says badly, you Luther do not understand them right, so he does not care much if they do not stand with him 2c. is also well done. What should such a high 2) spirit answer to such ragwork? Well, he may go and be taught, but he shall never become my master nor helper, if God wills that he turn from his blasphemous teaching, not only in this matter, but in all others, since he deceives himself and the people so miserably. May he and all be helped by Christ our Lord, amen.

232 Let us now also hear Oekolampad, how he answers, which I still hope he will not hold with constraint in all things, but only in the sacrament and baptism. God help him out, amen. I have proved above that Oekolampad's trope cannot be in the Lord's Supper, nor should it be; for he cannot prove it. Above that, it is also a perverse and naughty trope against all the tropes of Scripture, so that one must take it to be a deliberate poem; I must make that clear.

233) Wherever a trope or a new word is used in the Scriptures, there are also two interpretations; a new one, over the first 3) old or previous one, as said above. As, the word "vine" in the Scripture has two interpretations, an old and new one. According to the old or first one, it badly means the shrub or plant in the vineyard; according to the new one, it means Christ, Jn. 15:5: "I am a vine," or a child's mother, Ps. 128:3: "Your wife will be like a vine," or what is similar, so that it has a likeness to the vine in fruit, as the orators teach, quae transferun- tur, secundum similitudinem transferuntur, that is, all renewal or tropi happen an equation halden.

234 Now these same tropes in Scripture are done in such a way that the words, according to the old or first interpretation, show the thing that is like the new thing, and according to the new interpretation they show the new right thing or being itself, and not back again. As in this saying, "I am the right vine." Here the word "vine" has become a trope or new word, which cannot interpret back the old vine, which is of the new likeness, but interprets for itself the right new vine itself, which is not a likeness. For Christ is not a likeness of the vine, but again, the vine is a likeness of Christ 2c. Item, "the seed is God's word" (Luc. 8, 11.); here seed does not indicate the grain, which is a likeness of the gospel, but (as a negated word or trope should) it indicates the gospel, the right new seed itself, which is not the likeness. And so henceforth, all tropi in Scripture interpret the right new essence, and not the likeness of that same new essence.

But Oecolampad reverses this, and makes such a trope, or negated word, that interprets back the likeness of the new being, and says that "body" should be called the sign or likeness of the body in the saying, "This is my body," when, if he would follow the Scripture, he should rather negate the word "body" so that it would be called the true new body, to which the natural body of Christ would be a likeness. For the Scripture does not trop back in this way, nor does it read, if I were to trop back in this way: "Christ is a vine" [John 15:5], that is, a sign of the vine. Gospel is a seed, that is, a sign of the seed. "Christ is a lamb" [John 1:29], that is, a sign of the lamb. "Christ is a rock" [Matth. 16, 18.], that is, a sign of the rock. Christ is our Passover, that is, a sign of our Passover. "John is Elijah" [Matth. 11, 14.], that is, a sign of Elijah. Summa Summarum, such a trope is not in the Scriptures, nor is it suitable. Therefore also Oecolampad's trope cannot be valid, since he says: Bread...

is my body, that is, my body's sign; for it is a backward, inverted trope, makes of the right being a likeness or sign, which is not of the Holy Scripture kind, therefore it is a mere poem.

236 But if the text stood thus: Take, eat, this is my righteous bread; then one could make a nice trope, and say very delicately, "Bread is here a new word, which according to the first interpretation means: bad bread, which is a likeness of the body of Christ; and according to the new interpretation it is called the righteous new bread itself, which is the body of Christ. But now the text says: "This is my body", and he wants to make a trope there, he must say according to Scripture: The word "body", according to the old interpretation, means the natural body of Christ, but according to the new interpretation it must mean another, new body of Christ, to which 1) his natural body is a likeness. This would be according to the scriptural way the word right and well negated, that the new text would stand thus: This is my right new body, which is not a likeness; just as I say of Christ: This is our vine, that is, a new right vine, which likeness is the old vine in the vineyard.

237 Whether someone wants to pretend here that one nevertheless finds such an oecolampadstropum in common speech, as when one says of the images: This is St. Peter, this is St. Paul, this is Pope Julius, this is Emperor Nero, and so on. In which speeches the words Peter, Paul, Julius, Nero, are taken for images. First of all, I answer: I do not inquire into this; Oecolampad did not intend to use common speech, but the Scriptures, and he must remain in them and follow the same manner. But if he could show me an example of his tropes in Scripture, then he shall have won, and I will fall to him in all things. But if he does not produce an example, he has lost, and his trope is nothing, and a mere poem.

For the Holy Scripture holds itself with speech, as God holds Himself with action. Now God creates in all ways that the interpretation or

1) In Walch's old edition and in the Erlanger: welchen.

The first likeness was made before, and after that the right essence followed, and the fulfillment of the likenesses. For thus the old testament, as a likeness, goes before, and the new testament follows after, as the right essence. In the same way, when it makes tropes or new words, it takes the old word, which is the likeness, and gives it a new interpretation, which is the right essence.

For what would it be if I said, The gospel is a new testament, that is, a likeness of the new testament? That would be saying so much: The gospel is the old testament. Item, "Christ is the Lamb of God", that is, an image or likeness of the Lamb of God, that would be said as much: Christ is the old paschal lamb of Moses. Likewise does Oecolampad with his backward Trope, since he makes an old word out of the new word "body", and says: It shall be called: This is my body's sign, which is so much said: This is bread. Now here 1) bread shall be the old word, and the body the new, and the word "bread" shall mean the body, not the word "body" the bread. Thus its trope becomes water, and cannot stand in Scripture.

240 Secondly, it is also not true that such a trope of Oecolampad is in some common speech or language in the whole world, and whoever brings me a constant example of it, I will give him my neck. They say that such a trope is in this speech: Here is St. Peter, this is an image of St. Peter; but I say no to it, and they cannot prove it, it is their own false poem. For this is a certain rule in all languages: Where the little word "is" is used in a speech, one certainly speaks of the essence of the same thing, and not of its interpretation. Notice this: I take a wooden or silver rose in front of me and ask: What is this? I am answered: It is a rose. Here I do not ask what it means, but about the essence of what it is; so I am also answered what it is, and not what it means. For it is much a different question when I say: What does it mean? and when I say: What is it? "Is" always refers to the essence itself, which is never missing.

1) Erlanger: je.

(241) Yea, saith thou, it is not a rose, but a wood? Answer: That is good, but it is still a rose; even if it is not a natural rose that has grown in the garden, it is still essentially a rose in its own way; for there are many kinds of roses, as silver, gold, cloth, paper, stone, wood; nevertheless, each one is essentially a rose in its essence, and cannot be a mere interpretation. Yes, how could there be an interpretation that did not have a being first? That which is nothing interprets nothing; but that which interprets must first have a being and a likeness of the other being.

242 Therefore, in the case of a wooden rose, both the essence and the interpretation are to be separated from each other, sicut actum primum et secundum, sicut verbum substantivum et activum; according to the essence, it is truly a rose, namely a wooden rose; after that, if the essence thus stands, one may then say: this rose means or is made after another rose. For these are two different sayings or propositions: This is a rose, and: This means a rose; and he who made a speech out of it would be doing as much as if he took propositionem hypotheticam and categoricam for one proposition; quod est impossibile. How clumsy this thing is, the scholars know well.

Just as the essence of roses is various, wooden, silver, golden, 2c., and yet each one is truly a rose in itself and is called so; so also the word rose often becomes another new word (although it remains the same letter) according to the interpretation, as often as the essence of the roses becomes different and different. So that one may nowhere use Oecolampad's tropes, or say: This is the image of a rose. For it is also not true that whoever says, "This is a rose," wants to say or understand, "This is the likeness of a rose;" but he wants to say what it is in essence. And when he further wants to say what it means, he makes two different speeches and says: This is a rose, and means a rose. And everyone must confess that these two sayings are not equally valid, nor do they speak of the same rose, but each one says something different from the other. I truly know that this is true of all, and no one can deny it.

244 Therefore Oecolampad cannot stand with his Trope, that he wants to let these two speeches count equally, "this is my body", and "this is my body's likeness"; because neither tongue nor language suffers this. Equal as not can apply equally, if I say of the image of St. Paul: This is St. Paul, and: This means St. Paul. For the first speech wants to say what the image is, that it is St. Paul, namely a wooden St. Paul, a silver St. Paul, a gold St. Paul, a painted St. Paul. In short, the little word "is" speaks of the essence, be it whatever essence it is, and here St. Paul has become a new word, which is not called the living St. Paul. After that, when I further ask: What does it mean? There is immediately another speech, which now does not speak of the essence, but of the interpretation. So that, just as essence and interpretation are not the same, neither can they be expressed with the same words or speeches; each must have its own special speech.

If now Oecolampad is to stand with his trope, then he must also make two speeches in the Lord's Supper; one of the essence, thus: "This is my body", because there is an "is", which wants and must speak of the essence. Since in the Lord's Supper there is no more than the one speech that speaks of the essence, namely, "This is my body," it must be spoken of an essential body of Christ, God granting that the same body be wooden, silver, or whatever He wills; for there is an "is" that wants to have a body of Christ, which is and is called Christ's body; just as it is common language that there must be a Paul when one says of the image: This is Paul. So Oecolampad must have a body of Christ in the Lord's Supper, he may think whether he wants to make it of bread, wood, clay or stone; the trope must have a body of Christ, because the other speech is not included: This means, or: This is my body's sign, but thus: "This is my body".

246 Summa Summarum, as I have said about the rose, where in a speech the word rose is to become a new word or trope, there must come two roses, both of which bear the name rose with truth; one that signifies, the other that is signified, and each of the two roses must truly be and be called a rose, though each in its own way, one wooden, the other natural. So also, if the word "my body" is to become a new word or trope in the Lord's Supper discourse, two bodies of Christ must also be added, both of which bear the name "my body" with truth; one which signifies, the other which is signified. So that each of the two bodies of Christ is truly and rightly called one body of Christ, and be it essential that it be like wood, silver, or brass.

If Oecolampad can prove that bread is truly the body of Christ, and may say that it is the body of Christ, which is a likeness of the natural body of Christ, as the wooden rose is truly a rose, and a likeness of the natural rose, he has thus accomplished so much that his trope may be found to be an example, and his trope to be like that which is commonly spoken of in images: This is St. Peter, this is St. Paul 2c., whether it is not yet a trope according to the Scriptures. But if it is not, then its trope is nothing apart from Scripture. How then will he prove that bread is and is called the body of Christ, or that Christ has a body of bread, as St. Paul has a body of wood 1)? Now he must do it, or it is lurking; 2) and if he were to find it, what good would it do? if, nevertheless, such a trope is not valid in Scripture. Because his trope has no exemplars either in Scripture or outside of Scripture, indeed, it is contrary to Scripture and all languages, one can well conclude that it is a purely useless poem.

248 Oecolampad has deceived himself in the saying Tertulliani: Äoo ost figura corporis msi, that is my body's shape, there he has considered IlZura or shape for a tropum. For it is good to note that Oecolampad has not invented such a trope from himself, nor taken from the Scriptures, because neither Scripture nor no

1) Thus Walch has already changed instead of: "as St. Paul has a wooden St. Paul" what the editions offer.

2) In the Jena: Lürtzsch. We assume that this is an Onomatopoeia, after the manner of "futsch" - lost.

Language thus speaks; but at Tertulliani saying he has run on, and stumbled at it, that he has been misled. Tertullianus, however, does not make a tropum there, but gives an exposition or explanation, 1) how bread is the body of Christ, namely, that it is the figure, under which the body of Christ is, and does not speak of vocabulis, sed de rebus, since he says: Hoc est figura corporis mei, quia panis non est figura sermonis in Grammatica, sed figura rei in natura. And Tertullianus cannot be so great gewesep that he wanted to say that Christ made of the bread a vocabulum in Grammatica, as it MUST follow from Oecolampad's opinion. Sic, panem fecit corpus suum, id est, figuram corporis sui, hoc est, figuram grammaticam; quia talis figura nec in re, nec in usu Scripturae est, quod panis sit figura Corporis Christi.

Hereby, I think, Oecolampad should be deprived of his trope and sign, just as Zwingel is deprived of his interpretation, and Carlstadt is deprived of his xxxxx, that none of them has nor can have his text, and thus all of them sit naked and bare in the Lord's Supper without text. Now if they have no text, they can have neither sense nor understanding. If they have no understanding, they cannot know whether they have vain bread and wine or not. For they must first come to know what they have in the Lord's Supper. But they cannot get there unless they get certain text and understanding. But they can never get that, as we have proved. So we conclude: The enthusiasts themselves do not know what they have in the Lord's Supper. O of the fine spirit! O of the beautiful supper! That is truly sitting and eating in darkness, since one does not know what one is eating or where one is sitting. O dear one, for God's sake give a penny for the light to the poor spirit.

(250) Not that I scoff at the visionaries and their God, but I do so in words; for I am not Elijah, who may scoff at the most holy prophets of Baal, especially because they themselves testify, and though they sit in darkness, yet they have seen that Luther has lost his spirit, and has become a Saul.

1) Erlanger: Transfiguration or Exposure.

and cannot understand that bread is bread, which dogs and sows understand. For if I wanted to mock them, I wanted to advise them in such misery and distress that they followed one of their disciples, who asked one another about the sacrament, and at last, when he had nothing left, he said: Oh, my dear brother, it is truly said in the Greek: hoc est tropus²) meus, unb ἡρίφί, hoc est corpus meum. So they would like to get nevertheless a certain text, and so long tropus, until they hit it once.

But if they disdain this, let them do as that priest did, who came to about two other priests, and found them high, grieved, in this very matter of the sacrament, above the text, hoc est corpus meum; one of them argued, 3) it should be called hoc est corpus, meus, the other, it should be called hoc est corpus meum, so that it would rhyme. When they then put the matter to the third to judge, he said: Truly, it has also often troubled me; but I do to him so, when I come to the same text, I pray a Hail Mary for it. Now here is a big question, which one did I consecrate? We will leave that aside now. For since our enthusiasts do not consecrate or perform, 4) and yet sit over the text in such doubt, error, disagreement and gloom, it would be good for them, according to the example, to pray a Hail Mary instead of the uncertain text; or, since they are afraid to be old or new papists, and are too afraid of Mary and the saints or images, they might sing for it: Christ is risen, or, Christ ascended to heaven; because such singing and words especially conflict with the text in the Lord's Supper, and make the same so uncertain. For it should pity a stone that such high enlightened spirits, who otherwise have as many suns in their heads as hair on their heads, should sit in darkness in this piece alone, so that they do not see even a little star.

2) Thus the Erlanger and Walch in a note. The Wittenberg and the Jena edition: corpus. We have given preference to the former reading because corxus M6U8 is repeated in the next paragraph in the example that follows immediately.

252. If anyone thinks that I am too harsh in my attack on the devotees and too contemptuous of them, I beg him to think that, although I am a lesser Christian, I am not unreasonably displeased with Satan, who makes nothing else out of my Lord and Savior Jesus Christ but a reckless fool, and mocks him as if he had been a mule or a drunkard in the Lord's Supper. First of all, because they interpret Christ in his words and works in such a way that there is nothing more in the Lord's Supper than merely to receive bread and wine and to commemorate the death of the Lord, they may not use this text "this is my body" 2c., "this is my blood" 2c. anywhere, and it is entirely a vain, unnecessary, useless text, without which the Lord's Supper can well and completely be held. For they have enough text left, when they read thus: "Take, eat; take, drink; these things do in remembrance of me." In these words they have their supper wholly and completely. Therefore Christ must be a real fool, who at his end is such a useless washer, and puts such unnecessary text "this is my body" 2c., "this is my blood" 2c., which such high spirits can well guess, and in addition are also hostile to him, and would gladly have out. For, let them say, what use is such a text, if they can well commemorate the death of the Lord with bread and wine (which is to be the main part and some cause of the Lord's Supper) without such a text?

Secondly, if the bread and wine of the Lord signify the body and blood, what need is there that Christ should teach us such an interpretation just this once? For, although one should not ask why God does something; but since he must be a fool here, I do not ask this unreasonably. Or what use is it if I know that the bread means the body of the Lord? What good is such an allegory to faith, which even the devils and the ungodly can invent? Again, what good and harm would it be if I never knew that bread means Christ's body, but kept bread badly? Did Christ have nothing to teach, because that is not useful at all, and even we may invent of ourselves afterwards without his teaching, and that the devil and the wicked may invent it?

Devil and his own can? And especially because there is no analogia fidei; for all the words of Christ must drive faith and love and "be similar to faith," Rom. 12:7. No, he had to prove his foolishness and not only burden us with vain, useless text, but also teach useless, useless art, which one can well have without his teaching and over all the tables of the wicked.

254 Above this, he teaches such useless art in such obscure words that the apostles at that time did not understand it; as we read that they never or rarely understood his speech when he spoke in unison, and he always had to tell them the interpretation. How then did he become so envious in the supreme work of his love, and give no interpretation to the foolish, simple-minded disciples, and let them remain in such obscure words, which they could not understand without interpretation otherwise than as they read, and yet is so mild in other places with his interpretation? The short answer is that Christ, as a fool, before the rest of his leisure, wanted to fool and ape the disciples with useless and obscure words, without which they might well have taken the Lord's Supper with him.

Thirdly, this is the greatest foolishness of all, that he says the bread means, or is, a likeness of his body, given for us, and the cup, or because, is a likeness of his blood, poured out for us. Dear, where is such likeness in the bread and cup of wine? For where there is to be a figure, symbol or likeness, since one is to signify the other, there must be something the same in both, so that the likeness stands, as John 15:4. The vine is a likeness or figure of Christ, in which, as he himself says, that "just as the branch cannot bear fruit, but withers unless it abides in the vine"; item, Elijah is a figure or likeness of John, in which, as the angel Gabriel says, Luc. 1, 17. that he has the same spirit and power with Elijah; the paschal lamb is a likeness of Christ, in which, as Apocalypse 1) [Cap. 5, 6, 13, 8.] says, that he was slain and sacrificed for us; and so henceforth in all figures and likenesses there must be something in which the likeness stands, and rhymes with both. But here in the bread and wine cup there is nothing in which Christ's body and blood should be like them.

1) In Walch's old edition and in the Erlanger: "Apostg."

When Christ therefore says, the bread is of my body, given for you, the same, the cup of wine is of my blood, poured out for you, the same, it is just as if he said, the bread, which has no likeness at all of my body, given for you, is nevertheless of my body, given for you, the same; just as if I spoke from St. Paul [2 Cor. Paul [2 Cor. 6, 15, 14.]: Belial, who has no likeness at all to Christ, is nevertheless a likeness of Christ; the light, which rhymes nothing with darkness, rhymes nevertheless well with darkness 2c. What kind of people are those who talk like this, everyone knows well, namely, mad, nonsensical fools, or lottery boys, who talk about tables of iron birds flying over the lake, or of black snow falling in summer, so that they cause laughter among the guests. The same foolish fools or fools make of Christ, when they accuse him of saying that the bread is my body, given for you, likeness, when there is nothing of this likeness anywhere in the bread.

257 But whether they would pretend that the likeness is that as the bread is eaten and the cup of wine drunk, so Christ's body is eaten spiritually and his blood drunk spiritually 2c. Dear, this is not speaking. For the enthusiasts do not put the trope on these words: "Take, eat", or give thanks 2c., but on these words: "This is my body, given for you", therefore here one does not ask about the likeness in eating, taking, giving thanks. Here, here, I say, a likeness must be shown in the bread, how it is given, killed, martyred, and sacrificed for us, for the remission of sins, that it may be a figure or likeness, and be called the body of Christ, given for us, for the remission of sins, as the words are; or Christ is a fool to call the bread a likeness, when it is not, nor can be, such a likeness. So also in the cup

In the same way as the wine is poured out for us for salvation, Christ's blood is also poured out for the forgiveness of sins.

For so does Moses with his parables, showing how the oxen and calves are slain and sacrificed, and their blood poured out on the floor of the altar, and sprinkled for the remission of sins, and to cleanse the people and the tabernacles, and all the vessels, as the epistle to the Hebrews masterfully shows us such a likeness [Cap. 9:12]. And especially the paschal lamb has a very fine likeness to the body of Christ, given for us for the remission of sins, in that it is slain and sacrificed, its blood poured out, sprinkled and sprinkled at the door, for redemption from the destroyer. Such likeness must also be shown in the bread and wine; or we must say that it is a fool who likens them to the body and blood of Christ, given and shed for us for the remission of sins, when nothing of such likeness is to be found anywhere in them. For if it be likeness, there must be something like it in it; or if it be called likeness, it is a lie and a falsehood.

If Christ would have instituted a supper, in which not his body and blood, but the likeness of his body and blood would have been inside, he would have left us the old supper of Moses with the paschal lamb, which out of measure and all around, through and through, most finely signifies his body, given for us, and his blood, shed for us for the remission of sins, and is a figure or likeness, as all the world well knows. Why then does he fool, and abolish such a fine supper of the Old Testament, and set up against it such a supper, which after all is nothing at all compared with that, neither with interpretation nor with essence?

(260) So you might say to him that the New Testament is to be a fulfillment and light compared to the Old Testament, but you turn it around and say that the New Testament is an emptying and darkness compared to the Old Testament. For there is a lamb, a living body, sacrificed for the people, which signifies the body of Christ much more brightly and clearly than bad bread, which is the same.

is a dark likeness to the Lamb. And there is blood of the lamb, which interprets Christ's blood much more brightly and clearly than bad wine. In sum, this supper is in no way comparable to it in interpretation and likeness. Therefore, if everything in the New Testament is to be more complete than in the Old, even the likeness, then Christ should have left us with that supper; or it will not be true that bad bread and wine are in our supper; for it must truly surpass that supper of Moses by far, otherwise Christ would not have raised that one.

261) Here, however, the enthusiasts will seek an evasion and pretend that St. Paul 1 Cor. 11, 24. says in his text: "This is my body, which is broken for you. There is the similitude and interpretation in the breaking, that as the bread is broken over the table, so also Christ was martyred for us on the cross 2c. O who then would not have forbidden to honor the saints and to have images, would now fall down before St. Paul's image and call out: O holy St. Paul, help us poor, miserable, forsaken enthusiasts against the raging Luther; see how he drives us are revengeful until we can no longer, you alone can help us when you say that Christ's body is broken. But briefly. St. Paul cannot and will not help-because the images of the saints have ears and do not hear [Ps. 115, 6].

262 First, that "broken" here means as much as crucified, they say from their head, but they can prove it just as little as they can prove the likeness in the bread to the body of Christ, and is vain uncertain gossip, ignotum per ignotum. But we demand certain proof of such likeness. For since they boast so certainly of their thing, let them also make it certain, or let them stand sure. 1)

263 Secondly, I have said above that the fanciers do not place the tropum or similitude in the words, "Take, eat, give thanks," nor in these words, "Christ took bread, broke it, and gave it to the disciples. Here they leave these words "take-

1) "Gack stehen" - to stand at the pillory. Gack - kaak, pillory.

The words "men," "break," "give," "bread," "disciples," all remain without a trope, bad, as they read. Therefore they may not afterwards make "breaking" a trope, since Paul says, "This is my body broken for you"; for it is of the same breaking that he says above, "He took bread and broke it," until they prove conclusively that there is another breaking. But we say that the breaking is the same in both places, and may not Christ's crucifixion or suffering be understood by it. For Christ did not catch Himself, crucify Himself, nor kill Himself, as He ought to have done, when breaking should have meant killing, for He Himself took the bread and broke it with His own hands.

264 Third, let us stick to the Scriptures, that "breaking bread" means giving out bread, as I have proved "against the heavenly prophets," and St. Paul says: "The bread we break is the giving out of the body of Christ," 1 Cor. 10:16. And it is quite sacrilegious for anyone to call breaking as much as crucifying or killing without Scripture; for even breaking is nowhere as much as strangling or killing. Therefore it is a pure poem, that the enthusiasts wanted to mend their ways with it. But it is meant to indicate a certain likeness that the bread has with the body of Christ, given for us. Even if the breaking were the likeness (as it is not), there is not yet the main part of the likeness, namely, that the bread is broken for us and the wine is poured out. For the bread and wine should and must be a likeness of the body and blood of Christ, given and poured out for us, so that we are redeemed by it, as the text reads: "This is my body and blood, given and poured out for you for the forgiveness of sins. Such a likeness, however, cannot be broken; but the paschal lamb and the old supper can from the covenants.

265 Therefore, wine and bread cannot be the same here, nor can they be called the body and blood of Christ, as the words in the Lord's Supper indicate.

2) In the Wittenberg and the Jena: "losunge", that is, solution.

talk about it. I will keep silent that John completely denies the word "break" from the suffering of Christ, since he writes that in. He writes that not even one of Christ's legs was broken, "so that the Scripture might be fulfilled: You shall not break his leg" 2c. Therefore the Scripture does not suffer that one rhymes breaking with Christ's suffering or death.

266 Fourthly, I now say that by the breaking of the bread it is like the crucified body of Christ, as it is not; but how will it be in the other part with the cup or chalice of wine? How will the wine here be a likeness of the shed blood of Christ for our sin? For drinking is a likeness, not of the shed blood of Christ, but of spiritual drinking, that is, of faith, as they themselves teach. Here the poor cup of wine stands so bare in all shame, that it could not stand more shamefully; for it has not a likeness in itself, and yet it is to be a likeness, and to be called the blood of Christ poured out for us.

Where are you now, St. Paul? If you had said about the cup, how Christ's hands would have trembled and spilled the cup, we poor enthusiasts could have lived for a while with the same spilling, as we now live for an hour with the breaking. If St. John, sitting in Christ's arms, had bumped Christ's elbow with his head when he took the cup and gave it to the disciples, we would have enough and could say, "Behold, the wine is like the shed blood of Christ, in that it was spilled. Whether then such spilling is not done for our salvation or benefit, and so is not like the blood of Christ in the main part of the likeness, as the words in the Lord's Supper demand, let it nevertheless be done for the salvation of us poor enthusiasts from this great misery and shame, that otherwise we can show no likeness, and yet have cried out so long ago, so far and wide, and with so many books, that the wine is like the blood of Christ.

1) So the Wittenbergers and the Jenaers: Am". Walch and the Erlanger: "one a large" 2c. "Amen" are the little fuses or points into which the ears of grain run out. In § 421 of this writing, Luther says: "Can they not indicate a little Gleichniß."

Be like and a figure of the blood of Christ, shed for us for the remission of sins, and now is not found one jar of such likeness.

268 See what the mockers of our Lord Christ gain, and who best makes a fool of the other. For their figura nec grammatica, nec theologica, nec naturalis esse potest, that is, their likeness consists of nothing; for there is no such likeness to be found either in words, or in sacred Scripture, or in nature. If it were in words, the word "body" would have to become two words, and yet remain one letter, and be called two bodies of Christ, just as the word "vine" becomes two words, and yet remains one letter, and is called two vines. Now bread cannot be Christ's body, nor can it be called Christ's body. If it were in the Scriptures, the bread would have to have such likenesses in itself, which Christ's body, given for us, would show, as all other likenesses do in the Scriptures. But if it is a natural likeness, then the bread would have to be as similar to the body as a wooden rose is to the natural rose. For this is called a natural likeness, when every one perceives by nature, without all teaching, what it shows, as the pictures show. For whoever knows a rose, no one may say that a painted rose is equal to a natural rose. But so bread is never like the body of Christ, let it be said that it should be like him, as he was given for us.

So, where one turns to the arrogance of the enthusiasts, he is lazy and nothing. For we have proved above that they have no certain text at all. But now, even if we would like to accept their text as certain, the prankster does not want to keep it, and becomes nothing to us under our hands. For who can remain with such a text, which thus reads: The bread is the likeness of Christ's body; and yet cannot be the likeness of Christ's body? Who can say "no" and "yes" at the same time in one speech and about one thing? They are like that fool who built a water mill on a mountain; when the mill was ready, he was asked where he would take water. Then said he, Behold, I never thought of that.

(270) So also the enthusiasts are so eager for interpretation and likeness that they cannot think of anything before it. If, then, one would like to give them the benefit of the doubt and accept such a likeness, and would like them to teach that such a likeness of the bread to the body of Christ exists, they must also say, "Behold, we have never thought of this; we thought that if we called it a likeness, it would be there; for our spirit wanted to be God from the beginning, so that everything he said would be true. Behold, that is to say, it is called itself with its own words.

271 Although the Tropus of the devils has been pushed hard enough, they will not be able to give way, nor will they be able to keep quiet; for who can shut the devil's mouth? Such devils do not go out without fasting and praying, they want and must have won for a while. They will say how the parables do not 1) apply in all things, and may bread be Christ's body's likeness in other things, but in that "Christ's body is given for us" as in eating, take 2c. To this it has been answered enough above, that they themselves have not sought nor placed the likeness of such words or pieces in the Lord's Supper, but on the body given for us. If they now find likenesses in other pieces, they do not approach the Lord's Supper and do not help their conceit; they must remain on this piece: This is a likeness of my body given for you. If they do not denounce it, and come in with it, they stand as the fur on their sleeves. Let this be said enough of the tropes for the present, so that our people, and those who wish to remain true, may well protect themselves against the devil's gossip.

272 Further, since Oecolampad complains about me, how I blaspheme, item, my writing of the devil anfahe, as the Zwingel also fools, and some say, at seven and seventy times I have called the devil, is a laudable, honest thing, but highly necessary to write, because one can answer nothing. Why don't they also count how many times I call God and Christ, and how I fight for Christ against the devil? Yes, that

The viper breed wants to boast of love, peace and moderation, and is as full of poison as a colorful newt.

I have made it clear to myself that I am not writing against flesh and blood (as St. Paul teaches), but against the devil and his members; therefore I am doing the right thing when I mention the other word devil. Should I then become so shy for the sake of the tender, highly spiritual, deeply holy enthusiasts that I should not even name my enemy? I will also gladly let it be called blasphemed and raged, where I attack the devil so freshly and cheerfully in his messengers, because my free, public, simple biting against the devil shall be dearer to me than their poisonous murderous stabbing, which they practice under the appearance of peace and love against the sincere, as the Psalter says of such vipers 2c.

274 Thirdly, he writes that this text "this is my body" is not clear, as I claim, because Christ's body is not visibly there; I also do not prove such my affirmatives; the reason is that I do not bring up a scripture that Christ's invisible body is there; so it does not rhyme either, because Christ's body is visibly given for us, and the text speaks of such Christ's body as is given for us, that it should be invisibly there. I answer, "For the scribblers, of course, I have not proved anything, nor can I ever do so, for they neither want to read nor know nor understand how the Psalter saws, so that they plug their ears like a snake, so that they do not hear the wise magician's voice [Ps. 58:5, 6]. For our people I have made this text clear enough (I know that), and given such a rule: Let the words of Scripture be taken for what they are according to their nature, and let no other interpretation be given, except by a public article of faith. Such rule is in my book. Nor does the Oecolampad say that I have given no rule. Since these words: "This is my body", according to the manner and sound of all languages, are not called bread or a sign of the body, but Christ's body, they should be left as they are, and nothing else should be interpreted, except by the Scriptures.

1) In the Erlanger is missing: "Not".

275 Where mau now has such words, which have certain interpretation, known to everyone, and no other interpretation is proven, these are called clear, dry, bright words and text. For no man on earth has ever heard that "body" should be called a likeness of the body, and is a new, dark, unknown interpretation in all the world, so it must be proved quite strongly. But the first interpretation is clear and certain in itself, as everyone is aware of it. Is it not a fine thing that Oecolampad brings up a new, unknown, dark, uncertain interpretation, and thereby wants to create that the old interpretation should be dark and uncertain? In this way, no word in Scripture would remain clear if any spirit were given the space to bring a new interpretation to it, and then say: The old interpretation is dark and uncertain. But what this lazy consequence, which here Oecolampad makes, namely, the text says: "This is my body, given for you"; now he is visibly given for us, therefore his body cannot be there invisibly, I have shown enough above to the Zwingel; but it is the sheriff once without red pants in the bath, and not in the bath.

I did not know that Oecolampad was such a wicked, poor logician or dialectician that he would also take quod pro qualiter and syllogize ab accidente ad substantiam. In Zwingel it is no wonder, he is a self-grown doctor, they are used to guessing like that. Truly, he who wants to dispute, and does not yet know his puerilia in Logica, what good should he do? Hereby Oecolampad annoys me so much that I can henceforth have no special understanding for him. For even if he is not allowed to know the useless sophistry and sophistry of the sophists, he should know the puerilia, that is, common dialectica, as regulas consequentiae, formas syllogismorum, species argumentationis, etc., well. Unless I have pushed him with the truth in such a way (as I think) that he cannot well see what he is talking about.

277 For, tell me, who can think that a prudent man can say what Oecolampad says here, namely that this text "this is my body" is therefore not clear, because the body of Christ is not visible in the sacrament, and only the faithful understand such words, as Augustine should say? Should a text therefore be unclear, if the thing is invisible, and only the believer grasps such? Which part then wants to remain clear in Scripture? If everything that faith teaches is invisible, then this text should not be clear: "God created the heavens and the heirs" [Gen. 1:1], because God and his creation are invisible. How can it be made clear that in the Lord's Supper there is only bread and wine? For whether there is anything more is invisible. What does such illusion help the spirit, if they disgrace themselves? Truly, with such loose theidings they will not bring us to themselves and confirm their thing for a long time.

But we know that these words, "This is my body," 2c. are clear and bright. For if any Christian or Gentile, Jew or Turk, hear them, he must confess that they speak of the body of Christ which is in the bread. Otherwise, how could the Gentiles and Jews mock us and say that the Christians devour their God, if they did not understand this text brightly and clearly? But that what is said is grasped by the believer and despised by the unbeliever is not the fault of darkness or clarity in words, but of the hearts that hear it.

Poets are able to speak in the most subtle of words, not only about invisible things, but also about trivial things. How is many a man deceived by liars with beautiful words, which he so heartily understands what they mean? How are people now deceived by liars, who speak of invisible things, precisely because they understand the words clearly? Yes, the words are sometimes brighter and clearer, so that people are deceived, and talk of nothing, than those who speak of the truth. For if the words were not understood brightly and clearly, what they mean, they would remain unconvinced. But (as I said) Oecolampad and this spirit lack the puerili dialectica, bab er ex difficultate vel obscuritate intelligendi in re infert obscuritatem significandi in vocabulis; hoc est, maler dividere, tertiam partem scilicet Dialecticae or figure, unless you need dry, simple, common words to ignorare. do so.

280 It is the same cleverness that he pretends that because the Lord's Supper is a sacrament, the words "this is my body," that is, a sign of my body, must also be understood sacramentally; what is the use of such jugglery? I heartily admit that the Lord's Supper is a sacrament, though it is not so called in Scripture, but how does it follow that the words should be sacramental, tropical, or (as they say) figurative? Is it not a pretty consequence: there is a sacrament; therefore the words in it must be taken figuratively? Dear, why are not the other words also taken figuratively, and does the trope only go over the word "is" or "body"?

281 Or where is there a rule that tells us last which ones must be taken figuratively and which ones must not? For on this teaching I will also make the words: "Take, eat, do these things in remembrance of me," tropes, and say: "Take" means to hear, "eat" means to believe, "do these things" means to think in the heart, "remembrance" means a crucifix or some other sign of thought. The cause should be this: Here is a sacrament, therefore the words inside must be taken sacramentally or figuratively; for I know of no reason why these, as well as those, should not be taken figuratively. God himself should not be able to use a sacrament in this way; for how can he speak of sacraments, if all his words are understood differently than they are? If he speaks plainly of the manner of words, it is not a sacrament; for they are not tropes or figurative words. If he speaks figurative words, one does not know what he says. It is a fool's work.

Since Moses installs the paschal lamb, which was an image and figure of Christ, he does not need a figurative word at all, but dry, clear, simple words, as they were in common usage, and all the figures of the Old Testament are spoken with dry, simple, clear words, and there is not one in all of them that is spoken figuratively. That one must reverse Oecolampad's rule, and say: One cannot speak of any sacrament.

Otherwise, who would understand it if Moses said, Exodus 12:3, 5: "You shall take a lamb of the year and eat it," 2c. if he did not mean to indicate a natural lamb and eating, but should be the opinion: You shall take a sign of the lamb of the year, and eat spiritually? Also, who would understand John when he said John 1:26, "I baptize with water," if he was not speaking of natural water and baptizing, but should have the opinion: I baptize with a sign of water? Ah, what shall I say? If Oecolampad does not write this out of malice (as I hope), then I have not heard a sillier, more simple, more thoughtless man to the learned man all my days; but it is all straight against himself, what he only wants to say for himself.

But I worry that the devil is looking for something else in this (for who is safe from the devil among us?), namely, because he knows that Christ is called a sacrament in Scripture, as 1 Tim. 3, he wants to go out there, that figurative words should also be, when one says: Christ is God and man 2c. For he must have something in mind, he does not say this for nothing. Summa, the Oecolampad here lacks the puerili dialectica, which teaches bene dividere, that is, to speak differently. For the sacrament or history, 1) and the words spoken of the sacrament, are two different things. The sacrament or history is supposed to be a sign or likeness of another thing, but the words are not supposed to mean anything else, because they are. 2) But the words with which Moses speaks of the paschal lamb should simply teach that same paschal lamb and nothing else. Item, the circumcision is to model the killing of Adam, but the words that Moses speaks about the circumcision are to teach about the physical circumcision. So baptism is to mean the drowning of sins; but the words of baptism are simply to teach immersion in water.

1) History - what happens, event, occurrence.

2) sign - designate. Erlanger: show.

So also the sacrament of the Lord's Supper is to model and signify something, 1) namely, the unity of Christians in one spiritual body of Christ, through one spirit, faith, love and cross 2c. But the words of such sacrament should and must give simply what they ring. But my dear Oecolampad meets here blinzing 2) a right Zwingelische Allöösön, and therefore changes in the dark, and makes Res est figurativa, ergo verba de rebus figurativis sunt figurativa. That must be a good silly Father to me, who comes into this matter truly innocent, and would probably have remained outside.

Because I consider that he does it out of pure simplicity, I will grant him this, since he is much concerned about the saying Gen. 17:10 ff. that circumcision is a covenant, when it should be a sign of the covenant. For my Genesis does not say that circumcision is a covenant and a sign, as I wanted to prove, that it should hurt the devil. But since it does not help the matter, even if he would be right there, I let it go; for this would not yet prove that therefore in the Lord's Supper the body must also be the body's sign. I will also give him the same thing, since he makes a spiritual rock out of the natural one in Paul's saying [1 Cor. 10:4, 2 Mos. 17:6]: "The rock was Christ," since he thus speaks from his head and proves nothing; and even if he could still prove it tomorrow, it still does not follow that therefore the body must also be the sign of the body here. So also the saying 2 Mos. 12, 11: "It is the Lord's Passover", because enough is said about such sayings and about the tropes above. To the main thing we want to come, how the scripture should be against our mind, perhaps the jokes will be found here.

The Scripture urges that Christ is not in the Lord's Supper. Which? Since Christ says: "You have the poor with you always, but you will not have me" [Matth. 26, 11]. Item, Christ will not be sought here and there 2c. [Matth. 24, 26.] Because

Now "being there" and "not being there" are contrary to each other, so there must be vain bread in the Lord's Supper. Enough has been said about these sayings. In my next booklets, however, I had requested that they should not tell us that such sayings are contrary to one another, for we had now heard such things from them long enough, and knew almost well that they say so; but they should prove it. Oecolampad is just as silent about this as Zwingel; therefore, what they say is nothing. For it can both be true that Christ is there at the same time, in another and in another form; he has more than one way of being sth. 3) as is said above.

Since I said of the right hand of God that Christ's body must be where God is, Oecolampad also concludes, like Zwingel, that Christ must not have a right hand, and spins the same yarn that Zwingel spins, namely, that Christ's body must be as great as heaven and earth, and yet incomprehensible. He should prove this consequence, but he is silent again. In short, the spirit does not want to answer, since one asks. We say no to it, Christ's body should not be as wide as heaven and earth. God himself is not so great and wide, who is everywhere. Although I have said much about this above, I must also admit a little against Oecolampad. Because God can do more than we understand, we do not have to say that the two are contrary to each other, Christ's body in heaven and in bread, just according to our conceit and reasoning, because they are both God's word; but we must prove with Scripture that they are contrary to each other. As long as this is not done, faith says: God can keep Christ's body in heaven in one way and in bread in another way. If there is another way and another way on both sides, then it is not contrary to one another.

289) Just as it is not contrary to one another that Christ sat with the disciples after His resurrection, Luc. 24, 36. ff, and yet at the same time was not with them, as He says there, "These things I said while I was still with you.

3) "etwo" (i.e. somewhere) will, as before in this writing many times, probably also be read here instead of "about", because Luther refers to the above comparisons §§ 139. 154 2c. In the editions it says: "about".

1) sign - designate. Erlanger: show.
2) i.e. blindly.

Here it says "with you" and "not with you," yet they are not contrary to each other. For the Kinderdialectica teaches that contradictoria debent fieri ad idem, secundum idem, circa idem, etc., that is, such spirits should be led to school, and Petrus Hispanus 1) teaches, that they may well.

290. But I must give a rough simile: Behold, the sun shines into a large lake or pond, there must of course be no more than one image of the sun in the water, because there is only One sun; How is it, then, that if a hundred and a hundred stood around the lake, each would have the image of the sun before him in his own place, and none in the other's place; and if he went around the lake, the image would go with him, and be in all the places where he went; and if a thousand eyes looked in, each would see the image before him, and not before the other?

291 Well, this is one creature, and can be in all places in the lake. Dear, who would have us deny that God knows no more than one way, and is able to make Christ's whole body be what it will, wherever it will, or where it will? Here, here, I say, one must first answer and prove that God's power is not able to do this. If this is not proven, it is 2) a terrible sacrilege to reproach the two against each other, Christ's body in heaven and the Lord's Supper, because they cannot be sure of it, and yet the certain words of God stand there: "This is my body."

But here the wise spirits do not hear, yes, they should laugh at us with such parables. Therefore I speak to ours thus: Let them laugh, quod, pro qualiter, carnem pro divinitate, et contra, accipere et, ignorantia tota Logicae, vitiosissime disputare, it is enough for us that they prove nothing. I want to set another simile: If a pillar stands in the square, if a thousand and a thousand eyes were around it and looked at it, then every eye grasps the same pillar completely in its face, and none hinders the other; and if the pillar is also completely in every eye and before every eye, as

If they were all one eye and one face, for none sees less or more of the column than the other, and such a likeness could be shown much more, especially from mathematics; but because we are used to it, no one considers it a miracle. That is why it is such a miracle to the mad mind that one body should be in many places at the same time, because it does not see it.

Of course, it would be a great and incredible miracle if there were no eye, and we had only the four senses of touch, smell, taste, and hearing, which must feel not far away, but close by, and so it was preached how God could create a member that could reach and feel through and over eight, nine, ten miles in an instant, namely an eye. Even a born blind man should be surprised and say: "My dear, how is it possible? My hand does not feel a cubit away, my tongue does not taste a finger's breadth, my nose does not smell a span away, my ear, if it hears afar, hears it a street away, and you tell me about a limb that feels ten miles away?"

But we, who see, no longer consider it a miracle, for we feel further with our eyes, namely, up to the sun and the stars, even from the beginning to the end. Now the eye is a bodily, carnal thing, and in addition one eye should grasp half the world in an instant, and at the same time be in all the places of half the world with its face. Why then should we measure and measure God's power, as if He could not do more with the body of Christ than He does with our mortal eye, when our eyes are so much less against God's power and work than the blind man's sense and taste against our sight?

295 Because the bright, dry words of God are written here, "This is my body," so that neither in Scripture nor in any language has it ever been heard that this word "my body" is spoken or understood in any other way than it is slurred, and divine power is unconscious to us, and is nowhere contrary to Scripture, and is much the same in natural works, even though the enthusiasts are caught up in so many false lies and groundless reasons about it, it is only fair that God should be heard in the Scriptures.

1) The first textbook of logic in that time.

2) Erlanger; is.

more than our own conceit. If the enthusiasts were to be falsely invented in one piece, then we would be sufficiently warned by God not to believe them, and to remain with the words of God. For the Holy Spirit does not deny, nor lack, nor doubt. Now, by God's grace, we have found them false and lying in almost all things. In the others, however, we have found them to be least uncertain and doubtful, so that even if I were uncertain of my mind and would gladly fall for them, I cannot do so, because I so publicly see either lies or doubts, and not one sound or certain reason.

296 Since I had proved that two bodies could be in one place at the same time, as when Christ came through a closed door, which is as great a miracle as that one body should be in two places, he says it is nothing. For there are other ways in which Christ came in through a closed door, namely, by the subtilty of the body he put himself in, so that there should not be two bodies in one place. If I now ask, what are these ways, and how did the subtilty come in? then silence applies. I consider that one way is to the church, that Oecolampad, since he should answer, had to go preach; the other way is a bad memory, that he forgot to answer it afterwards.

So does this spirit, muttering a word or two, so that no one knows what he says, and that is answered. Can he find the subtilty of the body of Christ, that Christ goes in at the door, and that there are not two bodies in one place, dear, how can he not also find the subtilty that he is in the bread at the same time, and does not have to go down from heaven like a stone from the roof? But they do not escape me with the subtilty, it is nevertheless the same Christ's body, and the door is also closed, and Christ is not closed in between the cracks or nail holes; he had bone and flesh, as he himself confesses, Luc. 24, 39.

298) To the appearance of Christ to St. Stephen, Acts 7:55, and to other saints. 7:55 and other saints, and that the Father's voice came from the clouds, Matth. 17:5, which examples I introduced to prove that Christ should not be in one place but in heaven, he nevertheless proves his jokes just fine and says: "Does this prove that there is one body in two places? what kind of speeches are these from a learned man? I confess my guilt, for such examples do not prove that the wolf likes to eat sheep, or what he might introduce. I add such examples to the fact that Christ is near, and does not sit in heaven in one place. So he interprets it as he pleases, and doubts whether St. Stephen saw Christ spiritually or bodily, and wants Christ to be seen in an image and not Christ himself. And all this is true, but because Oecolampad says it from his head, such bright words of Scripture must give way to his conceit. That is all answer to Luther's book. If I did, I would be called a guide to the Scriptures.

But this is not wrong, and certainly better, because the Zwingel does, from the saying Joh. 3, 13. spoken, "the Son of Man is in heaven", since Oecolampad confesses that [it] is rightly spoken for the sake of the person: God was born of Mary, and descended from heaven; without directing me to the blasphemous exegesis of Zwingel, in which, among other abominations, Allöosis teaches us, carnem pro divinitate accipi, and the best thing in it is that one should know how learned Zwingel is in all kinds of arts; the things, indeed, he does little enough, prevented from great art.

(300) Oecolampad also does too much about this in this place, that he puts Christ, contrary to himself and all Scripture, after the Godhead in heaven, and after the body alone on earth. They do not see my reasons correctly and do not understand their own word. If Christ is One Person in the Godhead and in humanity, then humanity must also be on earth and in heaven at the same time, as I proved above against the Zwingel. For to be One Person in God and with God is higher than to be in heaven. So it is also not true that Christ was then in heaven after the Godhead. Where was he after the Godhead, when he became man in mother's body? Was he not personally and essentially also after the divinity in mother's body and on earth? I have said so much in the next booklet. But it is a matter of overrunning, not to look at nor to think rightly what one hears or says.

(301) Therefore his similitude does not stand, when he says that if one descended from the mountain and clothed himself in the valley, one could say that no one ascends but he who descends. For the Godhead does not descend from heaven as he descends from the mountain, but is in heaven and remains in heaven; but is also at the same time on earth and remains on earth. So also of the clothed one it cannot be said, He is on the mountain, if he is still on earth, as Christ says of himself, "The Son of man, he is in heaven." What is there to say? The kingdom of heaven is on earth, the angels are in heaven and on earth at the same time, the Christians are in the kingdom of God and on earth at the same time, if one wants to understand "on earth" as they speak of it, mathematice vel localiter. God's word is on. The Spirit was given on earth; and Christ the King was on earth, and shall have a kingdom on earth as far as the world is, Ps. 2:6, "and establish justice and righteousness on earth," Jer. 23:5, 33:15. Oh, childishly and foolishly they speak of heaven, so that they make a place for Christ up in heaven, as the stork makes a nest on a tree, and they themselves do not know what and how they speak.

302 After this he challenges that Christ has not joined himself in places, nor will he be found here or there, but will be known in the spirit. Then they rush over again, and do not see what I write against them. Recently, who binds Christ to special places? Do not the enthusiasts themselves put Christ in a special place in heaven, and force us to say, "Behold here, behold Christ" [Luc. 17:23]? And what do they themselves do when they direct people to the gospel and to their neighbor? Is not the neighbor and the gospel in but places on earth? Is not Christ in the believers? Spiritually he is there (they say). What does spiritual mean? Does it mean carnal or real? Just as if we were saying that he is bodily or visibly in the sacrament.

ssi. Is not Christianity and God's kingdom, as far as the world is, on earth, as the prophets proclaim? Where are they themselves, if they want to be the most distinguished in the kingdom of Christ? If the kingdom of Christ is on earth, it is also here and there. I have written such things against the heavenly prophets. It almost displeases them that I always praise such a book as unbitten by them; it is still unbitten by them, and shall also remain unbitten; I do not call mouthing and chattering biting.

Here the children's logic is lacking in the spirit, so that they do not distinguish these words "to be here and there", because Christ clearly interprets himself, whereof he speaks such words, and how they are to be understood, since he speaks before [Luc. 17, 20]: "The kingdom of heaven does not come with an outward manner or gesture. Neither shall it be said, Behold here it is, behold there it is. For behold, the kingdom. God is within you." What is lacking in these bright words, so that no enthusiast may look at them: "The kingdom of God is within you"? Who are these "you"? If they are not on earth, to speak bodily, as they speak of it, then they are certainly here and there.

304: Therefore such word "here" and "there" must be understood in two ways, loco 6t more loci. First, essentially, thus: To be here and there is that it is certainly found there and is present. For they must let God be here and there and in all places, and let him be sought and worshipped both here and there and everywhere, that I truly know. On the other hand, more loci, useful, that is, it does not remain or live in the same place where it is. Just as Paul says 2 Cor. 10, 3: "We walk in the flesh, but we do not fight in the flesh." What is this but: We are in the flesh, and not in the flesh? If we are in the flesh, we are certainly here and there; for one would not let flesh be here and there. But we do not fight in the flesh, that is, our being and doing does not go as it is wont to go in the flesh.

So I may say: We are on earth and not on earth, that is, we live on earth, but we do not live earthly, that is, earthly way. Item, we are in the world and not in the world, that is, we live

We may be in the world, but we do not live in a worldly way. Just as Christ sits with the disciples and lives after his resurrection, he still confesses that he is not with them nor does he live. "These things spake I while I was yet with you." What can such "with you" be but: in your way, or as you are now? Personally or essentially he sat there, and spoke, and let himself be touched.

306 A similarity: A wanderer can come to Wittenberg and say: I am in Wittenberg, and I am not in Wittenberg. How so? So: I am physically and essentially here, but I am not Wittenbergian here, that is, in the Wittenbergian way for I do not have a civil right here, nor do I nourish or live by the Wittenberg law and goods. So also St. Paul writes Phil. 3, 20: that our πολίτευμα, that is, our citizenship or civil being is not here, but in heaven. Now because Christ says, "The kingdom of heaven cometh not by outward means," he plainly confesses that the kingdom of heaven cometh to us on earth, as he says, "Repent ye; the kingdom of heaven is at hand" [Luc. 17:20, 10:9. Matt. 3:2.). But it does not come in such a way as the worldly kingdoms come; for it does not keep and live in a worldly or human way, as I have said. The spirit only led into the school, and the puerilia. learned from Petro Hispano, that would be highly necessary for him!

307 But there he gives Luther even more of a haircut 1) since he cites the saying of John 4:24: That "God wants to be worshipped in the spirit, not in Jerusalem, nor on the mountain." From this you have a certain answer, that Christ's body is not here and there, therefore also not in the Lord's Supper. If the spirit only answered, it would be fine; but where it leaps, there it is hostile. Well then heaven is spirit; for Christ is in the spirit, that is, to worship in heaven. But how will he be in heaven in one place? Is spirit also so much as a special place? Why not? If the spirit says so, then it is certain; but how did the blind man John 9:38, who worshipped Christ on earth?

Christ has been fooled into accepting it; or spirit will also resound as much as "on earth". Dear, you do not have to laugh, the spirit wants to be angry, because it is his seriousness.

But this is even more subtle. Christ speaks of the worshippers, the same should neither worship at Jerusalem nor on the mountain [Joh. 4, 21.], just as also the woman said to him [Joh. 4, 20.]: "Our fathers worshipped on this mountain, and you say that one must worship at Jerusalem." Such words also speak of the worshippers; for it does not speak, GOD is not on the mountain; Christ also does not speak, GOD is not at Jerusalem or on this mountain 2c., but the Spirit teaches us such saying of GOD that He is not here and there, and not to be understood by the worshippers.

Dear, what do you think God means by letting the swarm spirit so grossly deceive you in the Scriptures? Certainly nothing else, but as if he should say: Dear child, I shall not be lacking, I will do faithfully enough to you, and not allow the spirits to act in the Scriptures, for so rudely, clumsily and foolishly, that whoever allows himself to be seduced has no excuse, as if he was not warned and preserved enough by me. He who believes such spirits will be lost, because he cannot do so much as look at what they are fooling about, but he takes it all on, as they say, as an impudent sow.

310. But we believe that "worship in the spirit" means that we should worship spiritually or in a spiritual way, whether Christ is in heaven, on earth, in the sacrament, or wherever he wants; For spiritual worship Christ sets against bodily worship, which the Jews and also our hypocrites bind to place and time, so that it must be done outwardly, as the place and time determine, as if prayer had its essence, power, life, and all virtue from the place or time, as they teach that obedience is the chief thing in such prayer, though they ask nothing nor know what they babble. Behold, this is Christ at Jerusalem and in places, not prayed in spirit and truth.

311) How strong then this saying is, that Christ's body may not be in the bread, and that these words "this is my body" may be otherwise.

are to be understood, for they are, I hope, to be understood by a child. Rather, if they want to protect their thing and persuade us, then they must truly, truly put themselves differently to it; with such a way they scare us further away from them, so that we must say that the thing is not serious to them, or they go around with insolence, that they build so hard on such uncertain, false, loose reasons.

312 So also Oecolampad stands cold in this main part, and cannot prove that Christ alone is in heaven in a special place, and still does not want to find an answer how the two are against each other: Christ in heaven, and his body at the same time in the Lord's Supper, which I have insisted on in my little book; they cannot teach it, it is impossible, and they also feel it well; because all what they talk about teaches us nothing more than that Christ has gone to heaven, which no one desires to know. But as it happens that Christ's body is not in the Lord's Supper, after the words, "This is my body," there is silence, fluttering, leaping, or speaking against themselves, and seeing themselves in their own words, as we have seen.

And what is the use that I stir all the dirt of the devil? I would do sin to rob myself and the reader of time 1) with such idle jokes. For even if we took the whole Scripture over this matter in all its sayings, we would do nothing more than, as has been done up to now, only give the spirit a lot of room to chat uselessly and to misinterpret the Scripture, so that it forgets the main things in the meantime and demonstrates unnecessary art.

For, I have said it, I still say it, and I keep on saying it, the reason of their doctrine is that Christ's body should no longer have the way to be sth. 2) than as flour in a sack or money in a bag, id est, localiter. The same reason they shall show us with the Scripture, what may much book writing? Let them show you this reason, and then cheerfully give it to them; for, believe me, if they could have done it, they would not have kept silent for so long. Because they then here are so patient and out of measure good monks, who keep silence very well, since it is most necessary to speak, and in as many books as they scatter, have never wanted to touch this blood swarf with a letter, it is good to notice why they boast, rumble, flaunt and throb so, as if their thing were certain, namely the devil fears the light and wants to silence us with rumbling.

Because now (I say) no one can bring out of this dumb poltergeist this few necessary pieces, I will also let Oecolampad go herewith, and only look at the last piece: "Flesh is no good. For what he blasphemes about the external word should be shown one day, when I write again about baptism, which God bestows.

316) Oecolampad wants to prove from circumstances of the text, Joh. 6, 53. ff., that flesh here is to be understood as Christ's flesh, and yet does nothing, because there is a likeness of a king in a torn garment, which the citizens should kiss and do not want to, but are annoyed by it 2c. This is his answer to me, and he fortifies his iron wall. Then behold the fluttering spirit again; he promises to bring his understanding out of the circumstances of the text, and gives a parable of the king. What do we ask about the parable? It is equally good and valid as it wishes; but how can we be sure that it belongs here? We say no, and he must prove it. But that is not necessary, it is said: sufficit ita nos dicere, Graad-Herr, da stehet's; so I have my answer.

317 After that, he makes do: "It is certain that the Jews grumbled because of his flesh; therefore he must speak and answer of his flesh and of no other. Is it not a fine consequence and a certain consequence? The Jews grumble about his flesh, therefore Christ must also speak of his flesh; that is, prove it from the circumstances of the text. Dear, why should not someone be able to speak of Christ's flesh, of the Spirit, of the Gospel, of faith, or whatever he wants, and yet soon after of flesh and blood or of men?

1) Erlanger: raube.

2) Compare the note to § 287.

speaking? Just like Christ Matth. 16, 15. when he talks to the disciples and asks them what they thought he was, that is, he talks to them about Christ, who was God and man, and yet immediately says of common flesh v. 17: "Flesh and blood did not reveal it to you. And Paul Gal. 1, 16, when he writes of his profession, immediately says: "I did not converse with flesh and blood." If the iron wall is not stronger than this, let him build on it who wants to fall; I do not, it is not as good as paper.

318 The circumstances of the text help our understanding much better, if we pay attention to it without quarreling and simple-mindedly (as it should be); for I do not give the same opinion, but the text says openly that the Jews and disciples were annoyed at Christ's speech about eating his flesh, which is certain. Here I can and must say from the circumstances of the text that Christ had two kinds of disciples; some who were angry and murmured, and some who believed and reformed. Now if a master has disciples who do not understand his business properly, it is natural that he should turn to such unruliness to punish them, and may say, "Oh, rough heads will not do it," or, "An ass is not a good disciple; new hoses belong to the moste 2c.

319 In the same way Christ can do here; when he finds rude disciples, he turns the speech to them and says: Does this upset you? Here he punishes their false understanding, and may say finely afterwards, Oh, flesh is of no use, spirit gives life; so spirit here must be called spiritual understanding or teaching, because Christ himself interprets it this way and says: "The words that 1) I speak are spirit and life. Therefore, of course, flesh must be opposed to fleshly mind or doctrine. This, I say, is much better given by the text, with all its circumstances, without all its equal, than by the enthusiast's gloss.

This is also said above against the Zwingel, and Oecolampad needs just the sophistry over the little word mea, which Zwingel needs, and answers nothing. Item, he also wants to make my rule wrong, that I have said: Where flesh and spirit contradict one another.

other, the flesh cannot be Christ's flesh, and yet do nothing, for it leads to the saying 1 Tim. 3:16: "It 2) is manifest in the flesh, and justified in the Spirit." What shall I say? I am speaking of the spirit and the flesh, which are opposed to one another in Scripture; so he gives a saying that the flesh and the spirit are one. Nor does it prove that there Christ's flesh is to be understood; nor must it all be answered. Well then, my rule still stands, that here flesh may not be called Christ's flesh; because the same stands, this must be its main part.

He also acts in this way with the fathers' sayings. I have their texts; so he gives his gloss for it, and forces nothing out of the text, as I have done; just as he has also mastered John 6 out of his head. With this they indicate how highly they despise all men, and consider that when they say something, it is to be held strictly thus. Well, I have written against the celestial prophets; there is nothing answered but such their own conceit and gloss. To the booklet against the enthusiasts it goes to me in the same way: They want to chat, they cannot answer, as I have well proved in this booklet. So let them go and be holy, spiritual, learned; I have done according to the teaching of St. Paul, and have admonished them for the next time. May God convert them and protect our people from their poison, amen.

322 But so that I may be free and loose in this matter everywhere, I must also remember my neighbors 3) so that they do not think that I despise their art and spirit. This spirit writes that neither Zwingel, nor Oecolampad, nor Carlstadt, nor Luther, nor Pabst is right, and makes the text in the Lord's Supper thus: "My body given for you is this." Since the evangelists and Paul put the little word "this" in front, he puts it at the end, and should mean as much as: "a spiritual food"; therefore their text stands thus: "My body, which is given for you, is this, (hear) a spiritual food". Do you ask why they do this, and not, for example, the Carl-

2) "It" i.e. according to Joh. 1, 14: "the word".

3) Here the Jenaer has the marginal gloss: "He means the spirit in the schlesi", namely Schwenkfeld and Krautwald in Silesia.

What do you think about the text of Stadt, Zwingel, or Oecolampad, if they are of the same opinion?

There may be three answers: The first is divine, namely, that God would have them disagree and be repugnant and unequal among themselves, so that the Holy Spirit may remain unsuspected and be publicly excused before all the world, as having nothing to do with them, because he is a spirit of unity and stings of disunity, and thus warns everyone against their lying spirit. The other is human, namely, why should they be so humble and accept Carlstadt's, Zwingel's, or Oecolampad's text, when Carlstadt, Zwingel, and Oecolampad themselves are so proud among themselves that none of them accepts the other's text? Should they not be as witty to make a special text as those, that would be a great shame! Rather, the honor does them well as gently as it does those three. The third is diabolical, namely, that the evangelists and Paul have been drunk or insane, that they have gone on the ears and head, and thus have put the highest to the lowest, the foremost to the hindmost in the text of the Lord's Supper; therefore this spirit had to come and set the text right, and master the evangelists.

The reason and cause of their conceit is, first, that these words, "this is my body," must be put out of sight, and the things must first be considered by the spirit. For he who begins with these words, "This is my body," cannot come to such a conceit (I should say, to such a high understanding) that bread is bread and wine is wine; but he who puts these words out of his sight can then come to such an understanding. There you have a certain rule that guides you better into all truth than the Holy Spirit himself can do, namely, where the holy Scriptures mislead or hinder your conceit, put them out of your sight, and follow your conceit first, and you will surely find the right way of all things, as Moses teaches Deut. 12:8: "You shall not do what seems right to you," that is, you shall do what seems right to you.

This devil walks freely without a mask and does not teach us to look at the Scriptures in public, like the coiner and Carlstadt.

who also had their art from the testimony of their inwardness, and were not allowed to teach the holy scriptures for themselves, but for others, as an outward testimony of the testimony in their inwardness. Whoever believes such a public devil wants to go into the hellish fire. No one is allowed to answer, even for vain fools, but such blasphemers shall have such a reason for their faith, because they do not believe Christa.

326 Secondly, the incarceration of the body of Christ (as they say) is against the whole holy scripture 2c. How thinkest thou of this spirit? he may open his mouth wide enough; for he will be far, far, high, high, far, far above the 1) Zwingel and Oecolampad, which lead not all scripture against it. But listen; the Old Testament (he speaks) says nothing of this, to which yet Christ points us Joh. 5, 39. So the New Testament says of his future into the flesh, of which John is a forerunner, and not into bread. Thus Christ himself says: "No one knows the Father without through me", does not say: without through bread.

You see how much it helps the truth when these words, "This is my body," are put out of sight; for otherwise how could this spirit say that our mind is contrary to all Scripture, if he should keep these words before his eyes? Above this, if these words were bound before his eyes with iron chains, so that he could not take them away, he has another art and rule for truth, namely, he says: that such words are not in the Old Testament. For that St. Lu'cas [Cap. 22, 19], Matthew [Cap. 26, 26], Marcus [Cap. 14, 22], Paul [1 Cor. 11, 24] put them in the New Testament, that is nothing, he can well put them out of sight; but God must and shall give himself captive, that he may not put his words when and where he wills, but where and how this Spirit directs him. If he then tunes and seeks them in the Old Testament, and God does not set them there, then the spirit has once again won freely and beautifully 2).

1) "den" is missing in the Erlanger.

2) Wittenberg and Jena: already.

How can this spirit lack truth? Yes, who can resist him, because he has such two fine arts and rule for himself? One is to put the words of God, where they are written, out of his sight; the other, where he cannot put them out of his sight, to turn his eyes from them to another place, where they are not written, and then he says, "Behold, there are no such words, prove to me that they are written here, here; if not, you have lost; for you must present the words to me in such a way that I cannot put them out of my sight, or turn my eyes from them to another place. So shall we carnivores be attacked, so shall we overthrow our brute god.

329. See and take hold, if the devil does not mock us with great courage; but it serves us nevertheless for the strength and security of our faith, because the wretched Satan is so unskilful in his jugglery; he knows that we cannot show the words of Christ to him 1) in the Lord's Supper in the Old Testament, therefore he poses as if he wanted to be shown where we showed them in the Old Testament; and thinks that his gross lies are not seen; for since he does not want to see them in the New Testament, but does them out of sight, what should he do, if we could show them in the Old Testament in the same way? Then he should do them much more out of sight, and pretend that the Old Testament is dark or abolished, one should show them to him in the New Testament, that would be the fulfillment 2c.

And if it were all in the Old Testament that we should believe, what should we 2) believe of the New? What would it be necessary for Christ to come on earth to teach us? In the same way, I wanted to say: Baptism would be nothing, the sending of the Holy Spirit would be nothing, that God's mother is Mary would be nothing, and recently, no article of the Christian faith should exist. For in the Old Testament it is written of Christ's future; but that He has now come and fulfilled everything, instituted baptism, granted forgiveness of sins, given the Holy Spirit, 2c., there is not a letter in it. The New Testament had to explain all these things; but the Spirit has to explain himself, what he considers to be the reason for his coming.

1) "him" is missing in the Erlanger.

2) Wittenberg and Jena: may.

his lies, so that we may be all the safer from him.

331 The third reason is that incineration is contrary to the Christian faith. For faith must have a spiritual sight to cling to; but bread is a bodily sight. For this reason it can also be concluded that Christ was not a man on earth, for his humanity was a bodily and not a spiritual sight; therefore no one can believe without heresy that such a man is God. Item, no one can believe that a Christian man is our neighbor, that husband and wife are our parents, cousins, brothers. Item, no one can believe that heaven and earth are God's creatures. Cause, faith can have nothing corporeal to look at; but these pieces are all in the corporeal sight. Such a blind mind is this, that it knows nothing, how a bodily sight is always presented to faith, under which it understands and comprehends something else, as I have proven this in my booklet with many examples, as from Rom. 4, 19. of the body of Sarah, and the like.

The fourth reason is that it is contrary to the nature and kind of the word. For the word is not called the voice or oral word, but the eternal truth of God 2c.; this same word cannot bind itself to bread and creatures. This article, in which they blaspheme the outward word as unfit for faith, needs to be proved; therefore it is nothing that they prove by it, because it is not itself proved. Another time about this.

The fifth reason, that it is against the priesthood and kingdom of Christ, as the epistle to the Hebrews teaches. For Christ, where he is, is king and priest; but in bread he cannot be king, for bread is a creature in the world. Now his kingdom is not of the world. Is it not fine? Christ's kingdom is not of the world, therefore it is not in the world: for this Spirit makes "of the world" and "in the world" one thing. Woe to us poor Christians, who must be in the world, in death, under the devil, and our King is imprisoned in heaven, that he cannot rule us, nor protect us, nor help us, nor be with us, for his kingdom is in heaven, and not in the world. Such great, nonsensical teachers should have this pack and no others. Praise and thanks be to God, we know that Christ did not say before Pilate: "My kingdom is not here," but rather: "My kingdom is not from here" [Joh. 18, 36]. It is and reigns everywhere he is, in bread, the world, death, hell, among devils; but his kingdom's power is not in the power of bread, the world, death, hell, devils; for he takes nothing from it to strengthen his kingdom, as the world and devils must do in their kingdom.

The sixth reason is against the glory of God, because Christ is in heaven in the glory of the Father, Phil. 2, and has not prepared his seat in bread, but in heaven 2c. This reason wants just that the previous, that Christ is in heaven, as in the dungeon and stick, imprisoned. For it would be a shame for him to be with us on earth in all the troubles of sin and death; it is better for him to leave us the devil here, and to play with the angels above. Isn't it a wonderful thing? It is not contrary to God's glory that he should be after the Godhead everywhere, even in hell, and it should be contrary to God's glory that his body should be in bread, as if his body were more noble than the Godhead. Away, away, it is a beautiful fine spirit.

Lastly, it shall be against the institution of Christ and the rehearsal of the first church. For the words of Christ are words of the baptism, when he saith, "This is my body," and are not words of heat: for nowhere saith Christ, When ye have spoken these words, then shall my body be there. He has stolen this piece from the kennel, and has answered it sufficiently above. So we have also heard this mad spirit, and no tooth wants to come forth yet, which bites the words of Christ, yes, which also attacks my little book. I have also read my booklet against the celestial prophets again, and I am surprised that the devil, who is a fugitive from the field, does not oppose it with writings, but only with words, and has left it unbitten until now.

De praedicatione identica.

336. it is the biggest and most annoying piece in this matter back there, which, methinks,

No enthusiast understands, because they do not touch it, or even touch it unskillfully, against which the enthusiast's chatter is vain quite jugglery. But this piece moves all honest reason, which the Viklef 1) in his books drives as the noblest, even the high schools have blued themselves with it in all the world until they have forced themselves to teach that in the sacrament no bread remains essential, but only the form; because there is neither in Scripture nor reason such praedicatio identica de diversis naturis, that is, that two different natures should be one thing. If the enthusiasts were not so unlearned logicians, they could have done this; it would have been worth talking about, and they would have left their useless flesh and Christ in heaven with others of their children's work, therefore we will speak of it here.

It is true and no one can deny that two different beings cannot be one being. As, what is an ass, that cannot be an ox; what is a man, cannot be a stone or wood. And do not suffer me to say of St. Paul, This is a bodily stone or wood; for I would make stone and wood a new word and a new interpretation, as is said above. All reason in all creatures must confess these things, for nothing else will come of it. Now when we come to the Lord's Supper with such an understanding, reason is displeased, for it finds that two different beings, as bread and body, are spoken of as one thing or being in these words: "This is my body," so it shakes its head and says: "It cannot and may not be that bread should be body; if it is bread, it is bread; if it is body, it is body, which is the one you want.

338 Now here the sophists have kept the loan, and have left the bread, and say: The bread perishes, and leaves its essence above the words, and the little word "that" points not to the bread, but to the body of Christ, since the text says: "This is my body." Wiklef, on the other hand, contests this and keeps the bread, leaving the body, saying,

1) In the old editions: Vigleph.

The little word "that" points to the bread and not to the body. So these pointed heads have sharpened each other, that the Sophists had to invent a miraculous sign, how the bread perishes, and let its essence come to nothing.

339 Now I have taught hitherto, and still teach, that such a struggle is not necessary, and that there is no great power in it, whether bread remains or not. Although I hold with Wiclef that bread remains; again, I also hold with the Sophists that the body of Christ remains. And so, against all reason and pointed logic, I hold that two different beings may well be and be called One Being, and this is my reason: First, that one should give reason and all wisdom captive in God's works and words, as St. Paul teaches in 2 Cor. 10:5, and allow oneself to be blinded and led, guided, taught and mastered, so that we do not become God's judge in His words. For we certainly lose with our judging in His words, as Psalm 51:6 testifies. 1) 340 Secondly, if then we are caught and confess that we do not understand his word and work, that we are content to speak of his works in his words, plainly, as he has commanded us to speak of them and has made us speak of them, and not in our words, but to speak of them differently and better; for I shall certainly miss where we do not plainly repeat after him as he speaks to us, just as a young child repeats after his father the faith or the Lord's Prayer. For here it is a matter of walking in darkness and blindness, and of badly hanging on to the word and following it. Because God's words "this is my body" are written here, dry and bright, common, certain words, which have never been a trope, neither in Scripture nor in some language, one must grasp them with faith, and thus blind and captivate reason, and thus, not like the pointed 2) Sophistria, but as God speaks to us, repeat and adhere to them.

341 If now here the praedicatio identica wants to speak into it that neither in the Scripture nor reason shall suffer two beings to be one thing, or one being to be another, as it is said that stone cannot be wood, water cannot be fire, even in the Scriptures; therefore it shall be contrary to God's word and article of faith, that one thing shall be something else than it is, and bread must be bread, and cannot be body: you must answer that it is not contrary to Scripture, nor to reason, nor to right logic; but it seems to you to be contrary to Scripture, reason, and logic, because they do not hold it right together. We must prove this with examples, so that it may be understood all the better, first from Scripture and then from common language.

342 The high article of the Holy Trinity teaches us to believe and speak that the Father and Son and Holy Spirit are three distinct persons; yet one is the only God. Here it is said of the one Godhead that it is threefold, as three persons, which is much higher and harder to reason than that wood is stone; for wood, of course, does not have such a unity of essence in itself as the Godhead, and again wood and stone are not so certainly and unmistakably distinct as the persons are. Now, if the unity of nature and essence can cause different persons to be spoken of as one and the same essence, then it must not be contrary to Scripture or the articles of faith that two different things are spoken of as one and the same essence, as bread and body. But let this article be too high; let us take another before us.

I point to the man Christ and say: This is the Son of God, or, this man is the Son of God. Here it is not necessary that mankind perish or come to nothing, so that the little word "this" points to God, and not to man, as the sophists in the Sacrament of Bread write, but mankind must remain; nevertheless man and God are much more different and farther from and against each other than bread and body, fire and wood, or ox and ass. Who makes here that two so different natures become one being,

1) Walch and the Erlanger: zeitet.

2) Erlanger: top.

and one the other is spoken? Without doubt not the essential unity of natures (because there are two different natures and beings), but the personal unity. For although it is not one being according to the natures, it is nevertheless one being according to the person. And so from this arises two kinds of unity, and two kinds of being (as one natural unity and personal unity), and so on. From the personal unity arises such a speech that God is man and man is God. Just as from the natural unity in the Godhead arises this. Speech that God is the Father, God is the Son, God is the Holy Spirit; and again, the Father is God, the Son is God, 2c.

344 There we have two unities, one natural, and personal, which teach us that praedicatio identica is not contrary to Scripture, or that two different beings are spoken of as one being. Want to seek more of the same. Ps. 104, 4. says, "He maketh his angels winds, and his servants flames of fire." Here also are two kinds of beings, as angels and wind, or angels and flames of fire, as in the sacrament bread and body; nor does the Scripture make both of them one kind, saying, "He maketh his angels winds and flames," as he maketh his body bread, so that of such wind and flame it must be said, This is an angel; and the Scripture thus speaks, that whosoever seeth such wind or flame, the same standeth an angel. Now no one can see an angel in his nature, but only in his flame or bright form, nor must such a bright form perish, if one shows and says: This is an angel, as the Sophists destroy the bread in the Sacrament 2c., but it must remain.

345. Now here is also a unity of the two different beings, namely the angel and the flames, I do not know what to call it; it is not a natural unity, as in the Godhead Father and Son are One Nature; also not a personal unity, as God and man are One Person in Christ; let it be called real unity, because the angel and his form perform one work; nevertheless the Scripture speaks thus here:

Abraham and Lot saw, heard, fed and sheltered angels [Gen. 18, 2. ff. 19, 1. ff.], 1) Gideon and Manoah saw and heard angels [Judges 6, 12. 13, 2. f.], David and Daniel saw and heard angels (2 Sam. 24, 17. Dan. 7, 10.), the Marys at the tomb of Christ saw and heard angels [Matth. 28, 5], and so on many other examples; in all of which no angel is seen according to his nature, but only according to his form or flames; and where one points to it, one must say: This is an angel, and yet such "this" points to the form of the angel.

346. Whether here the pointed Wiklef and Sophists wanted to pretend the praedicatio identica, that two different beings may not be one thing, nor one the other be spoken, but either a vain form without angel must remain, as Wiklef wants, or a vain angel without form, as the Sophists want, we do not inquire; the clear Scripture and the public work of God stands there, that God makes his angels flames, and the flame is the angel, if one points to it and speaks: This is an angel, for the sake of real unity, that the two beings have become One Thing; as in Christ, for the sake of personal unity, God and man are One Personal Being. So also of the sacrament one must speak: "This is my body", although such "this" points to the bread; for it has also become a unity of two different beings, as will follow.

347. Fourth, the evangelists write how the Holy Spirit came upon Christ in the form of a dove in the Jordan River [John 1:32]. Item, about the disciples in the form of wind and fiery tongues on the day of Pentecost [Apost. 2, 2. ff.]. Item, on the mountain Thabor in the clouds figure 2c. [Matth. 17, 5.] Here Wiklef and the Sophists may lie and say: this dove is there without the Holy Spirit, or, the Holy Spirit is there without the dove. We say against both parts, that if one points to the dove, it is right and well to say: This is the Holy Spirit; for the sake of this, that here the two different beings,

1) Here the Bible citations are offset in the Erlangen edition, just as in Walch's old edition.

as the Spirit and the dove, are also one and the same being, not natural or personal. Well, they are called formal unity, because the Holy Spirit wanted to reveal Himself in such a form, and here the Scripture freely says that whoever sees such a dove sees the Holy Spirit, as John 1:33: "Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending and remaining upon him" 2c.

348 Why should one not say much more in the Lord's Supper: "This is my body", although bread and body are two different beings, and such "this" points to the bread? For here also a unity of two beings has been established, which I will call sacramental unity, because Christ's body and bread are given to us there for the sacrament; for it is not a natural or personal unity, as in God and Christ; so also perhaps a different unity, as the dove has with the Holy Spirit, and the flame with the angel; nevertheless it is also a sacramental unity.

349 Therefore it is rightly said that if one points to the bread and says, This is Christ's body, and whoever sees the bread sees Christ's body; just as John says that he saw the Holy Spirit when he saw the dove, as has been heard. So from now on it is rightly said that whoever attacks this bread attacks Christ's body, and whoever eats this bread eats Christ's body, and whoever crushes this bread with his teeth or tongue crushes Christ's body with his teeth or tongue; and yet it remains true throughout that no one sees Christ's body, grasps it, eats it or bites it, as one visibly sees and bites other flesh. For what is done to the bread is rightly and properly appropriated to the body of Christ for the sake of sacramental unity.

(350) For this reason, the pagans do wrong, as well as the glosses in spiritual law, when they punish Pope Nicolaus for having urged Berengar 1) to make such a confession that he says, "He crushes and grinds with his teeth the true body of Christ. Would God that all popes had acted as Christian in all things as this pope acted with Berengar in such a confession.

has! For it is the opinion that whoever eats and bites this bread eats and bites that which is the right true body of Christ, and not bad vain bread, as Wiclef teaches, for this bread is the body of Christ, just as the dove is the Holy Spirit, and the flame is the angel.

The pointed Wiclef and the Sophists were deceived by untimely logic, that is, they did not first consider grammar or oratory. For where one wants to know logic before one knows grammar, and before teaching than hearing, before judging than speaking, nothing right shall follow from it. Logic teaches rightly that bread and body, dove and spirit, God and man are different natures; but it should first also hear the grammar for help, which teaches to speak in all languages in such a way that where two different beings come into one being, it also grasps such two beings in one speech; and as it sees the unity of both beings, it also speaks of both with one speech.

In Christ, God and man are one being; therefore it speaks of both beings thus: He is God, he is man. Item, of the dove, Joh. 1, 32: This is the Holy Spirit, this is a dove. Item, of the angels: This is a wind, this is an angel; [item,] this is bread, this is my body. And again also at times one from the other; thus: the man is God, the God is man; the dove is the Holy Spirit, the Holy Spirit is the dove; the wind or this flame is the angel, the angel is the flame; the bread is my body, my body is the bread.

For here one must not speak according to which the beings are differentiated and two in themselves, as Wiclef and the Sophists wrongly use logic, but according to the essence of unity, after such different beings have become one being, each in its own way. For it 2) is also in truth thus that such different natures, coming together in one, truly get a new one being from such joining together, according to which they are rightly and well called one and the same being, although each one for itself is peculiarly one and the same.

1) In the old editions: Berenger.

2) "it" is missing in Walch and in the Erlanger.

Such has deceived the Wiclef and the Sophists, quod, de unitate totali per unitatis partiales, et econtra, syllogisant.

Such a way of speaking of different things as of one thing is called synecdoche in grammar, and is almost common, not only in writing, but also in all languages. As when I show or present a sack or bag, I say, "These are a hundred florins," the pointing and the little word "this" go to the bag; but because the bag and florins of some measure are one being, as a lump, it also applies to the florins. According to the way, I touch a barrel and say: This is Rhenish wine, this is Welsh wine, this is red wine. Item, I touch a glass and say: This is water, this is beer, this is ointment 2c. In all these speeches you see how the little word "that" points to the vessel, and yet, because the drink and the vessel are to some extent one thing, it applies at the same time, indeed primarily, to the drink.

355 Thus I have also given an example above: Whoever pricks the king's son in the hand is judged to have pricked the king's son, because the hand is one being, that is, one body with the king's son, although it also has a special being in itself, as a hand; for the hand is certainly not a body. Here also belongs my parable of the fiery iron, taken from St. Augustine, on which the enthusiasts have almost committed a crime, and yet have achieved nothing. For be the fire what it may, so it is rightly spoken in all languages: This is fire, and this is iron 2c.

356 If now here a pointed Wiclef or Sophist should laugh and say, Thou showest me the bag, and sayest, This is a hundred florins; how can the bag be a hundred florins? Item, if he said: You show me the barrel and say: it is wine. Dear, the barrel is wood and not wine, the bag is leather and not gold; even the children would laugh at this as a fool or a joker. For he tears apart the two united beings from each other, and wants to speak of each one separately, since we are now in such speech, since the two beings have come into one being. For the barrel is no longer here.

It is not bad wood or barrel, but it is a wine wood or wine barrel, and the bag is no longer bad leather or bag, but a gold leather or money bag. But if you want to separate the whole thing, to separate gold and leather from each other, then each piece is of course for itself, and then you must speak differently of the thing, so: This is gold, this is leather, this is wine, this is barrel. But if you leave it completely, then you must also speak of it completely, point to the 1) barrel and bag and say: This is gold, this is wine, for the sake of the unity of the essence. For one must not pay attention to what such pointed sophists are joking about, but look at the language, what kind of way, custom and habit there is to speak.

Since this way of speaking is common to both the Scriptures and all languages, nothing prevents us from praedicatio identica in the Lord's Supper. Neither is there any, but it dreams the Wiclef and the Sophists thus. For although body and bread are two different natures, each for itself, and where they are separated from each other, certainly none is the other; but where they come together, and become a completely new being, there they lose their difference, as far as such a new one being is concerned, and as they become and are one thing. So they are called and spoken of as one thing, so that it is not necessary for the two to perish and become one, but both remain bread and body, and for the sake of sacramental unity it is rightly said: "This is my body", with the little word "this" pointing to the bread, because it is now no longer bad bread in the oven, but flesh bread or body bread, that is, a bread that has become a sacramental being and one thing with the body of Christ. So also of the wine in the cup: "This is my blood"; with the little word "this" pointed to the wine, because it is now no longer bad wine in the cellar, but blood wine, that is, a wine that has come into a sacramental being with the blood of Christ. That is enough about the piece for ours; the others are taught by their spirit to respect nothing but what they think is right.

The other part.

Now let us take the sayings of the evangelists and St. Paul before us to strengthen our conscience. And first of all, you must accept the confession of the false-minded. For they confess, and must confess, that our understanding is as the words naturally are in themselves, and to speak according to the sound of the words is our understanding right, that has no doubt. But they fight that the words should not be understood as they are. Such a confession you (I say) shall accept. For this is as much as more than half gained. Since they now confess that if the words were to be accepted as they are, our understanding would be right, they free us with their own testimony. First of all, that we must not prove our understanding any further than the words tell how they are written and read. That is one thing, mark well. Secondly, they burden themselves with two great labors; one, that they must prove why the words should not be understood as they are, but in a different way. The other, that instead of such words they give us other words and text, which would be certain to stand on. They have not yet done either of these, and especially the other they have never yet undertaken to do; as we have told and proved all this above, so that they force us at once to remain with the meaning that the words give as they read, and disgrace themselves with their uncertain lies.

Secondly, you know and should know that our text "this is my body" is not spoken and set by men, but by God Himself from His own mouth, with such letters and words. But the gushing text "this means my body", or, "this is my body's sign" 2c. is not spoken by God Himself with such words and letters, but by men alone.

Third, you have heard above that they themselves are all uncertain of their text, and none of them has consistently wanted to prove that it should and must stand as they claim, and can also never bring up a certain one. But our text is certain that it should and must stand as the words read; for God Himself has placed it thus, and no one may add a letter either to it or to it.

Fourthly, you know that they are divided, and make many vile texts of the words, so that they are not only uncertain (which alone would be devilish enough), but also against one another, and must punish themselves among themselves with lies. But our text is not only certain, but also unanimous and simple and one among us all.

362. fifthly, suppose that our text and understanding is also uncertain or dark (as it is not), as well as their text and understanding; nevertheless, you have the glorious, defiant advantage that you can stand on our text with a good conscience, and thus say: If I then and must have uncertain dark text and understanding, I would rather have that which is spoken from the divine mouth itself, than that I have that which is spoken from the mouth of man. And if I should be deceived, I would rather be deceived by God (if it were possible) than by men; for if God trusts me, he will answer for it and make restitution to me. But men cannot make restitution to me if they have deceived me and led me into hell. Such defiance cannot be had by the enthusiasts, for they cannot say: I would rather stand on the text that Zwingel and Oecolampad speak in conflict than on that which Christ himself speaks in unity.

363 Therefore you can speak joyfully to Christ, both at your death and at the last judgment, thus: My dear Lord Jesus Christ, a dispute has arisen over your words in the Lord's Supper; some want them to be understood differently than they read. But because they teach me nothing certain, but only confuse and make uncertain, and will not nor can prove their text in any way, I am stayed on thy text, as the words are. If there is something dark in it, you have wanted it to be so dark, because you have no other explanation about it.

given nor commanded to give. Thus in no scripture nor language is it found that "is" should be "interprets"; or "my body" should be "body sign".

If there were darkness within, thou wilt give me credit for not meeting it, as thou didst give credit to thine apostles, when they understood thee not in many things, but when thou didst proclaim thy passion and resurrection, and yet they kept the words as they were, and did not do otherwise. Just as your dear mother did not understand when you said to her, Luc. 2:49, "I must be in my Father's house," and yet she simply kept the words in her heart and did not change them. So also I have kept these words of yours, "This is my body," 2c., and have neither wanted to make any others out of them, nor have I allowed them to be made out of them, but have commanded you and kept them secret, if there were anything dark in them, and have kept them as they are, especially because I do not find that they strive against some article of faith. Behold, so shall no reprobate speak with Christ, that I know well; for they are uncertain and divided about their text.

For I have tried, though the Lord's Supper were all bread and wine, and though I would for pleasure try to say that Christ's body was in the bread, I could not say it more surely, more plainly, and more clearly than thus, "Take, eat, this is my body. 2c. For where the text thus stands: Take, eat, in the bread is my body; or, with the bread is my body; or, under the bread is my body; there should first of all rain, hail, and snow vain swarms, which cry, Behold, hearest thou? Christ saith not, The bread is my body: but in the bread, with the bread, under the bread, is my body: and should cry out, O how gladly would we believe, if he had said, This is my body, that would have been spoken arid brightly. But now he says, in bread, with bread, under bread; so it does not follow that his body is there; and thus a thousand evasions and glosses would be invented about the words "in, with, under," even with greater pretense, and much less to be kept than now.

366. nor may they say: where does it stand ge

Just as if they were ready to believe, where we could prove it, and yet do not want to believe, since we prove more powerfully that the bread is the body of Christ, which expresses his body to be there more strongly and clearly than this text: In the bread is my body. But they lie and pretend that God should put texts as they show them to him, and even if he did, they would not accept it, because they do not accept him.

367 Since we have now proved strongly enough that neither Zwingel's interpretation, nor Oecolampad's drawing, can stand, we have also contended that all the texts that speak of the Lord's Supper should give us an understanding of what they say. And although I have sufficiently dealt with them in the booklet against the celestial prophets, and still today nothing has been brought up by the enthusiasts against them, but mere, naked little bells, without some saying of the Scriptures, invented from their head, and built on the foundation of their interpretation and signatures, and now all this together with the interpretation and signatures has also fallen to the ground, and my booklet still stands, as you may read and experience for yourself in the sexters J. K. 1) 2c., so I will once again deal with the same texts one after the other, to strengthen our understanding.

368 St. Matthew is the first to speak Cap. 26, 26, 27: "As they were eating, Jesus took the bread, and gave thanks, and brake it, and gave it to the disciples, saying, Take, eat; this is my body. And took the cup, and gave thanks, and gave it unto them, 2) saying, Drink ye of it all: for this is my blood of the new testament, which is shed for many for the remission of sins."

369. these words are by the mouth of GOt-.

1) Thus the Jena edition. In the Wittenberg edition: "D. E". In the old edition of Walch and the Erlangen: "G. H. J. K". That we have decided for the reading "J. K", this is the reason. Luther refers here to the second part of his writing Wider die himmlischen Propheten. In the original edition, it has 15 sheets, signed A-P. By the indicated signature, we are referred to the section that bears the superscription: "Von Frau Hulda, der klugen Vernunft D. Carlstadts in diesem Sacrament. Cf. in this volume Col. 251 ff., § 130 ff. Our reading is confirmed by § 397 in this writing.

2) "den" is missing in the Erlanger.

They may not think more highly of the enthusiasts than if they had been spoken by a fool or a drunkard. For even the devil in one place is equally angry with us, and says: We hold so firmly over five 1) poor and wretched words. He does all this 2) out of the art of rhetoric, when someone has an evil thing, and the opposite with the bright truth causes him heartache and anxiety, he should reject it with his hand, and open his mouth and say: it is nothing, it is not worth answering for, it is five poor miserable words 2c. But besides this he must not think otherwise, for God is an idol or ape, and all the world is vain sticks and stones, which let them off badly when they hear such contempt. Thus Zwingel's rhetoric finely agrees with the spirit in Silesia 3) that one must put such words out of one's sight and despise them as poor miserable words; thus they have won and found the certain truth; that should be the reason to gloss over and understand these bright words.

We poor, miserable carnivores must nevertheless wonder how it is that such mighty iron-eaters and hell-breakers can muster nothing at all against these miserable, poor five words, but a mere, naked, arrogant contempt. If contempt is enough for the truth, then the devil is God above all gods. But with such speech they testify against themselves what kind of spirit they have, and how highly they esteem God's word, that they revile these same precious words as poor, miserable five words, that is, they do not believe that [they are] God's words. For if they believed that they were God's words, they would not call them wretched, poor words, but would also consider one tittle and letter greater than the whole world, and would tremble and fear them more than God Himself. For he who despises a single word of God, of course, does not esteem any of them very highly. If they were to peel away our understanding or wrong sense, and not the words of God Himself, it would be to suffer. But how do you do to those who do not despise such wretched words?

1) Erlanger: funft.

2) Erlanger: as.

3) Compare the note to § 322 of this paper.

but glorious, mighty and terrible? How shall one do? They must also be taken for miserable fools, who cannot despise such words, nor put them out of their sight.

371. Since here "is" cannot be "interpreted" and "my body" cannot be "my body's sign", and the sayings "flesh is of no use", "Christ is seated in heaven" do not compel, and indeed no reason can be given to understand the words differently than they are, as we have heard above: we must remain and cling to them as to the very brightest, most certain, surest words of God, which cannot deceive us nor make us miss them; for it is most plainly said, "This is my body, this is my blood of the new testament," that, if all the language and words of the world were put together, one could not choose or take from them more plain speech or words. Christ cannot speak more simply of his body and blood, than thus, "My body," or "this is my body," "this is my blood."

372 For that the falsifiers pretend that Christ did not say: In the bread is my body, or: If you speak these words, then my body shall be there, is nothing. Let them have the choice and try for themselves how they would speak of it more simply. If Christ had said, "In the bread is my body," they would have much more pretense, and would want to pretend that Christ is spiritual or spiritual in the bread. For if in these words, "This is my body," they could find a figurative speech, how much more would they find it 4) in these words, "In the bread is my body," and with greater appearance; for it is more brightly and plainly spoken when I say, "This is my body," than "in whom is my body."

373 But if Christ had thus said, When ye speak these words, my body shall be there, they would soon depart: Yes, beloved, Christ does not say, The bread is my body, but my body shall be there. Now he may well be there, that yet bread is not his body. Behold, how well would they be kept? But if he said thus, If ye have these words they would say again, "Yes, Christ's body is indeed present in the bread, but not essentially, but spiritually or figuratively. But if he were to say, "When you say these words, my body shall be substantially present in the bread," they would say again, "Yes, indeed his body is substantially present in the bread, but in such a way that "substantially" is understood of Christ's body, namely, that Christ has an essential body and not a Marcionian one; the same essential body is indeed present in the bread, but as in a sign and not truly.

4) In the editions: the same.

In sum, if God Himself gave them the choice of setting the text, they themselves would not set one as simple as this one is, but would always find many more holes and gaps in it than they find in this one. Therefore, whoever does not allow himself to be held by this text in our understanding, will never be held by one. Now it is certain that the enthusiasts have decided among themselves that they do not want to be held. They prove this by drilling and perforating this simple text in so many different ways. One wants to make a hole through Tuto; another through "is"; the third through "my body"; the others otherwise and so, as the fish tore the net of St. Peter, and thus lead loose, rotten causes, which are much more uncertain and darker than this text is. And it is all lies and deception that they demand a more certain, simple, lighter text. For they know that it cannot be made brighter nor more simple, if they themselves had the choice to make it so; but because they feel that this text is too bright and too certain, they would like to entice us to make another, since they could find many more holes and gaps in it, and thus have a pretense that they have overthrown a brighter text than the one in the Gospel, which would then have to count for nothing at all. No, devil, you create nothing, you shall and must strangle and succumb to this text, nothing shall help you for it.

375 St. Marcus is the other one who speaks Cap. 14, 22. 23. 24.: "And as they were eating, Jesus took the bread, blessed it and broke it, and gave it to them, saying, "This is my body. And taking the cup, he gave thanks and gave it to them, and they all drank from it, and he said to them: This is my blood of the new testament, which is poured out for many."

From this text Carlstadt has drawn his first thoughts of the Tuto, because here Marcus reads, as if the disciples had all drunk from the cup before Christ said: This is my blood; so that he should then point to his sitting blood, because the cup was now already drunk; but all this has long since been misplaced and nullified. For not only do the other evangelists and St. Paul write differently, but he himself, St. Marcus, in speaking of the other part of the sacrament, does not write that the disciples ate the bread, and after that Christ said, "This is my body." Therefore, the talk about drinking must be in accordance with the order of the other evangelists and Paul, and St. Marcus himself in the talk about eating; for he cannot be against himself and against all the others.

377 But I wonder how it is that only St. Marcus writes this piece: "and they all drank from it," and does it at the very place where Matthew writes in his text: "Drink from it, all of you," so that it seems for the most part as if the text in St. Marcus was changed, and made xxxxx [drink] into xxxxx [they drank]; for where xxxxx would be there, it would be the same text with Matthew, with whom St. Marcus otherwise tends to agree almost identically. This I command the scholars. I think that both, since Matthew alone writes "drink from it" before all others, and since Marcus also writes "they all drank from it" before all others, are written because the two evangelists want to show how the disciples all drank from this cup; not to thirst, as other drinks might have done, when it was necessary to pour more than once before it went round; but that they should let this cup go round, and so drink moderately from it, that they all drank from it; just as Lucas also writes that he also gave the last drink before the sacrament, that they all drank from one cup.

When he says, "Divide this cup among yourselves," Luc. 22:17, he should say, "There were more cups at the table, for each one drank from it, or one cup was poured out more than once, but this cup was given for the last time, so that they all drank from it, to give valet to the old paschal lamb.

So Matthew and Marcus may also be understood by this special cup, that the apostles otherwise had each a cup for himself at the table, or indeed there was more than one cup. But here, when he gives a new special drink of his blood, he tells them all to drink from this one cup, so that Christ, with presentation and special gift, takes his own cup and gives it to all, above the other common cups over the table, so that they may know all the better how it is a special drink, above the other drinks that are given over the meal. For he could well give out the bread, indeed, he had to give it out in such a way that each one got his piece for himself. But the wine he could not distribute in this way, but had to leave it in one cup for all of them, and indicate with words that [it] was a common drink for all of them, and not to be put in front of one or two or three alone and to be drunk, as the other cups over the tables were free for each one as he wanted.

Thus, with these gestures, he wanted to distinguish his Lord's Supper noticeably from the old Lord's Supper. First, that he gives the valet drink, as Lucas writes. With this he moved the minds of the disciples, so that they had to think: What does he want to do with this, that he gives the last drink from his cup? So far he has not done this over tables. And especially because St. Lucas writes that he also expressed such a last drink in words and said: "I tell you that I will not drink from the fruit of the vine until the kingdom of God comes"; as we will hear.

380 Secondly, that he takes a special loaf in his hands before all the other loaves, blesses it, and breaks it after such a last drink; so they must have thought, "How will he eat again, since he has had the last drink?

than has. They were watching what he was doing and listening to what he was saying. For so he did not do with the other bread at the table and at the supper of the Lamb, and now, after the last drink and supper, he sows a new bread, saying, "It is his body. Here they are silent, and believe simply; no one asks how the bread is the body.

381 Third, that he gives his cup and tells everyone to drink from it, which must have moved them, because he had not done this with any other cup before, and says that it is his blood, and they keep quiet and believe. For they thought that what he said must be true. Because they see such a new offering after the last, that he begins anew, gives thanks anew, speaks the Benedicite anew, and takes a special bread, which he divides among them all, and also divides his cup among them all, and blesses such a supper with one bread and with one cup. Then they thought that he knew what he was doing and saying, that there should be no question about it, and yet they saw that it was a new and different supper.

382. Summa, they ate the paschal lamb in such a way that he did not call them to eat or drink, nor did he present or set it before anyone; but each one ate and drank for himself as it was placed and stood before him, as Matthew and Mark also say: "As they ate, he took the bread" 2c. But here it is done in a new way: he takes and approves a certainly special bread, gives thanks for it, breaks it himself and divides it among them, and puts it before them and tells them to eat, saying, "This is my body, given for you." He does the same with the cup, agrees and gives a special drink for them all. He does not make them eat other bread or drink other cups, nor does he put or set anything before anyone, as he does here. By all of which he indicates that this bread and wine is not bad bread and wine, as was eaten at the paschal lamb, but much more special, higher, namely, as he himself says in words, his body and blood.

1) In the old editions: from neues.

So we have that Matthew and Marcus agree, and both speak the most simple and almost one and the same words, without Matthew adding at the end this part: "for the forgiveness of sins". Again, Marcus, speaking of bread, says:

Ευλογήσας, that is, "He blessed it," since others everywhere say, Ευχαριστήσας that.

He gave thanks, as he himself, Marcus, also does with the cup, that it seems to me that he wants to bless and give thanks for one thing. But I leave this to those who have the desire to take care of it.

This is probably more useful to remember: Because the evangelists all so unanimously put these words "this is my body" in the simplest way, one can assume from this that there must be no figurative speech, nor some trope in it. For if there were some trope in it, someone might have touched it with a letter, so that there might have been another text or understanding. Just as they do in other things, where one puts in what the other leaves out, or puts it in other words, as Matthew 12:28 writes that Christ said, "If I cast out devils by the Spirit of God," 2c., but Lucas said, "If I cast out devils with the finger of God," 2c, Luc. 11, 20., 1) and since Marcus says: one seed bore thirtyfold, one sixtyfold, one hundredfold fruit, Lucas says badly: And it bore a hundredfold fruit, and the pieces much, since one explains the other or speaks differently.

But here they are all the same in the most simple way, and none of them can be remembered with a different letter than the other, as if they should all say, "No one can speak of it differently, more simply and more certainly than thus, "This is my body," although Lucas and Paul speak much differently about the cup than Matthew and Marcus, as we shall hear. Since there are four witnesses, and they agree in words, we may cheerfully and confidently rely on their testimony, and judge and believe on it. For thus God speaks: "that the testimony of two mouths may be true" [Matth. 18, 16],

1) In the original edition, as well as in the Wittenberg and Jena editions, these two biblical passages are confused with each other.

How much more should these four testimonies be stronger for us than the cries and chatter of all the enthusiasts! They must not say that Matthew, Marcus, Lucas, Paul were not as learned, holy, pious and spiritual as they and theirs are. But if they make the speech of such witnesses doubtful, then the speech of the falsifiers should be much more doubtful, especially because they themselves disagree among themselves, none of them is certain of his text, nor can be; but these four witnesses in the text are also one in letter. With ours I speak thus; for the enthusiasts can answer all things well, because they may give no writing, but naked little bells from their own head.

386 St. Lucas is the third, Cap. 22:19, 20: "And he took bread, and gave thanks, and brake it, and gave unto them, saying, This is my body which is given for you: this do in remembrance of me. Likewise also the cup after supper, saying, This is the cup, the new testament in my blood, which is poured out for you."

387 If anyone wanted to say to him that he had enough in this matter at St. Luke's alone, he speaks about the Lord's Supper in such a clear and fine way. First, he describes the last drink of Christ (as stated above) and speaks:

He took the cup and gave thanks, saying, "Take this and divide it among yourselves, for I tell you: I will not drink of the fruit of the vine until the kingdom of God comes." Here Christ testifies that this is to be his last drink of wine on earth with his disciples; but soon after he gives the cup of wine of the new supper 2c. Now if it is all bad wine in the new supper, how can it be true that this is to be the last drink, that he will drink no more wine? If it is the last drink of wine, then this cannot be wine that he gives to drink afterwards. If it is not wine, it must be what he calls "his blood" or "the new testament in his blood. So Lucas says here, that in the Lord's Supper of Christ there cannot be bad wine.

389) Here you might say, "Yes, who knows whether Christ spoke such words about the last drink before or after his supper? for Lucas writes, "He spoke such words before the Last Supper.

But Matthew and Marcus write as if he spoke them after the Lord's Supper. Well, then, the matter stands on which evangelist keeps the right order in writing. If Lucas keeps it, then the matter is bad, and our understanding is right; and the scribblers are lost; there is no doubt about it. Or if the scribblers have doubts about it, we are sure that we are right, and that is enough for us.

390 Now let us learn from the words and works of the evangelists who keep the right order in writing. St. Lucas in the beginning of his Gospel testifies [Luc. 1, 3] that he wants to write from the beginning and in order, and this he also proves by deed; for his Gospel follows one another finely to the end, as all the world testifies. But this is not what Matthew and Marcus promised; nor do they do it, as would be proven in many pieces. As when Matthew describes the temptation of Christ, Matth. 4, 1 ff., and the appearance of Christ after the resurrection, 2c., when he does not keep the order at all; and St. Augustin De consensu evangelistarum works much in it. Marcus does not keep the order in this place in the Lord's Supper, since he put the part "and they all drank of it" before these words "and he said, This is my blood," 2c.

Since there is no doubt that Matthew and Marcus do not keep the strict order, but Lucas, who undertakes to keep the same 1) and also keeps it, Matthew and Marcus must be judged with their writing according to St. Luke's order, and not again. And have to say that Matthew and Marcus have put this after the new. They do not ask much about the order, they have enough that they write the history and truth, but Lucas, who wrote after them, confesses that the causes of his writing were that many others had written such history without order, therefore he had undertaken to write properly. And so also many think and is

It is almost believable that St. Paul meant St. Lucam, because he testifies to the Corinthians, praises and says: "We have sent a brother with him, who has the praise of the gospel through all the common people" 2). [2 Cor. 8:18.] This also helps Lucas to keep the order with diligence, that he not only writes and speaks the last drink, but also the whole paschal lamb's last beforehand:

When the hour came, he sat down, and the twelve apostles with him. And he said unto them: I was heartily desirous to eat this passover with you before I suffer: for I say unto you, that I will eat no more of it henceforth, till it be fulfilled in the kingdom of GOD. And he took the cup" 2c. There you see that everything in one text is spoken of properly one after the other, both in eating and drinking, which Matthew and Marcus do not do. So then, if the last part of the meal stands before the new supper and should stand before it, then the last part of the drink must also stand before the new supper, because they are both one last part, and not different from each other.

393 Now we come back to the above-mentioned reason and decision. If Lucas keeps the right order (as is now proved), then Christ drinks the last drink of wine before the new supper; but if he drinks the last drink of wine before the new supper, then in the supper no worse wine can be drunk; for his words are clear that he says: He will no longer drink of the fruit of the vine after this drink.

394 "But if any man say against this, Thou thyself dost contend that wine should remain in the new supper; and this speech of thine ought well to be papistical, who believe no wine in the supper. I answer: I do not care much about that. For, as I have often enough confessed, it shall not matter to me whether wine remains there or not; it is enough for me that Christ's blood is there, let the wine do as God wills. And before I join the gushers

2) Thus the Wittenberg and Jena editions, according to the Bible. Erlanger: "We have sent along a brother, whose praise in the Evangelio gehet with all Christians." - Jenaer: "im" instead of: am.

1) In the editions: the same.

If I wanted vain wine, I would have kept vain blood with the pope.

395 Further, I said above that when the wine has become Christ's blood, it is no longer bad wine, but wine of blood, so that I can point to it and say, "This is Christ's blood. Neither is Christ silent about this, when he says, "I will not drink of the fruit of the vine. Why does he not say wine, but the fruit of the vine? Without doubt, the drink that is in the Lord's Supper does not come from the vine, like other bad wine; and even though it is wine, it did not grow as it is now. It is like pouring malt liquor under a little water; there is water, but it has become malt liquor to such an extent that it is no longer tasted. Then I can say of such a drink: The water is not drawn from the spring. So the wine in the Lord's Supper is no longer a crop from the vine, for a crop from the vine is certainly bad wine.

How? if Christ had not drunk in his supper, but only the disciples? I answer, How? if a fool could ask more than ten wise men could answer? It is not written that he gave the last drink; nevertheless, he did not give it to the disciples alone, but also drank it with them. After the last drink, the disciples will not have drunk any more, but will have kept themselves like Christ. Again, if the disciples drank the Lord's blood after the last drink, he will undoubtedly have drunk with them. Also 1) what am I fooling myself with such great questions? Let it be enough for the first piece from St. Luke, which is clear enough, it must not be vine's growth in Christ's supper. If it is not the vine, it can be nothing else than Christ's blood, according to his words: "This is my blood.

397] On the other hand, this part "who is given for you", which Lucas and Paul alone put, is also still tormented by some enthusiasts, especially of the Carlstadian kind, and they pretend that because it says "who is given for you", as a present history, Christ can be given for you.

1) Maybe: Oh.

The Lord's body will not be in the Lord's Supper, because neither then nor now will his body be given for us, nor will his blood be poured out; but in the first Lord's Supper it should read: who is to be given for you, and now: who was given for you. O wise high spirits. To this I have answered abundantly in the booklet against the heavenly prophets to the woman Hulda in the quatern J. K. 2) 2c.

They do not see, such spirits, that what they conjure up is just as strong against them as against us. For let Carlstadt's text apply: This is my body, which sitteth here; this is my blood, which sitteth here 2c.: how then shall his body be given, and his blood shed presently, as the words are, "Which is given for you, which is shed for you"? Christ cannot lie nor speak in vain, since he says in the Lord's Supper, "This is my body given for you; this is my blood shed for you." Now it is neither given nor poured out, as it should be, where the fanatic art should consist in these words. If they can now have both in their supper, namely, that Christ's body and blood are sitting there, still un-given and un-poured out for us, and yet it is true that he says: the body and blood are given and poured out for us, dear one, then our supper will also keep the same words true, although Christ is not given now, but once before. Read further in the same booklet, if you feel like it.

Thirdly, this text comes from Saint Luke: "This is the cup, the new testament in my blood, which is poured out for you", which must suffer, and still today are not one, how they want to torture and break the same enough. One takes the word "new testament" before itself, the other the word "in my blood" 2c. But no one pays attention to how he dresses or strengthens his naked thoughts and glosses with Scripture and good reason.

400 We also want to pay ourselves. 3) First of all, Lucas and Paul alone put these words

2) Thus the Wittenberg and the Jena. The old edition of Walch and the Erlangen: "K". Should the latter probably have it from its original?

3) "To teach" here means to instruct, to bring into the right direction.

"These things do in remembrance of me," and put them both when they speak of the bread, and not when they speak of the cup. For they think that it is said once enough, as it is true, although it refers to both parts of the sacrament and thus to the whole supper, as Paul further emphasizes and says: "As often as you eat this bread and drink from this cup, you shall proclaim the death of the Lord" 2c. [1 Cor. 11, 26.] They do this to indicate the cause and fruit of this supper, namely, that we should praise and thank God for the redemption from sins and death, as the Jews had to give thanks and praise for their redemption from Egypt. This is what we should speak and write about, because this is how the zealots get us into such hostile disputations.

401 Both Lucas and Paul also put these words for the cup: "The same also the cup after supper", or, "after they had supped". Why this? I truly respect, all for the sake of future enthusiasts, as if Lucas wanted to point back with the word, as with a finger, and remember the last drink. As if to say, "Remember what I said above about the last drink, that Christ will no longer drink of the fruit of the vine, so that you may know that I am speaking here of another drink, which took place after the Last Supper, when people had stopped drinking of the fruit of the vine, and that you do not understand this drink to be the same last drink, but a drink for the beginning of the New Supper. And especially Lucas and Paul speak this about the cup and not about the bread; because it is more dangerous and necessary with the cup, because one does not use to eat at the last, but to drink, so that it would not be understood as the last drink; although it goes to both, and to the whole supper/just as also the piece above about the remembrance 2c.

402 We let them rave and gloss as they wish; of course, 1) we are certain that Lucas does not mean anything else with this text "this cup is the new testament in my blood", but just the same as St. Matthew and Marcus mean with this text.

say, "This is my blood of the New Testament." For they must not disagree with each other, but with each other. Now make the text of Lucas as you will, so this must be the opinion that Marcus and Matthew say, "This is my blood of the new testament." If we now understand Lucas' words in such a way that they give us in the Lord's Supper the blood of Christ for the new testament, as Marcus and Matthew do, then we certainly have his right opinion. But whoever takes it differently or martyrs it, does not have it right. For then he would not agree with the others.

403 From this it follows that they are gross hemophiliacs who want to conclude from the words of Luca that the cup must be in the blood, when we want to follow his words as they are, because he says: "The cup, the new testament in my blood. For they think that "in the blood" here means the same as a peasant in boots, or meat in the pots, when they must confess that such an opinion cannot be in Mark and Matthew, and yet must not be contrary to each other.

But Lucas speaks (as he often does) in a Hebrew way, because this is how the Hebrew language speaks, Ps. 78, 64: Their priests fell by the sword, that is, they fell by the sword. Item: The princes were raised up in their hands, Klagl. 5, 12, that is, raised up by the hands. Item [Klagl. 5, 4.]: We drink our water in money, that is, for money. Item [5, 13.]: The boys fell in the wood, that is, they fell under the wood they had to carry. Item [Hosea 12, 13.]: Jacob served in Rachel, that is, for Rachel's sake [Gen. 29, 20.], and likewise much. So you see that "in" in Hebrew has a broad interpretation, but so that it nevertheless indicates that the thing of which it speaks must be present.

405. so here also Lucas wants to say: this cup is the new testament, in the blood of Christ, that is, through the blood or with the blood, or for the blood's sake 2c. Just as Matthew says, "This is my blood of the new testament." For the cup cannot be the New Testament, in silver, or by silver, or for silver's sake. Speak now, as you desire, these words:

"This cup is the new testament in blood", so far that you do not speak against Matthäum and Marcum. For it is soon told to a quiet, unconcerned spirit that the words Luca in German mean so much: This cup is a new testament, not because of its beautiful silver, or because of the wine, but because of the blood, and because of or for the blood of Christ. So that a German might read the text of St. Luke at home, or otherwise speak to himself in this way: This cup is the new testament because of the blood of Christ; which everyone understands to mean that the cup is a new testament because of the blood of Christ in it. Christ's blood is in it.

406 I have had to go so far as to make the text of Lucas certain, because, except that he speaks in the Hebrew manner, it is spoken in himself in the most obvious and simple way, and agrees with Matthew and Mark, without transposing the words, as the Hebrew language is wont to do. For as Matthew speaks in the Greek way, "This is my blood of the new testament," Lucas speaks in the Hebrew way, "This is the new testament in my blood." Now "new testament in my blood" and "my blood of the new testament" are not spoken against each other, but one word and interpretation, without one order being set; which makes the Hebrew speech kind, 1) as the scholars well know. And in order to avoid all confusion, I interpret the text of Lucas in the clearest and shortest way: "This cup is the new testament in my blood. Although Lucas does not put "is", but speaks thus: "This cup, the new testament in my blood" 2c. Which, if someone lusts, would like to interpret with two "is", thus: This is the cup, which is the new testament in my blood. But because Paul (who uses these very words of Luke) puts only one "is" and says: "This cup is a new testament in my blood", Lucas' text must of course be interpreted with one "is".

407 But I like Lucas with St. Paulo very much that they have kept the Hebrew way of speaking stiffly in this place, because Mat-.

The words of Christ were spoken in the Greek way by St. Matthew and St. Marcus, so that the words of Christ would be all the more true and so that the future mobs could be controlled. For they themselves confess how mightily Lucas and Paul have overthrown Tuto with their text of Carlstadt. And who does not know it, read my booklet against the heavenly prophets, tormentors G. H. 2) 2c. As they overthrow Carlstadt's Tuto, so they overthrow also the Silesian 3) Tuto, who reverse the Tuto and put it behind, as we have heard above, and say: My body, which is given for you, is this, namely a spiritual food.

408 Well, because here St. Lucas puts the tuto by the cup, and says, "this cup," let them also turn this text thus, and say, The new testament in my blood, which is shed for you, is this cup, that is, a spiritual drink. How thinkest thou here? A bodily cup is a spiritual drink. Dear, what does Lucas make of such enthusiasts when they thus turn him back? He makes such people who think silver or gold cups are spiritual drinks. This should be a strange spirit to me, who would drink and devour bodily, silver, and gold cups; he would not come to me, he would soon have drunk up my money and gold, and should be much more difficult to keep than the whole papacy, and devour more gold without masses than the papacy devours with masses.

409 See, this is what happens to the careless spirits, who think that where they can make a color in one place for their conceit, it is well done everywhere, and do not see around them how it rhymes in other places. For since they could say in Marco and Matthew: My body is this, my blood is that, namely spiritual food and drink, because they found the Tuto standing there alone, they wanted to deal with it to their liking, like those in Daniel with Susanna, and to dislocate the same and desecrate it with a false sense.

2) Thus the Wittenberg and the Jena edition. This refers us to the second part against the heavenly prophets, in this volume Col. 218, § 50 ff. - In the old edition of Walch and in the Erlangen: "K. 2c.

3) Krautwald and Schwenkfeld.

1) The old edition of Walch and the Erlanger: Redeart.

But they did not look to Lucas to turn them around with their art through his text, so that they would be seized with all the disgrace of their evil.

That is, "with the perverse you consort," Psalm 18:27. They want to turn God's word from the physical to the spiritual, and thereby turn themselves from the spiritual to the physical; for Lucas stands there clearly with his Tuto, and points with it to the physical cup and says, "this cup," that it is impossible to point Tuto here to a spiritual drink. Again, these gushers stand there with their reversal, saying that Tuto should point to a spiritual drink. Either Lucas or the enthusiasts must lie and deceive publicly. But if this Tuto in the cup cannot be turned around and made into a spiritual Tuto, then Tuto in the bread cannot do so either; and so the Silesian Tuto lies as deep in the mud as the Carlstadt Tuto. But when will the Rotten ever be ashamed of themselves, when they are so often caught in lies?

411 Ahead of the line, Oecolampad must also appear before St. Lucas' judgment seat with his sign. Body and blood (he says) are tropi in the Lord's Supper, and are called body's sign, blood's sign. If this is true, then without a doubt blood must also be a tropus, that is, blood sign, in Luke's text; for he speaks of the same blood that Matthew and Marcus speak of, no one can deny that. Well then, according to Oecolampad's opinion, Luca's text must be considered as such: This cup is a new testament in my blood sign, namely in the bad wine. This will be a good thing, if the new testament is no more than a drink of wine, or that a drink of wine has the power to make this cup a new testament; for this is what such an Oecolampadian text gives and wants.

(412) Take "testament" here as you will, it is certainly set against the old testament, because he calls it the new; therefore it must have the spiritual goods in it, which are signified and promised by the old testament and its goods, and are directed and fulfilled in the new; no one can say otherwise. But what Christian heart can suffer that our New Testament is a drink of wine?

Or that this cup is a new testament for a drink of wine? For Oecolampad leaves the word "is" as it reads, therefore, according to his art, the New Testament must be nothing else than the wretched cup, and yet that same thing no other than in virtue and for the sake of the wine, as a sign of the blood of Christ; so all the figures of the Old Testament would also be justified in calling the New Testament, because they are all such signs.

413 But if he wants to say that the text is to be put thus: This cup is a sign of the new testament in my blood, that the trope here is not in the blood but in the new testament, why then does he not make it all a sign and vain trope, and thus says: Ista figura calicis est figiira testamenti in figura sanguinis mei, id est, iste pictus calix est imago novi testamenti per signum sanguinis mei, id est, per vinum: This sign of the cup is a sign of the new testament, in the sign of my blood. That would be in German: This painted cup is a picture of the new testament, through the wine. O beautiful thing! who wants to show cause why one word and not the others all must also be tropus?

414 But let us admit to him that he verses this text thus: This cup is a sign of the new testament in my blood, so that blood here is not a trope, but real blood. First of all, he confesses that in the Lord's Supper, "blood" is not a trope, but the true blood of Christ. Here we ask, why does he make it a tropus in Matthew and Mark? How can Lucas be said to call the blood in the Lord's Supper different from that of Marcus and Matthew? If it is the right blood of Christ in Luke, then it must also be in Matthew and Mark; for they certainly speak of the same Lord's Supper, so they must also speak of the same blood and drink. Turn as you will: if blood is a trope in Matthew and Mark, it must also be a trope in Luke; if it is not in Luke, it must not be in Matthew and Mark. But if blood is not a trope, then body must not be a trope either. And so Lucas makes all the tropes null and disgraceful at one time.

Word. So the Trope, like the Tuto, falls over himself.

415 Secondly, it is even more shameful that such a text "this cup is a sign of the new testament in my blood" confesses that Christ's true blood is in the cup, and yet creates nothing more than that this cup is thereby a sign or figure of the new testament. This is nothing else than: the cup with the blood of Christ is a figure of the new testament. And so Christ's blood must not give the true new testament, but be a sign of the new testament, which is nothing better than the paschal lamb or goat's blood in the old testament, which is also a figure or sign of the new testament. For we have heard above that this word "in my blood" means as much as: through or with my blood, so that it is present in the cup, and the cup is therefore a new testament, because it has the blood of Christ in it.

416 This is called his death, and Christ's blood honored, that it should be reckoned like the blood of a goat, and be a figure of the new testament, and that we should be in the new testament, and yet at the same time be in the old testament. For he who has the figure of the New Testament cannot yet have the same New Testament, as the epistle to the Hebrews teaches. But from such a text of Oecolampad (where he wants to hold it) we would still have the new testament at the same time and would not have it; for we would have the figure of the new testament at the same time, and the new testament itself; that is not different, because we would have Christ's blood at the same time, and not his blood.

417 About that it is not to suffer, that "new testament" should be a trope. With what one wanted to prove it? Where is any of it an example? Yes, where would common language remain, so that I would like to or perhaps should speak plainly of the New Testament, if one wanted to have understood a sign or figure, as often as I called the New Testament? In this way, the New Testament would not be the Gospel or promise of the Spirit or of eternal life, but an old figure or image of the future New Testament. And in short, the trope does not want to send itself anywhere in the word "new testament".

much less can it be proved with some reason; that Oecolampad must remain on the first text, since blood is a trope, and say: This cup is a new testament in the sign of my blood; which text, nevertheless, our faith cannot suffer that bad wine should make this cup a new testament.

418 For the new testament is a promise, rather a bestowal of grace and forgiveness of sins, that is, the true gospel 2c. For though the cup is a bodily thing, yet because it becomes a sacramental thing with the blood of Christ, or with the new testament, it is properly called a new testament, or the blood, that one may point to it and say, This is a new testament; this is Christ's blood; just as above the bodily flame of fire is and is called a spiritual thing, namely the angel, and the dove the Holy Spirit. Therefore he that drinketh of this cup drinketh truly the true blood of Christ, and the remission of sins, or the Spirit of Christ, which are received in and with the cup; and shall not receive here any living figure or token of the new testament, or of the blood of Christ; for that is due to the Jews in the old testament.

419. But if someone wanted to look for a little help, and pretend that Oecolampad would put his text thus: This cup is a sign of the new testament in my blood, that not the blood should belong to the cup, but to the testament, on this opinion: The new testament is in the blood of Christ, and exists through the blood of Christ, and not so that the cup is a sign or figure through the blood of Christ, as if its text were written out, thus: This cup is a sign of the new testament; but the new testament is a thing that stands in the blood of Christ. Answer: Oecolampad knows well that such a text cannot be here; because there would have to be an article in the Greek after the "new testament", thus: xxxxx xxxxxxx x xx xx xxxxxx xxxx. The same article, however, is not there, but the text is attached to each other, as if it were all one inseparable word, just as the cup, blood, and New Testament are also in each other, as if it were one inseparable being, so that the meaning must be: This cup is one new testament in my blood, that is, because of my blood the cup is such a thing, and without my blood it would not be.

420 As Oecolampad lies down here with his tropo or sign, so also the Zwingel lies down with his interpretation. For what is contrary to the sign, is also contrary to the interpretation, because it is almost equally valid. For the Zwingel's text would have to stand thus: This cup signifies the new testament in my blood; that would be so much: This cup has so much through my blood, which is in it, that it thereby signifies the new testament; and therefore Christ's blood would have to be a signification and nothing more, however, as I have proved about Oecolampadii signification. For Zwingel cannot make the text so either: This cup means the new testament, so in my blood is. For the article "so" is not there, but it is the whole text equal as one word, as is said.

421 Is not St. Lucas a hostile man, who with a single word (to speak so) at one blow strikes so great giants and heroes, both tutists, figurists and interpretists, and all enthusiasts into one heap? And what does it help, if their texts could stand with the signification and interpretation? they cannot show a cup of likeness, in which such signification or figure could stand, as we have just heard in Oecolampadii Tropo. For in what is the cup like the New Testament through the blood of Christ? Is it in this that just as our sins are forgiven by it, so they are also forgiven by the blood of Christ? Or wherein will they be found? In the smoke hole. Why then do they teach figures when there can be none?

422. but Lucas has in this text a piece which no other evangelist has, nor Paul, namely, "which is shed for you," and not, which is shed for you; for in the Greek it is of the cup, and not of the blood, as no one can deny:

τοῦτο τὸ ποτηριὸν etc. ἐχχυνόμενον, and not ἵν τφ

αιματι etc. ἄχχυνόμενον. In Latini

It's hard to remember when they say: Qui pro vobis funditur, because cup and blood are both "der" in Latin; but in German it's easy to remember, because blood is "das" and cup is "der. Such has me

Once, three or four years ago, a fine learned priest in a village recalled and presented to me his opinion that Lucas should be understood thus: This cup is the new testament in my blood, which is poured out for you, that is, which is given over tables to you, and set before you to drink, as one otherwise pours wine out of a jug for the guests. And was that of his causes one, that Lucas (as said) is poured not of blood (as Matthew and Marcus), but of the cup says ἐχχυνόμενον. And led to this the text of Paul: "This is my body, which is broken for you", that is, divided out and presented to you over tables.

423 I, because I found that he did not hold it with the enthusiasts, but confessed that true body and blood were in the sacrament, I was glad, and let myself like such an opinion, without me considering it unnecessary, because no driving stood in the old mind, and pleases me still today, would also well wish that one could bring such an opinion from the Greek text; because with it the mouth of all enthusiasts would be shut again with all force. There is no doubt in my mind that Paul's text, "This is my body which is broken for you," is to be understood badly of the breaking and dividing over tables, as he also says in 1 Cor. 10:16: "The bread which we break is the body of Christ divided."

424 Since the text in Paul, which speaks of the bread or body of Christ, is understood of the distribution over tables, and not of the giving on the cross, the text of the cup can also suffer the same understanding. And so Matthew and Marcus would also find themselves, namely, "this is my body"; in which they say nothing of giving, as if it were otherwise well to be noticed that he gives his body to them, when he says, "this is my body," "there you have my body." So also of the cup, "this is my blood, poured out for you," that is, distributed over tables and set before them for the remission of sins. I still see nothing in [the] words that almost contradicts such understanding. For even St. Paul leaves out of the cup "which is poured out for you," as if he wanted to have said enough, because the bread was for them.

When the cup is broken, the cup will also be distributed for them.

425. Although this understanding was not held until now, but from the giving into suffering, and from the shedding on the cross everyone understood the text, it would not have been a harmful error, as it is not yet; For no one does wrong in keeping Christ's body and blood given and shed for us on the cross, though he does it in a place where nothing is said or read about it, without it being disputed or disputed, as otherwise the dear fathers have often kept the Scriptures without a road, in an uneven place, but in a good and useful understanding; so it looks to me as if some of the old fathers also had this understanding, as when they say that Christ's blood is so often given and shed on the cross: that Christ's blood is shed as often as one takes the Lord's Supper. And especially Ambrose, when he says: "If the blood of Christ, as often as it is poured out, is poured out for sin, then I should take it daily, because I sin daily. For the word luneitur means not only to pour, but also to pour and to give. Item, Gregorius: The blood of Christ is poured into the mouth of the faithful 2c.

I do not say this because I am sure of it, for I do not want to teach anyone what I am not sure of myself; but because I would like it to be so, and because I am not experienced in Greek, I would give scholars cause to investigate whether the Greek language would give it: then all the devotees would no longer have a remedy of an excuse against our understanding. They would have to confess 1) that Christ's body and blood would be distributed over tables, eaten and drunk in the flesh in bread and cups.

427. for my court right 2) I say that also meues Dünkens Lucas and Paul are strongly on this opinion: Paul with that he speaks (as is said): "this is my body, broken for you", and "the bread, so we break, is the distribution of the body of Christ." Thus we find probably more oerter, since Paul needs xxxx xxxxx, for us, pro:

coram vel ante, than 1 Cor. 15.: "Why let

1) Erlanger: had to" and immediately following: "became".

2) For "Court Law," see the note to Col. 285 in this volume, § 211.

they baptize themselves before the dead?" Lucas with that, that he speaks: "The cup in the blood is poured out", also xxxx xxxx, that is, for you, before your eyes presented to drink 2c., and with that, that he speaks: "The body is given for you", as Paul also speaks. Now "to give" admittedly means to give something, and not to deliver something in death.

428 But Matthew and Marcus let themselves be looked upon as if they were against it, because they say, "This is my blood, shed for many," or poured out. This is as if Christ were speaking of many, who are also not present over tables; and say not ὑπερ υμῶν, sed περί πολλῶν, which I leave to be fought out by those who understand Greek. Whoever would have a mind to the above opinion, let him answer thus or similarly, that Lucas and Paul speak of pouring or giving over tables, but report the shedding on the cross by saying: one should do this in his memory, or proclaim his death; as they speak more properly and clearly than Matthew and Marcus.

Again, Matthew and Marcus speak of the pouring on the cross, and are silent about the pouring on the tables, as they want to have sufficiently indicated by the word "that". Since we know that it is the habit of the evangelists that one says more and more about one thing than the other, and one leaves out what the other says. And so this word "which is given for you" would not be so clear and certain of the suffering of Christ, as the Zwingel dreams, who thereby wants to explain the previous part "this is my body", as we have heard above.

430. but he who has no desire to do so may answer that Lucas says, "The cup is poured for us," and thus say, "Since cup, and blood, and New Testament are One Sacramental Being, for the sake of such unity the cup is poured, though the blood alone is poured, per synec-.
but as we have said above, that the Son of God is spoken rightly, that he dies, although mankind alone dies, and the Holy Spirit is seen, although the dove alone is seen, and the angel is seen, although his bright form alone is seen 2c. Does anyone think this is too stale or be too lazy, he had better give it, or let the above opinion stand. I think it is right and enough to answer; for we also see and drink the cup, that is, Christ's blood. With us there is no driving, but vain advantage, which opinion we keep of the two, they are both good and right; for it is both so in fact, namely, that Christ's body is both given over tables and on the cross, though we do not meet it in the right place of Scripture (as has happened to many saints), yet we lack nothing of opinion and truth. But the enthusiasts have all power in this; for if such an opinion is not right in this text, they have nothing better in their cause with it; but if it is right, they lie altogether in ashes.

The fourth and last is St. Paul, who says 1 Cor. 11, 23-25: "I have received it from the Lord, which I have given you. For the Lord Jesus, on the night that he was betrayed, took bread, and gave thanks, and brake it, saying, Take, eat; this is my body which is broken for you, do this in remembrance of me. Likewise also the cup, after supper, saying, This cup is the new testament in my blood: this do, as often as ye drink, in remembrance of me."

If I were as learned in Greek as Carlstadt and Zwingel, I would conclude from this text that in the bread the true body of Christ is eaten. For Erasmus shows that in Greek there is no "is" in the bread, but thus: φάγετε τοῦτο ἐμὸν σῶμα, comedite hoc meum corpus, which I wanted to interpret thus: Take, eat this body of mine which is broken for you. This would have to be interpreted 1) from word to word correctly, without me skipping a little point, that would not have to hinder, so I would have won pure and fine. But now that I am not so learned, I must let it go, that I do not also compose an article for a pronoun, or an alloosin, and need casum pro casu.

433 But this is nevertheless true, how imperfectly Matthew and Marcus describe the Lord's Supper, we must notice from it,

That if it were not for Lucas and Paul, we could not have this sacrament. For Matthew and Marcus do not write that Christ has called us to do this, and also to keep it that way. And so we would have to leave it as another story of Christ with his disciples, which we could not or would not have to do. But Lucas and Paul write: Christ also called all of us to do this. Yes, if it were not for Paul, even Lucas could not do enough for us, as the only one who would be understood by the apostles that they should imitate Christ in this way; unless in Matthew something were done at the last, when Christ says: "Teach them to keep what I have commanded you. But whether it would be enough, I do not know. Paul is the right teacher and apostle, sent among us Gentiles, who also speaks freely and abundantly, saying, "Take, eat, this is 2) my body, which is broken for you."

434 For he places the word "my" harshly after the word τοῦτο or "this," which none of the others do. In addition, as some texts should read, he leaves the little word "is" outside, just as Lucas also leaves it outside with the cup. Which two little things the Holy Spirit shows us for our strength, that we may be sure that the body of Christ is in the bread. For although it is spoken as much among us when I say, "This is my body," and "This my body," or "Here my body," yet it is spoken more clearly and certainly of the presence of the body when I say, "This my body," or, "Here my body," and the spirits of the wicked with their swarming therein cannot so easily deceive as in the speech, "This is my body."

435 Now there is no doubt that Christ speaks such words against the old paschal lamb, which he herewith abolishes, as if he should say: Until now you have eaten the lamb and the body of an animal; but now in its place is my body, "mine, mine," I say even differently. Therefore Paul insists so diligently on the word "my" that he puts it in a new way soon after "that," and says, "That my," as if he would like to tie it to it in such a way that it would become one word with the "that," since "my" and "body" must be much closer to each other. He does all this so that he may pronounce the body of Christ clearly enough in the Lord's Supper.

2) is" is missing in the Erlanger. That it must stand here, proves the immediately following. Because if the "is" should be missing here, Luther could not say in the following: "Dazu, als etliche Texte sollen lauten" 2c.

1) Erlanger: had to.

436. "Who is broken for you." Of this we have said much above, that the Scripture cannot suffer that "breaking" should mean Christ's suffering. The enthusiasts may say it, as they say other things, but never prove it; for we must neither interpret nor use "breaking" according to our own conceit, but according to the scriptural custom. Now "to break" in Scripture, especially where it is said of bread or food, means as much as to cut or divide; so that even such broken bread is called both in Greek, Latin and German χλάσμα, fragmentum, Brocken.

Yes, also in Hebrew, for the sake of such breaking, grain is called Sheber, that is, Brocken, Gen. 42, 1: "Jacob heard that Brocken was in Egypt", that is, food or grain, which is broken for eating; and after that buying grain there is called Shabar, as if we should say: We want to get Brocken, that is, food 2c. But Christ's body was not broken nor cut in pieces at the cross, of which more is said above. So this text is strong, that Christ's body is broken over tables, and cut in pieces, and crushed, and eaten, as other bread, but in the form of bread, or in the bread 2c.

437 And if it could be proved that the breaking here should be called Christ's suffering, wherein then will the likeness stand, that in the Lord's Supper the bread of Christ's body is a sign? For I gave in above, that they might make broken bread, as they might, the likeness. But now they separate the breaking also from the bread, and appropriate it to the body of Christ on the cross, tell me, wherein then will the bread of his body be the likeness? Not otherwise, for as I said above, the bread must be called like Christ's body, and yet is nowhere like it in the sense demanded by the words in the Lord's Supper. Further:

438. "This cup, the new testament, is in my blood." Now it may be that this text applies just as much as if I say: This cup is a new testament 2c. Still

Paul did not put the "is" after the word "new testament" and not before it for nothing. The Holy Spirit has wanted to precede the future rotten. For St. Paul puts utrumque a parte subjecti, tam calicem, quam testamentum, ceu unum subjectum, that is, his text reads thus: that this cup, being a new testament, is the same in Christ's blood; and thus freely calls the cup the new testament. If the enthusiasts had as much text for themselves as we have here, how should they defy and insist? Now the New Testament cannot be bad wine or cup.

439 But that they would pretend that "new testament" here means a sign or figure of the new testament is abundantly and mightily accounted for. For they say it and do not prove it. But nothing is given to their saying, for it has never been heard in Scripture that the "new testament" should be called a sign of the new testament. They say: The thing itself compels it. Which one? The cup (they say) must be a physical thing, as silver, wood, gold or glass 2c. Now silver can never be the new testament, but if it is something, then it is its sign, and that is all it can be. This is what is said above in Luke.

440 But because they are so stubborn and stiff, I will also need their umbrella. Tell me, how can the cup be a sign of the New Testament, since it is bad silver or wood? Is it a sign of the new testament according to the material, or according to the sound, or according to the form, or in what? Well then, any cup, whether it be in a box, or in a goldsmith's store, or wherever it may be, empty or full, is nevertheless a sign of the new testament, for it has silver, wood, sound, form 2c. What then might Christ call the cup over tables, as no other cup in the world has silver, sound, form, that is, the likeness of the new testament in itself? No (they say), but the cup, as presented with wine to drink, so it is a sign of the new testament 2c.

441 There hear two pieces: The first, here they themselves must make a new unity and being out of cup and wine, if they are nevertheless two different natures, and must make such a unity and being out of cup and wine.

new beings call cup and sign, yet they do not mean the the wine should be a sign of the blood of Christ, or new cup alone, but especially the wine, just as we said above testament, and yet in it such likeness should stand, about the flame and angels. Can they now let it happen however grossly acted. For the new testament is the among themselves that one says: The cup is 1) a sign 2c., gospel, the Spirit, the forgiveness of sins, in and through if they do not mean the cup alone, but the wine (as it has the blood of Christ, and what is more; for it is all one thing, become one thing with the cup), and do not like that one and gathered into one heap or essence, all in the blood, separates such unity or essence of the cup and wine, and all in the cup. Where one is, there is the other also; calls the cup without wine a sign: We kindly request that whoever names or shows one thing, meets it all. Now they also allow the Holy Spirit to speak to us in this way in how can bad wine interpret or signify such great things, his matters, so that he may call the cup a testament and when all the figures of the Old Testament can hardly show that it has now become not only a cup, but with the signify them? Not differently, because as I said: The wine testament and blood of Christ a sacramental being; or should and must be called a sign, even if it can not be, show us the reason and causes why they have such there is no power. Are these not poor people who not only power to speak in this way among themselves, and that lose the essence, as the body and blood of Christ in the the Holy Spirit should not have it. Lord's Supper, but also the sign or figure for it, and have cup is nothing more than a cup or silver, even as well as 444 We have proved above in Luke that these words they know that if cup and wine were to be separated from cannot be a trope: "This cup is the new testament in my one another, then the cup would not be a sign of the new blood", because the word "in my blood" means as much testament, but a bad cup. Such deception is called the as through or with my blood. For Christ's blood does not logici arguere a parte ad totum negative, hoc est, ab have to be such an impotent thing that it only gives a sign inferiori ad superius negative, sive a particulari ad of the new testament, as the calf's blood of Moses did in universale; which is common to the enthusiasts. As if cup cannot be such a great thing, namely the new said: Peter has no ear, therefore Peter has no body; gold testament, by blood sign, or bad wine. is not black, therefore gold is without color. But the gushers can't do child logic either.

442 If they mock us, that we call the cup a new nothing more than the peasants in the common wine testament, and us the cup of the new testament, and house, without being able to comfort themselves with divide such sacramental unity or essence, we again mock words, as if the figure were there, and cannot say in what their sign, and divide the cup and wine from one another, such a figure stands. So it serves them right; because and divide their sign unity or essence, as they divide our they do not want to have the kernel and pith, they should sacramental unity. For if the cup and the new testament not keep the skins and husks either, and over which they were to be separated from one another, and if each were want to dispute and spoil our thing, they should also lose to be kept apart in its own essence, we would know that a their own and keep nothing.

443. secondly, we would like to know how or with which piece the cup with the

445. Summa, if we hold the evangelists and Paul together, that they stand for one man, then they suffer no Tutists, Tropists, nor Dentists. If the tropists in Matthaeum and Marcum want the blood to be called blood sign, Lucas and Paul come forth and overthrow the tropists by force, because they show with their text that blood should not be called blood sign or be tropus, because the tropists themselves have no blood sign.

In this text, "this cup is the new testament in my blood"; therefore, in Matthew and Mark, the same blood must also be without a trope, because it is the same blood, of which all four speak.

But if they want to take Lucas and Paul and make the word "new testament" into a trope, that is, a sign of the new testament, then Matthew and Marcus, along with Luke and Paul, go and overthrow them again, and show that the "new testament" cannot be a trope. And even in Matthew and Mark, the enthusiasts cannot make the word "new testament" into a trope, just as little as they cannot in Luke and Paul. For it does not suffer me to say in Matthew and Mark, This is my blood of the figurative new testament. For Christ's blood is not of the figurative testament, or of the old testament, but of the new, which consists in his blood; and yet the same new testament must be understood in Luke and Paul, which is understood in Matthew and Mark, because all four of them speak of the same testament. So Matthew and Marcus hold the word "new testament", pure and simple without any trope. Lucas and Paul hold the word "blood", pure and simple without any trope. There the enthusiasts must lie, that I know for certain, and if they answer you correctly on this, then you shall give them cheerfully won.

447 Therefore the text must remain as the words read, that, I hope, is tremendously won, and our conscience well assured that our understanding is right, and the enthusiast not only uncertain, but also wrong.

448) Where are now the little enthusiasts, who are insisting that Christ has never done no sign, except 1) visibly or sensitively 2) standing there? Was this not a sign that John saw the Holy Spirit coming from heaven? John 1:32; the Holy Spirit was not yet visibly present.

but in the form of the dove. Was this not a sign? When Zacharias saw the angel Gabriel at the altar of incense? Luc. 1, 11. The angel was not yet visible, but in the form of flames of fire. Was this not a sign that the Son of God was walking on earth personally? God's Son was not yet visibly there. What is it then, that one builds on such loose, rotten grounds, and thereby denies and blasphemes God's word and works, without wanting to be deliberately lost?

449 Admittedly, it is a miraculous sign that Christ's body and blood are in the sacrament; it is not yet visibly there, but it is enough for us to feel that it is there through word and faith. Yet their sign is not visibly there either. For though they see the cup of wine visibly, yet they cannot see that it is a sign of the body and blood; but they must speak it with words, and believe it with their hearts; for it is not written on the cup, neither painted, nor formed, that it is a sign of the blood of Christ. This is foolishness, but it is terrible that one should build on it and defy God's word.

(450) Where are all the others who say that there is no forgiveness of sins in the Lord's Supper? St. Paul and Lucas say that the New Testament is in the Lord's Supper, and not the sign or figure of the New Testament. For the figure or sign of the new testament belonged to the old testament among the Jews; and whoever confesses that he has the figure or sign of the new testament confesses that he does not yet have the new testament, and has run back, and denied Christ, and become a Jew. For Christians shall have the New Testament in themselves without figure or sign. They may have it hidden under a strange form, but they must have it truly and presently. If then the new testament is in the Lord's Supper, then forgiveness of sins, spirit, grace, life and all blessedness must be in it. And all these things are put into words; for who would know what was in the Lord's Supper if the words did not proclaim it?

451 Therefore, behold, what a beautiful, great, wonderful thing it is, how it is all intertwined and is one sacramental being.

1) "denn" is missing in the Erlanger.

2) "or sensitive" is missing in the Erlanger.

The words are the first; for without the words the cup and bread would be nothing. Further, without the bread and cup, the body and blood of Christ would not be there. Without the body and blood of Christ, the New Testament would not be there. Without the New Testament, forgiveness of sins would not be there. Without forgiveness of sins, life and blessedness would not be there. Thus, the words firstly include the bread and the cup for the sacrament. The bread and the cup fast the body and blood of Christ. The body and blood of Christ fast the New Testament. The New Testament fasts forgiveness of sins. Forgiveness of sins grasps the eternal life and blessedness. Behold, the words of the Lord's Supper suffice and give us all these things, and we grasp them by faith; should not the devil then be hostile to such a Supper, and raise up enthusiasts against it?

Since all these things are one sacramental essence, one can well and rightly say of each piece, as of the cup: This is Christ's blood, this is the New Testament, there is forgiveness of sins, there is life and blessedness. Just as I point to the man Christ and say: This is God, this is truth, life, blessedness, wisdom 2c. That is enough of that, Paul wants to hear further.

453. "As often as you eat this bread and drink this cup, you shall proclaim the death of the Lord until he comes. Notice again that cup here cannot be understood for bad silver and wood (for who can drink silver and wood?), but because the cup has become one being with the drink, cup here is also called the drink in the cup; so that you see how such a way of speaking is common in all languages. After this also: "He eats of this bread and drinks of this cup. Who can drink of the cup, that is, of silver or wood? But, as I said, it is the way of all languages to speak in this way, where two things become one, that the same one thing keeps both names; as the Holy Spirit is the dove, and the dove is the Holy Spirit.

Here the enthusiasts are rejoicing and shouting: Won! There, you hear that St. Paul calls bread and cup, and does not say, "As often as you eat the body of Christ and the blood," but, "I have won.

Christ's drink 2c. Dear, let us also cry out: St. Paul does not say: As often as you drink the wine, but the cup. Why then do they drink wine, and not the cup? When St. Paul speaks of drinking the cup, does it not follow that they drink the cup, but understand the wine in the cup, because the cup and the wine have become one thing? Dearly beloved, why then must it follow that we eat vain bread, when Paul speaks of eating bread, and may not also as well be understood the body in the bread, for the sake of the sacramental unity? May the poor carnivores not have such understanding, but only the glorious enthusiasts?

I call out once again. St. Paul does not say: As often as you eat the sign of the body and drink the sign of the blood 2c. Therefore bread cannot be the sign of the body, nor wine the sign of the blood. Is it not fine? But if such a text does not deny to the enthusiasts their sign, dear one, why should it then deny to us that there is body and blood? For he speaks so little of the sign as of the body and blood. Therefore he must be as strong against them as against us; and if he does not strike them, he does not strike us either, if that is enough: Paul says here not so, therefore it is not so; that is, ex puris negativis syllogisare. What reason this is for founding special articles of faith, children know well.

456 But this is true, according to the rule of the Silesian spirit they are right, and I must give them victory; for this rule holds: that one should put the texts out of sight and not look badly at them, since Christ's body and blood are spoken of as being in the Lord's Supper, for they hinder the spirit and spiritual mind. The other rule is to turn one's eyes elsewhere, where such texts are not written, and then cry out, "Behold, behold, it is not written here that the body and blood are in the Lord's Supper. They follow these rules also in this place. For hard before, when St. Paul said, "This is my body," item: "The new testament in my blood," that is nothing, they act as if this text were in no place in the world, and do not look at it. Here again, when it is not there, they stare, open their mouths and noses, and search for such a text.

as if St. Paul in all places and in all ranks 1) had to put no other word than this: "This is my body" 2c., so that they could see it. But since all their diligence is to look for this text "this is my body" elsewhere, where it is not written; why do they not also look for it in Marcolpho, or in Dietrich of Bern? then they would be sure that they would not find it. These must be either boys or furious people, who seek and demand a thing, since it is not, and do not want to see, since it is, and since one puts it before their noses.

457 Although St. Paul does not forget this text, even in this place, because he does not speak of bad bread and cups, but says: "This bread, this cup", and with these words: "this" and "this" he points back to the bread and cup, since he had said about it. Now if they were to follow these two pointers back, and see what kind of bread and cup he is pointing to, they would probably find that this bread is the body of Christ, and the cup the New Testament; for he is speaking of the same bread and cup when he says, "this" and "this," as even children and fools well know.

But the enthusiasts jump over these words "this" and "this", yes, they do them according to their rule from the eyes, and stare only at the words "bread" and "cup" old, but do not want to suffer that one should look at "cup" so over, as they overlook our "this" and "this". If they now cry out: St. Paul does not say here: As often as you eat the body of Christ 2c., you should say: He nevertheless says it here. Where? and with what text? Then say, With the word "this" and "this"; behold the same, thou shalt find therein such a text, "This is my body, this is the new testament in my blood," for they repeat such a text, and lay it before thee; but before thine eyes they cannot lay it, for thou turnest them always elsewhere.

But how serious it is to the spirit such questions and defiance, notice: Dro-.

1) d. i. series.

When there are bright words: "This is my body", "This is my blood", they can find little bells and say: "This is my body's sign, my blood's sign. If then Paul already puts such a text here: "As often as you eat the body of the Lord and drink his blood," 2c., how sour it would be for them to do the same and say: "As often as you receive the sign of the body and the blood," 2c. The spirit thinks that one does not understand his mischievousness; rather, whoever can gloss over this text: "This is my body," which cannot be said more brightly nor more clearly, will certainly be able to gloss over this text much more: "As often as ye eat the Lord's body," which is not so bright as that; without the mind having to color and preen itself as if it would believe where Paul said, "As often as ye eat the Lord's body," lest it should be seen how his hopefulness despises the text, where it is clearly stated that one should eat his body, namely, "Take, eat, this is my body." Rather, let them themselves give a bright text, which they could not gloss over, that I would like to hear. For where the word "body" comes out, there can soon be the gloss: "sign of the body"; although it is a shame that one should use such words in such matters; but the enthusiasts are not ashamed of it. 2) Well, it helps us for the best that we become the more certain of our understanding, because they are so frivolous and childish in their giddiness against it. Further:

V. 29. Whosoever therefore eateth the bread unworthily, or drinketh the cup of the Lord unworthily, he shall be guilty of the suffering and blood of the Lord.

460) Now here is bread and a cup for the scribblers, since they are to make out bread and a cup (that is, wine), and then ask and demand why St. Paul does not say, "He who eats the body of Christ unworthily" 2c. For the fact that St. Paul says, "This bread," and points back to the bread of which he spoke above, must not be looked at, but put out of sight, lest it hinder the spiritual mind, and think otherwise than that St. Paul did not say, "This bread," badly.

2) Erlanger: nothing.

"Bread", as if its text stood here thus: Who a bread unworthy is set 2c. So we certainly find the truth. But we praise God that we see how Paul always repeats and introduces this text "this is my body" with the word "this", as it is said above; and confirms this even more brightly, since he says: "Whoever eats this bread unworthily, let him be guilty", not of mere bread, or of the sign of the body of Christ, but "of the body of the Lord".

461 Dear, let us here also insist a little on their way. Why does not St. Paul say: He is guilty of the bread or of the sign of the body of Christ who eats this bread unworthily? Since the text forcibly enforces that this sin is the unworthy eating, and yet they pretend that it is vain bread which they eat, he must be guilty of the bread which he eats, according to the manner of the words and language. For Paul saith not, Whosoever unworthily considereth the passion of Christ is guilty of the body of the Lord. If they can attack us with the questions, why Paul does not say: Whoever does not eat Christ's body worthily 2c., and want to have won that Christ's body is not there, where we do not show it; then they should stand us again to our question: Why St. Paul does not say: Whoever does not consider Christ's suffering worthily, or does not eat the sign of his body worthily 2c.? And where they do not show it, they shall also have lost their gloss, according to the measure and right, since they want to measure us with it.

462 But I know well that they themselves do not believe such glosses; but because they stand on it, that it is vain bread, they think it must be said and glossed. For where they do not stand on it, they would spit at such glosses themselves. And they themselves see Carlstadt's gloss and must confess that it is a pure poem. For St. Paul does not punish the Corinthians for the unworthy remembrance of Christ's suffering, as a child can read and prove; for he describes in express words that the Corinthians were sinners, that one did not wait for another, but he who came before ate before, so that those who came after found nothing, and passed with disgrace, and so made a noisome meal of the Lord's Supper, as if they had not come before.

Otherwise it would be a bad meal. For thus saith he, When ye come together, there is no supper of the Lord, but every man taketh his own supper before him." Do you hear here that they did not take supper of the Lord, but of their own bellies; for because the others were slow in coming, they went and left the Lord's supper, and ate in the meantime, just as he also says afterwards, "When you come together to eat, wait one for another, lest you come together for 1) judgment." There you see that sin has been in the eating.

Therefore Oecolampad gives a better gloss (as he thinks) and says: The Corinthians have sinned against the sacrament, that is, against the bread and wine, which are signs of the body and blood of Christ, with unworthy eating, as if he who dishonors an emperor's image dishonors the emperor himself. So whoever eats this bread and wine unworthily dishonors the body and blood of Christ, whose image or sign they are. So they are divided among themselves of the glosses, as well as of the text; nor shall the one Holy Spirit teach them both. In particular, however, Oecolampad's gloss is nothing. First of all, since we have just proved and lamented that bread and wine are not, nor can they be, signs or images of the body and blood of Christ; for no little thing can be shown in which such likeness stands; therefore even this example of the emperor's image cannot rhyme with the gloss, unless it is first made certain that bread and wine are images or likenesses of the body and blood, just as the emperor's image is likeness.

464 Secondly, if such a simile were here, it would be a fine idea for a gloss, but not certain. For who could not make glosses and go away and say: Here I have been? No, because they want to interpret the text differently than the words read, and overthrow our understanding, they do not have to set such naked, bare, hungry and thirsty little bells there, and turn and troll away; but they must prove tremendously that such little bells are right and must and should belong here. Now we Oecolampad does not even think that he wanted to do such a thing, but thinks that his mere little bell is enough. But where is my conscience, which would like to stand on good ground and secure? Should it stand on the hungry, thirsty and meager little bell? But what is it to the spirit where the conscience remains?

465 Thirdly, such a gloss, because it is uncertain, can also have no appearance, unless it is first certain and proven that in the Lord's Supper there is only bread and wine. For where the true body and blood of Christ is in the Lord's Supper, this poor fainted little bell lies in the ashes. Now they have not hitherto proved, nor can they prove, that there is the same bread and wine, neither have they proved, nor can they prove, that there is the sign of the body and the sign of the blood, if they could prove that there is the same bread and wine; for they have neither proved, nor can they prove, either of these; but we have strongly proved that, as the words are, there is the body and blood of Christ. Therefore, if they had previously proved the text in the Lord's Supper according to their meaning, we might suffer such little bells in this place for the sake of good friendship; for it [the gloss] is not good even in itself, 1) as we shall hear.

Fourth, the very finest thing, that Oecolampad in this place does not consider "body and blood" to be tropus, but as the words read, "he is guilty of the body and blood of the Lord," what will come of that? This is what wants to come out of it: If body and blood are to be understood in this place, as the words read, and are not tropus, then they must not be tropus in the text of the Lord's Supper either: for it will not suffer itself into any way that Paul should use one and the same word over one thing or matter, and in one speech, differently and otherwise, as a two-faced and cunning deceiver; but he must plainly let body and blood be the same in both places, and one word. If "body" in the Lord's Supper is called the sign of the body, and "blood" the sign of the blood, then here it must also be called the sign of the body and the sign of the blood. If here it is properly called body and blood, then in the Lord's Supper it must be called body sign and blood sign.

1) In the editions: taug.

If he speaks of the same Lord's Supper in both places, he must also speak of the same body and blood, for there he teaches and institutes it, and here he exhorts to the proper use of it.

467 Where is this hungry, thirsty little bell: "He who eats unworthily is guilty of the Lord's body," that is, he who scorns the King's image scorns the King himself? If the body is the sign of the body, then the little bell must turn: Whoever eats this bread unworthily is guilty of the sign of the body, that is, of the bread; for the body here must also be called the sign of the body or the bread; if not, then both text and glosses, with gushers and all, lie in the dirt over a heap. See what toil, what journey and what misfortune are those who want to make lies into truth and bring them to market against the truth.

468 If the saints are to persevere, they now have three great tasks. The first is to prove in the Lord's Supper how the body and blood are the sign of the body and blood, or vain bread and wine. The other, that they prove how such vain bread and wine is the sign of the body and the sign of the blood. If they have done this (on the devil's ascension), they must again have so great and greater an effort that they prove in this place that body and blood are not signs of body and blood; for they must prove that at the same time in the same speech and thing blood is not blood, body not body, yet again that same blood is blood, and the same body is and is called body; there art will belong, id est, contradictoria simul vera facere.

Fifth, even if all other things were bad, and he lacked none, yet the little bell itself is also unworthy. For St. Paul does not say: "Whoever eats this bread unworthily is guilty of Christ," according to Oecolampad's opinion, as he is guilty of the king who scorns the king's image, but St. Paul indicates that the guilt is due to the pieces of Christ, to which the bread and wine should be equal or a sign, namely, "of the body and blood (he says) he is guilty" 2c. According to this, Oecolampad would have to put his graces and examples thus or similarly: He who dishonors the nose on the image, the dishonors the king's nose. He who mocks the mouth of the image mocks the mouth of the king. So that the dishonor done to the image is not to the person, but to the pieces that are dishonored in the images. For Paul does not refer here to the person of Christ, but to the body and blood of Christ as pieces of the person.

I say this so that you may see how Oecolampad does not conduct his glosses and examples correctly and does not rhyme with St. Paul's text. For if it were to rhyme, St. Paul, as has been said, would have to speak thus: Whoever eats this bread is guilty of Christ; just as he is guilty of the king who dishonors the king's image, that is, he sins not against a member or part of the person, but against the majesty and regiment of the king. For this is what is meant by such speech. But here St. Paul says: "One sins against the parts of the person, as against the body and blood of Christ, which is closer and more than against the majesty or regiment of Christ. Therefore such a little bell is also in itself nothing that speaks of the majesty and regiment, as the text speaks of pieces or parts of the person. Further:

V. 28: Let man examine himself, and so let him eat of the bread and drink of the cup.

471 Here again is bread and cup. So Paul does one thing after another; now he calls it bread and cup, then again body and blood, then again bread and cup, and again for the third time body and blood. That he may make us ever sure that this sacrament is not bread and wine only, but also the body and blood of Christ. Without this, the enthusiasts must take their eyes off where he calls it body and blood, and stick to it only where he calls it bread and cup; or they must gloss and drop body and blood, but not gloss nor drop bread and cup, and thus play and go with the text as they please.

472 And especially is this place strong for them; for St. Paul saith not, So eat he of this bread, but badly, Of the bread, and of the cup, not of this cup. Well, we leave it up to them whether they want St. Paul to speak here of another bread and cup, or of the

the same. If he speaks of another, it does not matter to us, and we may suffer them to make vain bread and wine, and it does not help them; for we speak of the bread in the Lord's Supper. But if he speaks of the same bread and cup (as there is no doubt), we have heard enough what the same cup and bread are in the previous text. What is said there also belongs here. Last of all:

V. 29: He who eats and drinks unworthily eats and drinks judgment to himself, as he who does not distinguish the body of the Lord.

I have written enough about Carlstadt's distinction in the booklet Against the Heavenly Prophets. For it cannot be spoken of the remembrance of the Passion, as Carlstadt's spirit pretends, because here the text forces violently that one thing is to eat unworthily and not to discern the body of Christ; which we understand from the word as it reads, that the Corinthians ate the bread with such ignorance or lack of reason as if it were bad bread, and made no distinction between this bread and other bread; that is, to eat the body of Christ unworthily. Therefore he exhorts them to examine themselves, and to know who they are, and what they think of this bread. For if they do not consider it to be the body of Christ, or if they handle it as if it were not the body of Christ, they do not distinguish the body of Christ; for this does not go unpunished. We know well how St. Paul uses the word discernere pro discernere, as 1 Cor. 4:7: Who hath discerned thee? That is, who has made you so special above others, as if you were better and different than the rest? And Rom. 14:23: "But he that distinguisheth is condemned," that is, he that esteemeth this sin and that right, and yet doeth contrary. And so henceforth St. Paul is called discernere, which we call making a difference, distinguishing, holding this different from that.

474 Oecolampad, however, has better appearances, because he also shows such a difference to the honor, which happens to the king through the honor of the image, as we have seen above in the other saying. But it lacks here just that

1) Thus the Wittenberg. Jenaer and Erlanger: a.

There, and everything I said against him in that saying is also to be said against him here. For since we have the text plainly as it reads, and they want to take it from us and interpret it differently, it is not enough that they say a naked little bell, and thus bid us good night, but must prove it with scripture and causes that such a little bell should be right and belong here. He does not do this, nor can he. For who will believe that "Christ's body cannot be distinguished" is nothing more than Christ himself in his signs of dishonor? For it has not yet been proven that in the supper there is only bread and a sign of the body, on which such a dilapidated little bell is based.

475. In addition, he must not take "the Lord's body" for the true body of Christ, but for his body sign, because St. Paul cannot speak of another body, because he says: "This is my body" [1 Cor. 11, 24], since he still speaks of the Lord's Supper in one thing; so he must also be in one word. If then here the body is not the sign of the body, why is it the sign of the body there? If it is body here, why is it not also body there? Therefore this little bell must go down with texts and with everything, or must be put thus: "Who does not distinguish the sign of the Lord's body. So the piece also lies, and Paul is still firmly on our side; for we find his words rhymed simply, unanimously, unobjectionably to our understanding, and must neither gloss over nor trouble to interpret them otherwise than they read.

476. Now let us also see the text of St. Paul in the tenth chapter, where he says: "The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not the communion of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not the fellowship of the body of Christ?" [1 Cor. 10:16.]

This text I have praised and still praise as my heart's joy and crown. For it not only says, "This is Christ's body," as in the Lord's Supper; but it calls the bread that is broken, and says, "The bread is Christ's body"; yea, "the bread which we break" is not Christ's body alone, but "the body of Christ divided. This is once a text so bright and so clear, as the enthusiasts and all the world could not desire nor demand; nor does he help. To such a text they answer me nothing more, because after that they are divided among themselves. Some say that Paul speaks of symbolic or figurative fellowship; but others of spiritual fellowship, and add that it follows of the fellowship of the altar and of the devils, and so strike it off, not seeing that they prove it or force it out of the texts; so I am to be satisfied with their mere words and glosses, and do just as if I greeted one, and he turned back, and thundered with his buttocks, and so went away. Well, they should not run away and leave the stink behind, if God wills it.

In the first place, there is no doubt that St. Paul here also speaks of the Lord's Supper, because he speaks of the bread, cup, body and blood of Christ; and must certainly speak of the same body and blood, bread and cup, since the Lord's Supper speaks of them; if not, then this text is of no concern to us, and whoever may think that he speaks of bad common food. From this it follows that on Oecolampad's art this text must stand thus: The bread which we break is a communion of bread, which is a sign of the body of Christ. The cup of blessing which we bless is a communion of wine, so a sign is the blood of Christ. Isn't it a fine text? Bread is a communion of bread, cup is a communion of wine? What is this then? The broken bread is a fellowship of bread, that is, the broken bread is a common portion of bread? Could Paul not teach us anything else here, except that the bread that is broken is the bread that is made whole? Or was he worried that we would understand unbread as unbreaded sausages, and unbreaded wine as unbreaded water? These are their own words, that body shall be called body sign, that is, bread, blood shall be called blood sign, that is, wine, as we have heard enough, and they have clicked all books about it.

479 But if the trope is to stand on the word "communion" and be a sign of communion, or a figurative communion, thereby signifying spiritual communion, then, to this retrograde and ver-

According to Tropo, Oecolampad's text thus stands: The bread we break is a figurative communion of the figurative body of Christ, which is the bread. Dear, what is this more and more said: Bread is a figurative communion of the bread? For so they must speak, so their trope must stand. Now shall one bread be another's sign or figure, as the same is divided and common? For they must both be natural and corporal bread; the first because it is broken, the other because it is a sign of the body of Christ.

I consider that the Spirit, because he is able to do all things, considers the first bread that is broken to be a painted bread on paper, or a carved bread, which may well be a figure or sign of the other right bread that signifies Christ's body, so that the text may read: "The broken wooden bread is a figurative communion of the right bread, which is a sign of Christ's body. For all these things enforce their tropi. If not, it must stand thus: The broken bread, which may not be a figurative communion of the bread, is nevertheless a figurative communion of the bread. For it is not possible for one bread to be a figurative communion of another.

481 We have also proved above that such a retrograde and inverted trope cannot be in Scripture or in any language, but is a pure poem. For according to the Scriptures and all languages, the word "fellowship" must thus become a trope, so that it indicates a spiritual fellowship, or a new and different fellowship, above the old bodily fellowship. Just as body and blood must be called a spiritual or other body and blood, where they become a trope, or are not to be called the bodily blood and body. Therefore, in this place "fellowship" must be called bad bodily fellowship or distribution; or if it is to be a trope, it must be called a new spiritual fellowship, according to which the text should read thus: The bread we break is a spiritual fellowship of the body of Christ. But if body here is also a proper trope, it must be called the spiritual body of Christ, which is the church 2c. And the text would stand in summa thus:

The bread we break is a spiritual dispensation of Christianity, on the opinion that where this bread is broken, Christianity is dispersed, and many abominable abominations would follow.

482 Let them choose here which one they want. If the "body" and "blood" in this place are tropus, or the sign of the body and the sign of the blood, namely bread and wine, as their doctrine holds, then they may not resist all this abominable consequence which I have now introduced, as everyone must grasp this and cannot deny it, especially where they also want to have communion figuratively. But if it is not tropus, but the body and blood of Christ, as our doctrine holds, then it cannot be tropus in other places of the Lord's Supper. For no one can deny that here St. Paul speaks of the Lord's Supper, and calls and means the same blood and body that Matthew [Cap. 26, 26], Marcus [Cap. 14, 22, 24], Lucas [Cap. 22, 19, 20] and Paul himself call and mean in other chapters, when they say: "This is my body, this is my blood. What can they complain about?

483 Now they must choose that here blood and body are tropus. For so their doctrine holds: since here the sacrament is spoken of, and in the sacrament sacramental or figurative words must be, as Oecolampad teaches, then they must also have such a consequence that bread is a figurative communion of bread, that is, it is a painted bread, or is, which cannot be, as is said. For the Oecolampad admits that "is" does not mean "signifies," therefore he must admit that bread is the figurative communion of bread, and cannot say that the broken bread is spiritual communion; for with him bodily thing cannot be nor be called a spiritual thing.

484 But if he would have the trope on the word "fellowship" alone, and have his text thus: The bread we break is a sign of the fellowship of the body of Christ, and could prove this, then he would have his opinion well; but then "body" would not be a trope. But if the body were not a trope here, it could not be a trope there either in Matthew, Mark and Luke: "This is my body", because it is the same supper and body that are spoken of. So, where the spirit

When he wants to go there, he bumps himself so that he staggers and has to fall. I give the advice that they speak: The outward word of God is of no use, and they have enough of the testimony of the spirit within, and St. Paul's word poor, wretched. Ten letters scold them, according to which "body and blood" would have to be tropus and not tropus, as they wanted; otherwise I don't know how they can escape from Paul here. But they would also have to think how the whole world would be bound to believe their testimony and spirit, then they would have won.

485 What is now said against Oecolampad's text is also said against Zwingel's text. For where Oecolampad makes signs, Zwingel makes interpretations, and is one opinion without other words. Oecolampad has figuram corporis, Zwingel significans corpus; that is One Thing. Therefore Zwingel's text would have to stand thus: The bread, so we break, is the fellowship of the significant body of Christ, that is, of the bread, the same as Oecolampad. But if he could put his text thus: The bread we break means the communion of the body of Christ, it would be for his opinion. But this does not suffer the text in Matthew, Mark, Luke, since he [Zwingli] says: This means my body. If he has an important body there, he must also have an important body here; for it is one body, as has been said. Now everything follows him to the significant body that follows Oecolampad to his signifying body, as everyone can well think and see for himself; therefore it is not necessary to recover everything again.

486) The 1) Silesian spirit with its reversal let also Herkommen, which thus reverses the text Matthäi, Marci and Lucä: My body is that, namely, a spiritual food. For "this" is supposed to point to the Spirit, so it must be so here, and this text "the cup of blessing we bless" 2c. is thus reversed: The fellowship of the body of Christ is the cup of blessing which we bless, namely, a spiritual cup of blessing. Now this fellowship is a spiritual thing, and yet here it must be and be called a bodily cup of wine; indeed, the bodily cup must be too-

The same is also a spiritual cup, that is, spiritual and not spiritual at the same time, bodily and not bodily; for Paul speaks of the bodily, but the Spirit makes the same spiritual and not bodily. Is it not great spirits? Let them drive away with their mad jiggery-pokery.

Our text and mind are fine and bright, light and light: "The bread we break is the fellowship of the body of Christ" 2c.

488 Here you must first notice that he says of the bodily bread which we break in the Lord's Supper, which no one can deny. Then it is also certain that in such bodily breaking or communion there must be not only holy and worthy men, but also unworthy men, as Judas and his kind. Thus you have heard that "is" cannot nor may mean "interprets" in some language on earth, but speaks of the essence where it stands. Finally, "community" here means the common good, of which many are partakers and enjoy, as that which is given among them all in common. This may be received in two ways, bodily and spiritual. For common thing means, that much is enjoyed in common, as, common well, common goods, common field, meadows, wood, fire 2c. For it cannot here in this place mean the communion of faith in the heart; for the text here speaks of such common goods as are to be received and enjoyed, as there is the bread and the cup. For he says, "The bread we break, the cup we bless," and then, "We are all one body, partakers of one bread and of one cup," 2c. [1 Cor. 10, 17.] It is therefore certain that κοινωνία, the fellowship of the body of Christ, is nothing else but the body of Christ, as a common good divided among many and given to be enjoyed.

489 Paul therefore says, "The bread which we break is the fellowship of the body of Christ," that is, whoever approves of this broken bread approves of the body of Christ, as a common good distributed among many; for the bread is such a common body of Christ, says Paul; this is said plainly and plainly, so that no one can understand it otherwise, except he make the words otherwise. Now enjoy of this broken bread, not only the worthy, but also Judas and the unworthy; for the breaking of bread is with the good and the evil. Now it is not possible for them to partake of it spiritually, for they have neither spirit nor faith; so also Christ has no more than One Body.

490 If then the unworthy are to partake of it and have it in common among themselves, it must be bodily and not spiritual, because there is no partaking, either bodily or spiritual. For the figurative, signifying, and signifying enjoyment cannot be in the Lord's Supper, because there is neither signification nor signification. Therefore the real true body of Christ must be bodily in the bread we break, so that those who are unworthy may enjoy it bodily, because they do not enjoy it spiritually, as Paul says: "The bread we break is communion," that is, the common body of Christ divided among those who receive the broken bread.

491 Against this, the swarming spirit fights over the little word "fellowship" and wants to make a spiritual fellowship, which is with the pious alone, which is to be signified by the breaking of bread, as by a figurative fellowship. So that Paul's text would have such a nose: "The bread we break is a sign of the fellowship of the body of Christ," in Oecolampian. Or thus: The bread we break signifies the fellowship of the body of Christ 2c. in Zwinglian. They prove this first of all for this reason: "It seems to us to be right; for their own conceit is the strongest reason they have in the whole matter, without baptizing and calling it Scripture and faith.

492 After this they use the saying that Paul uses after this text: "One bread it is, one body we many are, because we are partakers of one bread. Here some of them again make a new trope, that "bread" here is a spiritual bread, namely the body of Christ, and "one body" is also a trope, namely the saints alone, who are spiritually partakers of the spiritual bread, and fight against me thus: Because we are all one body of Christ, the unworthy must not be in this body, but only the right members; therefore this fellowship of the body must be spiritual 2c.

What shall I do with the erroneous spirits? Now they make figurative bread and fellowship. Again, the others make spiritual bread and fellowship, running against each other as if they were mad, and no one is sure of his course. We know that St. Paul does not say here, "We many are one body of Christ," but rather, "We many are one body," that is, one group, one community; just as every city is a separate body and body from another city. From this it does not follow that all the members of this body are holy, spiritual members, and therefore have spiritual fellowship alone; but it is a bodily company and body, in which are both holy and unholy, who are all partakers of the one bread.

494 So also bread here cannot be spiritual bread; for St. Paul speaks of the same bread, as he speaks before of: "The bread which we break. Such bread is one kind of bread, therefore it makes a peculiar heap and body of those who partake of it; not one 1) body of Christ, but badly one body. For there is a great difference between the body and Christ's body, and here "body" is a true trope according to the Scriptures; not a figurative body according to the backward trope, but another new body, to which a natural body is a likeness 2c. And such a tropum is enforced by the text, since it says: "We are One Body." Now we cannot be a natural body. So the fanciers should also make and prove their trope, and prove that Christ's body and blood are signs of the body and blood.

495 In sum, St. Paul speaks in this whole place of neither spiritual nor figurative, but only of bodily fellowship, or of a common bodily thing that is distributed. You will see this in all the sayings and examples he gives. First of all in this: "One bread it is, one body are we many, who are partakers of one bread" [1 Cor. 10:17]. So that here you must understand the fellowship in the flesh,

1) In the issues: one.

He says: it is one bread, namely, he speaks of it in the text, "the bread that we break", of which we are all partakers. Now the broken bread cannot be spiritual bread; so also its distribution, breaking or communion must not be spiritual.

496. the other saying, "Consider Israel according to the flesh; which eat the sacrifices, are they not in the fellowship of the altar?" [1 Cor. 10:18.]

497 There is no spiritual or figurative communion here; for "to eat of the sacrifice" is to enjoy the altar bodily, or to be partaker of the altar bodily. And the altar with its sacrifice is also a bodily thing, bodily common and divided among the sacrificers. So our bread is also a bodily communion, divided among us. But if the bread is bodily broken, distributed and received by us, the body of Christ is also bodily broken, distributed and received by us. For the broken bread is the common or divided body of Christ, as Paul says: "The bread that we break is the fellowship of the body of Christ" [1 Cor. 10:16].

498 Yes, they say, St. Paul speaks afterwards, v. 20, of the fellowship of devils: "I do not want you to have the fellowship of devils"; here must be spiritual fellowship, because the devils have no body; therefore the fellowship of the body of Christ may also be spiritual. Answer: Methinks the word "fellowship" deceives them, that they do not rightly understand it. And it is certainly true that it is not really German as I would like it to be. For to have fellowship is commonly understood to mean to have something to do with someone; but here it should mean as much as I have explained above, as when many need, enjoy, or are partakers of a common thing; such I must interpret fellowship, I have not been able to find a better word for it.

499 Well, if the devils have no body, yes, if this saying speaks of spiritual fellowship, how does it follow that one must also understand spiritual fellowship of the body of Christ above? Is it enough to say so? But Paul is speaking here of the bodily fellowship of the teu

This is proven by the words that follow before and after. So before he says, "What the heathen sacrifice, they sacrifice unto devils." Then 1) thou hearest that he speaketh of things sacrificed unto idols, and calleth it devil's sacrifice, and dealeth with the matter of eating things sacrificed unto idols. He who eats devil's sacrifice is in the fellowship of the devil. This is bodily communion; for a devil's sacrifice is a bodily sacrifice, which many enjoy and eat, and so they are bodily in the devil's bodily communion, that is, in the devil's sacrifice made to the devil. Just as we would like to say that both of us. Worthy and unworthy, are in the fellowship of God when we receive Christ's body bodily, for we enjoy and are partakers bodily of Christ's body, which is a sacrifice to God and offered to God.

The following words, v. 21, also force this: "You cannot drink the cup of the Lord and the cup of the devil at the same time. Do you see whereupon he says that he does not want us to be in the fellowship of the devil? namely, that we should not drink the devil's cup. Since "the devil's cup" is a bodily thing, "drinking the devil's cup" must be bodily fellowship with the devil; just as "drinking the Lord's cup" is bodily fellowship with the Lord or with God, that is, being partakers of the thing that is the Lord's or God's, or offered to God. Now the cup of the Lord is not only a cup, but also a communion of the blood of Christ, which we many enjoy.

He further says: "You cannot be partakers of the Lord's table and the devil's table at the same time. Is this not clear enough that the devil's table is a bodily thing? So the fellowship or partaking of it must also be bodily, just as the Lord's table must be bodily, and his fellowship must be bodily. For we must not be so coarse as to understand here in this place the fellowship of the devil to mean that one enjoys or is partaker of the devil himself, without an outward bodily thing, because here both the table and the cup are called the devil's; but that one is called the thing of the devil.

or thing that is of the devil or belongs to the devil. Just as one is called God's or the Lord's fellowship if one is partaker of the thing that is God's or the Lord's, or belongs to it, as the text clearly says here: "You cannot be partakers of the Lord's table and the devil's table at the same time, and I do not want you to be in the devil's fellowship.

502 It is a different speech, if I say: The community of the devil, and the community of the devil's table; but still the same opinion, as it is also of one thing. For the fellowship of the devil's table indicates the piece or thing in which such fellowship stands; but the fellowship of the devil indicates which that same thing or piece is, or to whom it belongs, since the fellowship stands within. So also fellowship of the Lord's table is a different speech than fellowship of the Lord. Fellowship of the Lord's table indicates the thing or piece in which the fellowship is; but fellowship of the Lord indicates who is the one in whom such fellowship is.

503 Just as Paul, in chapter 11, v. 26, uses the same two kinds of speech in the Lord's Supper, and sometimes says of eating bread: "As often as you eat this bread. Item [v. 28] "And so he eats of the bread," he says. Then [v. 27, "He who eats the Lord's bread" 2c. The first speech says what it is that one eats. The other, what it is, and to whom it belongs, that one eats. So in this speech "fellowship of the body of Christ" it is badly indicated what the thing is in which the fellowship stands, namely the body of Christ, and not what such a piece or thing is; for it is God's or the Lord's. Therefore, no spiritual fellowship can be understood here, because the broken bread is such fellowship of the body of Christ, and the body of Christ is the thing or piece in which such fellowship stands, which both. Worthy and unworthy may enjoy, because they enjoy the broken bread.

504 Even if one wanted to speak of spiritual communion, it would not be necessary to mention the two parts, the body and blood of Christ, but it would be enough to call them Christ, as Paul says in another place: that we are called to the fellowship of the Son of God. [Why should he speak so differently of the body and blood, and put two fellowships together, as two different fellowships, since none is the other? Since the spiritual fellowship is only one fellowship, and not two different fellowships. Thus the fellowship of the body of Christ is not the fellowship of the blood of Christ, nor again. For St. Paul here divides them from one another. Now it is impossible that in spiritual fellowship the body and blood of Christ should be distinct from one another, and make two distinct fellowships, as happens here. Therefore, here the communion of body and blood must be bodily and not spiritual.

505 Thus we have this strong text for us against the naked, miserable little bells of the enthusiasts, still firm and pure. Whether they do not accept or believe all these things, we have thereby shown causes and reasons enough why we are forced to keep our wits about us. For if I were a Turk, a Jew, or a Gentile, who did not believe in the Christian faith, and yet heard or read such writings about the sacrament, I would have to say: I do not believe in the Christian doctrine; but this I must say: If they want to be Christians and keep their doctrine, they must believe that Christ's body and blood are eaten and drunk bodily in bread and wine.

506 And the enthusiasts should know that, because they must confess that our understanding is simple according to the sound of words, and yet they do not have enough of it, nor do they want to be disputed with it, that we, in turn, have much less enough of their hungry, thirsty, naked glosses, which they bring up from their heads against the simple sound of words, nor do we want to be disputed with them. For if we are to cling to naked, bare words, we would rather cling to naked, bare text, which God Himself has spoken, than to naked, bare glosses, which men invent. And whether they run and call the same little bells Scripture and faith, it does not matter to us until they also prove that it is Scripture and faith, as they falsely say.

call it. For they should also take it for granted that we are of this world, and to come before the judgment seat of our as reluctant to teach wrong as they are. As we have so Lord Jesus Christ. And whether someone would say after far, praise God, proved more and more than they by our my death: Where Luther lived now, he would teach and deeds, that they must not ascribe such glory to them so hold this or this article differently, because he did not gloriously, as if they alone were so minded. But Christ will consider it enough 2c.:

be the judge of all who lie and deceive.

. I will boast in God that I have conquered so much in this by the grace of God I have most diligently considered all booklet that no trope can be in the Lord's Supper, but the these articles, have often traced them through the words are to be understood as they read, "this is my body, Scriptures and back again, and have wanted to defend this is my blood," that I truly know. For if they were tropus, them as surely as I have now defended the sacrament of they would have to be tropus in all places where the the altar. I am not drunk or thoughtless now, I know what Lord's Supper is spoken of. Now we have seen how the I am saying, I feel well what I am saying for the future of the revelers themselves teach and confess that they are not the Lord JESu Christ at the last judgment. Therefore let no tropus in the saying of Paul [1 Cor. 11:27], "He that eateth one make a joke or loose theiding 2) out of it, I am serious. and drinketh unworthily is guilty of the body and blood of For I know Satan by the grace of God to a great extent; if the Lord." So also not in this saying [Cap. 10, 16.], "The he can pervert and confuse God's word and scripture, cup of blessing which we bless is the communion of the what should he not do with my words or anyone else's?

508 The sixth chapter of John, because it speaks, First of all, I believe with all my heart the high article of nothing of the Lord's Supper, and is otherwise dealt with the Divine Majesty that Father, Son, Holy Spirit are three by others, such as Philipp Melanchthon and Johann distinct persons, One true, natural, truthful God, Creator Brenz and others more, I will now leave undone, although of heaven and earth, of all things, against the Arians, the Christian churches throughout the world. I have in mind to deal with the same with a sermon, and 1:1, as it has been held both in the Roman Church and in to add my own. 1)

Third.

509. Because I see that the longer I live, the more I err, Secondly, I believe and know that the Scripture teaches us that the Middle Person in God, namely the and that there is no end to Satan's raving and raging, lest Son, alone became truly man, conceived by the Holy Spirit without man's assistance, and born of the pure Holy in the future, during my life or after my death, some should Virgin Mary, as of a true natural mother; as all this is take advantage of me and falsely lead my writing to clearly described by St. Lucas [Cap. 1, 26.] and the strengthen their error, as the sacramental and baptismal prophets have proclaimed, thus that not the Father or Holy devotees have begun to do: then I will confess with this Spirit became man, as some heretics have taught. 3)

513. also that God the Son not only took the body, without the soul (as some heretics taught), but also the soul, that is, a whole complete humanity, and right seed or child, Abraham and David.

and that the natural Son of Mary be born, in all manner [if death and sin are our masters, and the devil our god and form, a true man, as I am, and as all others [Heb. 2:17, and prince, there can be no strength nor power, no wit nor 4:15], having come without sin, of virgins only, through the understanding, so that we might send or strive for Holy Spirit. righteousness and life; but must be blinded and captive, 514. and that such a man is truly God, as One eternal, of the devil and of sins, to do and think what pleases them inseparable Person from God and man, so that Mary, the and is contrary to God with His commandments. holy virgin, is a right true mother not only of the man 518 Therefore I also condemn both, new and old Christ, as the Nestorians teach, but of the Son of God, as Pelagians, who do not want original sin to be sin, but to Lucas [Cap. 1, 35] says: "That which is born in you shall be an infirmity or defect. 1) But because death passes be called the Son of God," that is, my and all Lord Jesus over all men, original sin must not be an infirmity, but a Christ, God's and Mary's only, true, natural Son, truly God sin too great, as St. Paul says: "The wages of sin is death" and man. [Rom. 6, 23]. And again: "Sin is the sting of death" sl. Cor.

515. I also believe that the Son of God and Mary, our 15, 56. 1) So also David says Psalm 51, 7: "Behold, I am Lord Jesus Christ, suffered, was crucified, died and was begotten of sinful seed, and my mother conceived me in buried for us poor sinners, so that he might redeem us sins"; 2) does not say: My mother conceived me with sins, from sin, death and the eternal wrath of God through his but "I, I, I am begotten of sinful seed", and my mother innocent blood, and that he rose from the dead on the third conceived me in sins, that is, I grew in my mother's womb day, and ascended into heaven, and sits at the right hand from sinful seed, as the Hebrew text is able to do. of God the Father Almighty, Lord over all lords, King over 519. Accordingly, I also reject and condemn, as vain all kings, and over all creatures in heaven, on earth, and devil's rottenness and error, all 3) orders, rules, under the earth, over death and life, over sin and monasteries, convents, and what is invented and righteousness. instituted by men above and apart from the Scriptures,

516. For I confess, and know to prove from the written with vows and duties, even though many great Scriptures, that all men are descended from one man saints lived in them, and as God's elect at this time were Adam, and from the same bring with them by birth and deceived by them, and yet were finally redeemed and inherit the fall, guilt and sin, which the same Adam escaped through faith in Jesus Christ. For since such committed in paradise through the wickedness of the orders, foundations and sects are lived and held in the devil, and thus together with him are all born in sins and opinion that one can be saved and saved through such die, and would have to be guilty of eternal death, if Jesus Christ had not come to our rescue and taken such guilt and sin upon himself as an innocent little lamb, paid for us by his suffering, and still stands and steps daily for us as a faithful, merciful mediator, savior, and priest and bishop of our souls.

517 I hereby reject and condemn as vain error all doctrines that praise our free will, as they strive against the help and grace of our Savior Jesus Christ. For since apart from Christ the

1) Zwingli also teaches this.

2) Thus the Wittenberg edition has quoted this saying according to the Bible, and in accordance with it is also the following execution. In the Erlangen and Jena: "Behold, I am conceived in sins, and my mother hath borne me in sins." Then in the Jena edition follows the text as we have given it here to the end of the paragraph, which does not fit the wording of the saying as it has it. Whereas in the Erlanger follows: "I, I, I was conceived in sins, and my mother bore me in sins, that is, that I grew in my mother's womb from sinful seed" 2c.

3) Erlanger: than all.

If any man, by his ways and works, would and might be saved, escape from sin and death, it is a public, abominable blasphemy and denial of the one help and grace of our one Saviour and Mediator JEsu Christ; "for there is no other name given unto us, whereby we must be saved, but this, which is called JEsus Christ" [Acts 4:12]. 4, 12.), and it is impossible that there should be more saviors, ways or means of salvation, without the one righteousness, which our Savior Jesus Christ is, and has given to us, and set before God for us, as our one mercy seat, Rom. 3, 25.

(520) It would be good if monasteries or convents were kept to teach young people the Word of God, the Scriptures, and Christian discipline, so that they could educate and prepare fine men to be bishops, pastors, and other servants of the churches, as well as competent scholars for secular government, and fine scholarly women, who could then keep Christian households and raise children. But to seek a way of salvation is a 1) Devil's doctrine and faith, 1 Tim. 4, 1. 2c.

521. But the holy orders and right orders instituted by God are these three: the priesthood, the married state, the secular authority. All those who are found in the priesthood or ministry of the Word are in a holy, right, good, pleasing to God order and state, as those who preach, administer the sacrament, preside over the common treasury, sextons and messengers or servants who serve such persons 2c. These are vain holy works before God.

522 Thus, he who is father and mother, who rules the house well, and breeds children 2) for God's service, is also holy and holy works and holy order. Likewise, where children or servants are obedient to their parents or masters, there is also a holy spirit, and whoever is found therein is a living saint on earth.

523 Thus also prince or overlord, judges, officials, chancellors, clerks, servants, maids, and all who serve such, to this all, who are submissively obedient, 3) everything is holy and holy life before God, because such three foundations or orders are set in God's word and commandment. But what is set in God's word must be a holy thing; for God's word is holy and sanctifies everything that is in it and in it.

524 Above these three foundations and orders is the common order of Christian love, in which one serves not only the three orders, but also in general every needy person with all kinds of good deeds, as feeding the hungry, watering the thirsty 2c., forgiving the enemies, praying for all people on earth, suffering all kinds of evil on earth 2c. Behold, these are all vain good holy works. Nevertheless, none of these orders is a way to salvation, but the only way above them all remains, namely, faith in Jesus Christ.

525 For there is much difference between being holy and being blessed. We are blessed through Christ alone; but both are holy, through such faith and also through such divine foundations and orders. Even the ungodly may have many holy things, but they are not blessed in them; for God wants such works from us for His praise and glory, and all those who are blessed in the faith of Christ do such works and keep such ordinances.

But what is said of the married state should also be understood of widowhood and virginity, for they belong to the house and to the household 2c. If these orders and divine foundations do not save, what should the devil's foundations and monasteries do, which only arise without God's word and strive and rage against the one way of faith?

Thirdly, I believe in the Holy Spirit, who is One true God with the Father and the Son, and comes from the Father and the Son eternally, yet in One divine essence and nature a distinct person. Through Him, as a living, eternal, divine gift, all believers are graced with faith and other spiritual gifts, raised from death, freed from sins, and made joyful and confident, free and secure.

in the conscience. For this is our defiance, when we feel such a testimony of the Spirit in our hearts that God wants to be our Father, forgive sin, and give eternal life.

These are the three persons, and One God, who has given himself completely to all of us, with everything that he is and has. The Father gives Himself to us with heaven and earth together with all creatures, so that they may serve (us¹)) and be useful. But such a gift became obscured and useless through Adam's fall. Therefore, the Son gave Himself to us as well, bestowing all His works, sufferings, wisdom and righteousness, and reconciling us to the Father, so that we might again know and have the Father with His gifts, alive and righteous.

Since such grace would be of no use to anyone if it were so secretly hidden and could not come to us, the Holy Spirit comes and gives Himself to us completely; He teaches us to recognize the benefits of Christ shown to us, helps us to receive and keep them, to use them usefully and to distribute them, to multiply and promote them. And does the same both inwardly and outwardly: inwardly through faith and other spiritual gifts; but outwardly through the gospel, through baptism and the sacrament of the altar, by which he comes to us, as through three means, in an unprofitable way, and exercises the suffering of Christ in us and brings it to the benefit of salvation.

530 Therefore I hold and know that as there is no more than One Gospel and One Christ, so there is no more than One Baptism; and that Baptism is in itself a divine ordinance, as His Gospel is also. And as the gospel is not therefore false or unjust, whether some use it falsely, or teach it, or believe it not; so neither is baptism false or unjust, whether some receive it, or give it, or otherwise abuse it, without faith. Therefore, I completely reject and condemn the doctrine of the Anabaptists and Donatists and whoever they are who baptize again.

531 In the same way I also speak and confess that

1) "us" is in the text in the Wittenberg, bracketed in the Jena, missing in the Erlanger.

Sacrament of the altar, that there the body and blood in the bread and wine be eaten and drunk orally, whether the priests who administer it or those who receive it do not believe or otherwise misuse it. For it is not based on man's faith or unbelief, but on God's word and order. Unless they first change God's word and order and interpret them differently, as the present enemies of the sacraments do, who, of course, have vain bread and wine; for they have not changed the words and established order of God, but have perverted and changed them according to their own conceit.

532 Therefore I believe that there is one holy Christian church on earth, that is, the congregation and number or assembly of all Christians in all the world, the one bride of Christ and his spiritual body, of which he is also the one head; and the bishops or pastors are not heads, nor lords, nor bridegrooms of the same, but servants, friends, and (as the word bishop indicates) overseers, keepers, or overseers.

533 And this same Christianity is not only under the Roman church, or Pabst, but in all the world, as the prophets proclaimed, that Christ's gospel should come into all the world, Ps. 2, 8. Ps. 19, 5. So that under Pabst, Turks, Persians, Tarians and everywhere the Christianity is scattered bodily, but gathered spiritually, in one gospel and faith, under one head, which is Jesus Christ. For the papacy is certainly the right end-Christian regime, or the right counter-Christian tyranny, which sits in the temple of God and rules with the commandment of men, as Matth. 24, 15. Christ, and 2 Thess. 2, 4. Paul proclaim. Although the Turk and all heresies, where they exist, also belong to this abomination, which is prophesied to stand in the holy place, it is not equal to the Pabstacy.

534 In this Christianity, and where it is, there is forgiveness of sins, that is, a kingdom of grace and of right indulgence. For there is the gospel, baptism, the sacrament of the altar, in which forgiveness of sins is offered, obtained and received, and there is also Christ and his Spirit and God. And apart from such Christianity there is neither salvation nor forgiveness of sins, but eternal death and damnation; though there be a great appearance of holiness, and much good works, yet all is lost. Such forgiveness of sins, however, is not to be expected at once, as in baptism (as the Novatians teach), but as often and often as one needs it, even unto death.

535 But the indulgence which the papal church has and gives is a blasphemous deception, not only because it invents and sets up a special one over the common pardon which is given in all Christendom by the gospel and sacrament, and thus defiles and destroys the common pardon; but also because it sets up and bases the pardon for sin on the work of men and the merit of the saints, when Christ alone can and has done enough for us.

536 For the dead, because the Scriptures do not report anything about it, I think that it is not a sin to ask this or the like out of free devotion: Dear God, if the soul is in such a state that it needs to be helped, then have mercy on it 2c. And when this has happened once or twice, let it be enough. For the vigils and masses for the soul and the annual celebrations are of no use, and are the devil's fair.

537 We also have nothing in Scripture about Purgatory, and it is certainly also brought up by the spirits of poltergeists; therefore I think that it is not necessary to believe one. Even though God can make all things possible, and even let the soul be tormented after parting from the body, He has not let it be said or written; therefore He does not want it to be believed. Otherwise, I know that you have a feg, but nothing of it is to be taught in the church, nor is it to be countered with pens or vigils.

Others have attacked the calling of the saints before me; and it pleases me, and I believe it, that Christ alone is to be called as our mediator; this is given in the Scriptures and is certain. Calling saints 1) is nothing in the Scriptures, therefore it must be uncertain and not to be believed.

539 I would let go of the obeisance if it was held according to the Gospel, Marc. 6, 15. and Jac. 5, 14.

1) In the Erlanger: to call.

is nothing. For just as one might preach a sermon on death and eternal life instead of vigils and masses, and thus pray at the funeral and consider our end (as it seems that the ancients did), so it would also be fine to go to the sick, pray and admonish, and if one wants to sprinkle him with oil, he should be free, in the name of God.

(540) Thus no sacrament may be made of marriage and the priesthood; otherwise they are holy orders enough in themselves. Penance is nothing else than the practice and power of baptism. That the two sacraments, baptism and the Lord's Supper, remain alongside the gospel, in which the Holy Spirit abundantly offers, gives, and exercises forgiveness of sins.

541) But for all the abominations 2) I consider the mass, which is preached and sold for a sacrifice or good work, on which all monasteries and convents now stand, but (if God wills) shall soon lie. For although I have been a great, grave, shameful sinner, and have also spent and lost my youth damnably, these are my greatest sins, that I have been such a holy monk, and with so many masses for over fifteen years have so grievously angered, tormented, and plagued my dear Lord. But praise and thanks be to his unspeakable grace for eternity that he has led me out of such abomination, and still daily sustains and strengthens me (though almost ungrateful) in right faith.

542 Therefore I have advised, and still advise, to leave the monasteries and convents, together with the vows, and to give oneself up to the proper Christian orders, so that one may escape such abominations of the masses and blasphemous holiness, as chastity, poverty, obedience, by which one intends to become blessed. For as fine as it was in the beginning of Christianity to keep the state of virginity, it is now abominable that one thereby denies Christ's help and grace; for one can indeed live a virgin, a widow, and a chaste life without such blasphemous abominations.

543. pictures, bells, chasuble, churches

2) Sense: But for the very greatest abomination of all re.

I keep the decoration, altar, light and the like free; whoever wants it, may leave it. Although images from the Scriptures and from good histories I keep almost useful, but free and arbitrary; because I do not keep it with the iconoclasts.

544 In the last place, I believe in the resurrection of all the dead at the last day, both of the righteous and the wicked, that each one may receive there in his body what he has deserved, so that the righteous may live forever with Christ, and the wicked may die forever with the devil and his angels. For I do not hold with those who teach that the devils also will finally come to salvation.

545. this is my faith; for thus believe all true Christians do, and this is what the Holy Scriptures teach us. But what I have said here too little, my little books will give me enough witnesses, especially those that have gone out in the last four or five years. I pray that all devout hearts will be witnesses to me, and pray for me that I may stand firm in such faith and resolve my end; for (since God is for) whether I would say something else out of temptation and mortal need, it shall be nothing, and I hereby want it publicly confessed that it is wrong and inspired by the devil. May my Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, who is eternal, help me to do this, amen.

22. Ulrich Zwingli's writing, set against Luther's sermon against the enthusiasts. *)

Completed March 30, 1527.

To the pious noble Wilhelm von Zell, his godfather, Huldreich Zwingli conveys grace and peace from God.

Dearest godfather, when you sent me Luther's sermon against the enthusiasts, I did not think it necessary to write to you what I thought of it, but I perceived what it would bring, and felt that many have fallen from his opinion through the (sermon), only because they say: Luther is no longer equal to himself. However, some of the weak and the first ones have come into disagreement because of it, which is why I have taken so much trouble that I have hurriedly put together this short responsibility, which I will send to you, because I am not writing anything in German now, but I am writing in Latin, to Luther. Serve God with all your heart, as you do, who may preserve your age, Amen. Given hastily at Zurich, on the eighth and twentieth day of March. 1527.

To all believers in Christ, Huldreich Zwingli offers grace and peace from God.

I do not doubt, Christian reader, that you will fall into some displeasure if you consider this denigration and rejection of mine, which is almost necessary about the excellent Martin Luther's sermon against the enthusiasts, done and written about the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ, because you worry that discord will arise among those who also stand by the Gospel; You may be sure that I do not deal with this in any way, but only see to it that we do not perish with ignorance or lack of understanding, nor that anyone holds himself so high in the church of Christ that no one may persuade him, if he speaks without the word of God, or if he does him violence with misunderstanding. For it should be proper for even the least, if God has given him understanding, to speak in the church, 1 Cor. 14.

*)This writing appeared in Zurich in 1527 (the letter to Wilhelm von Zell is dated March 28, 1527) under the title: "Verglimpfung und Ableinung über die Predigt des trefflichen Martini Luthers gegen die Schwärmer, zu Wittenberg gethan und beschrieben, zu Schirm des wesentlichen Leichnams und Bluts Christi im Sacrament. In good preservation of Huldreichen Zwingli hurriedly and briefly comprehended. Zürich 1527." Now, if I am the smallest, I want to indicate clearly, without all mischievousness and anger, that the Almighty God did not open the secrecy of his mind to Martino Luther in this doctrine of the Sacrament. Let no one take this for a scolding or an insult, if I say that it is not so. For in this way one must resist the untruth and bring it to light, no matter whom it may be. Martin Luther is as high in my bad judgment as some, nor is God higher; the word shall neither I nor another, for Martin's sake or another's, let it be misunderstood. Therefore, recently, dear reader, have stronger faith, neither let yourself be drawn into any weakening or division, although Peter and Paul, and again Paul and Barnabas, quarreled among themselves; see that your heart is right with God, and your life is shaped according to His will, then you will meet the right measure of a Christian man. For to believe that flesh and blood are eaten here does not make one blessed, for God has not promised it. "Whoever eats my flesh and drinks my blood," John 6, does not serve the bodily food of which those in the sacrament speak, but trusts in the Son of God, who gave his life for us in death, as all believers know well, to whom alone we are writing here, not to those who have not yet heard God's word. May God be with us that we do not teach anything that is not according to His will, nor accept anything that is contrary to the eternal truth, amen. I will also be more careful to be brief, so that those who are well-informed will have enough of little, and will be able to present what is necessary for this purpose.

First of all, I urge you, dear reader, to learn to read with judgment, and not to be so careless that, even though you have heard that Luther or Zwingli has written this, you leave yourself from that moment on to their words, regardless of the matter, but see whether they speak God's word and conform to the truth, or not. Questioning all men's doctrine by faith and by the written word. For some exalt faith, but teach contrary to the Scriptures, which are rightly understood according to faith. On the other hand, many are learned, but have not faith; neither do they belong to teach the Scriptures, for the Scriptures alone must be understood by faith, and faith alone must be proved to be righteous, with and in the Scriptures, which are rightly understood by faith. Equally as

If one wants to carry a load and lead it, if he takes the animal alone, without ropes and without cords, he cannot do it; on the other hand, if he takes the harness alone, without the animal, he also cannot do anything. In short, the animal and the harness must be led to the burden and girded together. So here the animal is the living faith; the rope and the ropes are the Scriptures. If I now want to teach what is not in God's word, or what is contrary to it, then I neither take nor move anything in the church; for it cannot be moved against God's word, or without it. But if I come with God's word alone, without faith and right understanding, I likewise receive nothing; for the church hears that I do not understand God's word, nor have faith. Example: Christ says Matth. 5, 25. 26.: "Unite yourself with your adversary, while you are on the way with him, so that he does not hand you over to the judge, and the judge to the weaver, and be thrown into prison. Verily I say unto thee, thou shalt not come out of this until thou hast paid the last oertle." This place was taken by the pope and interpreted without faith that it was a purgatory, from which no one would come until he had paid all debts. But faith says: If we had to pay for our sins ourselves, what would Christ have died for? how? that after Christ comes, we must first suffer purgatory, and before him there never was any? And so faith may not suffer purgatory. For so he finds that Christ in this place does not mean to speak of purgatory at all, but of the danger that often befalls one before the judge; that often one does not want to get along amicably with his adversary, and so he himself comes to be wronged; then he must pay all the debt without mercy. You see, one must have faith and the Scriptures together. This way from the Scriptures I teach not from myself, but from Christ JEsu, who saith Jn. 5:39: "Sin the Scriptures, in whom ye also think ye have eternal life; and they are they which make known of me." Behold, as Christ Himself let Himself in to the Jews into the bounds of the Scriptures, and will let Himself be protected and solicited by the Scriptures. So we also are to bring our doctrine from the Scriptures, and from the Scriptures rightly understood through faith; for Christ also proved his doctrine in every way by the Scriptures.

2 Luther says right after the beginning: "But whoever wants to go right and not to-

1) "vorzämen" will probably be as much as: together. 2) i.e. unobserved.

3) i. e. to get out of the way.

Beware of pointed thoughts", so you, dear brother, must not run straight ahead and blame us, Against whom Luther writes, so 1) we dealt with pointedness; but consider, first of all, how far it is fitting to be perceptive in contemplating God's Word, and to consider the words that forbid sharpening the mind, against those who call it pointed; as Paul says: "You shall not be wise among yourselves". And, "Ye shall know no more, neither need ye know"; and again, "Ye shall not be ignorant, but knowing and understanding what is the will of God." And Christ, Matt. 10, says, "Ye shall be wise as serpents, and simple as doves." Secondly, you shall then measure Luther's opinion of the Sacrament and ours against each other, which is pointed and which is not; for in this way you will find which reproach or revile the other. So we say that the words "this is my body which is given for you" cannot be understood without a tropum, that is, use. And therefore we indicate innumerable causes, the greater part of which will follow. Here we will now indicate the one that is taken in the words themselves, and is this: If the words were to be understood according to the simple form, then it would follow that we would have to eat the body of Christ visibly and sensibly; for he says: "Let it be the body that is given for us. Now there is no invisible, insensitive corpse given for us, but the visible and sensitive one, so we also have to eat it, because he says: "it is the one who is given for us". Furthermore, we also consult other scriptures together with faith (as will follow), so that we may obtain that these words are differently understood or used, that is, tropica. For this purpose, we present sufficient Scriptures that teach us to recognize the tropum and usage. If you want to find out by the word "is", 2) you have innumerable examples in the Bible, where "is" and all words of the essence are taken differently. In Gen. 41, 26: The seven fat cows are seven fruitful years; the seven empty ears are the seven years of hunger, in both places and still in many "is" is taken for "means". Christ says Matth. 11, 14: "He is Elias"; he means John; and John was not Elias, but he was like him. Gal. 4, 24: "These are the two testaments" for: they mean the two testaments. And the like innumerable. But if thou wilt call it by the word corpse-

- 1) "to suspect, so" - to have in suspicion, as if.
- 2) "aufthun" - to explain, to open up the opinion.

If you do this, you will have enough information, which we have amply shown in many books, especially against Strauss and Luther, and now finally in Latin. Here we want to show only the most distinguished ones; in Exodus 12:11 God speaks of the paschal lamb, or feast: "This is the transgression. Now the lamb may not be a leap over or a step over, but is only a memorial of the step over. So Christ used the same words in the 3) Abthun of the old memories and essays of the new ones, and also spoke thus: "The bread", or feast, "is my body", that is, means or reproduces my body, which is given for you; and referring to the Acts of the Apostles, Cap. 2, 42, where it says: "They strongly adhered to the apostles' teaching and to the church, and to the breaking of bread," which the apostles alone considered a sign used in the thanksgiving and renunciation of the church, and therefore called the breaking of bread alone. The same is noted in Paul, 1 Cor. 10, 16, where he calls it bread, and then in chapter 11, v. 23. 4) and in the last place he tells us with such brightness of mind that the Lord Christ Jesus, in the night when he was given up, took bread, and in the morning, when he was suffering a salvific death, instituted a memorial instead of the old memorial of passing over and carrying out, and said: Take, effet, the bread broken with one another, or the feast is a signification of my body, which is given to death for you 2c. So we also understand it of the drink, and recognize according to the words of Paul that it is nothing else, neither a proclamation, that is, thanksgiving to the Lord that his only Son suffered death for us. And the one who appears in thanksgiving 5) pretends to be one who trusts in the Lord Jesus Christ to be reconciled through his death. From this it follows that he follows Christ with his life, doing and suffering all things for God's sake and for the sake of others; and if he does not do this, he becomes guilty of the body of Christ and of his blood, not which he has eaten, but which he has testified to himself that they were given for him, and thus he escapes death and hell; and denies this with an unchristian life. Yes, this is according to the brevity of our simple mind; not

- 3) "im" put by us instead of "a" in the old edition.
- 4) was enough.
- 5) "who appears in thanksgiving" - who goes to the Lord's Supper.
- 6) These intercalations seem necessary to us in order to give meaning.

The Bible is not a book written by us, but drawn from the Scriptures and invented with the highest understanding of faith.

3 Luther again says that the words: "This is my corpse" 2c. must be taken simply, as they read, unused. And if we say [this], it must follow that bread, which must be signified by the little word "that," is the body of Christ; and then the pope would be right who says: The bread is substantially changed into the body of Christ. The bread would also have to be crucified for us if it were the body that was crucified for us. Luther answers that it is nothing less than bread, but that it is the body of Christ, as you, dear brethren, read in this booklet without any consideration. And even if we cry out, "Scripture, Scripture," Luther tells us that Paul called it bread, 1 Cor. 10 and 11. We know that, Lord God! We call it bread and consider it to be bread according to its substance, but no scripture comes forth to prove that it is bread and flesh together. Christ, indicating the bread, even offering it with his hand, says, "This is my body." And now nowhere is it mentioned, neither by apostles, evangelists, nor any scholars who have ever been, that he ever said: "This is bread, and is my flesh with one another. So far is it from Luther's mind that this opinion should be maintained with God's word, that there is also no human word that imposes such a meaning on God's word. But this is how he wants to embellish it with such a speech: 1) "The words are clear. Who would not know what I said if I offered a simml 2) and said: Take and eat, this is a simml"? Thus Luther speaks. But see, dear Christian, how an impossible example this is. If a man brings me a seed, and says, Eat, this is a seed; how can I not understand that it is a seed? if he says that it is just what it is, and that I know that it is. But here it is not so; we take bread and say that it is the bodily corpse of Christ; as if one said, Take away, the simmlen is a cabbage head. 3) But even if Luther had not failed to make a comparison in the example, it is still of no use to deal with such paintings. Examples of previous education teach well, but they do not prove. But here no thing is valid, because it is essentially based on God's word. Soon Luther says, bread remains bread, and in the bread one eats the body of Christ. Behold, this is now another; first he said: the bread is bread and the body of Christ with each other; now he says: he is in the bread, these are two different speeches, and all without God's word, in addition he lets the words remain simple in either 4) speech. For thus speak: The bread is bread and the corpse of Christ, gives the words a different sense, as they, simply presented, can bear, so also: in the bread is the corpse of Christ, but gives a different sense. For "this is my body" ever carries the sense that the bread is the body of Christ; but then it cannot be bread in addition; and if the pope were right, it is not, for we see and feel that it is bread and not flesh. It also has the speech: This is bread, and is in addition my corpse, has no umbrella at all, neither in God's word, nor in philosophy, for it may not be two substances One thing. But the other speech: In the bread 2c., would like to be glossed by the synecdocham; but then it is a trope, that is, usage, and the words do not remain in their simple sense, as but Luther argues. Now, if he interprets it with the tropo, and falsifies it before the simple reader, he does not want to suffer the tropum, use, at all; item, if he also says without God's word: it is bread and flesh, since we feel the bread well, but no one is aware of the flesh, which is also contrary to all understanding; item, if Christ says: it is the corpse, which is given for us, but which is given for us visibly, sensitively, sufferingly: so now behold, those who deal in subtlety, 5) we who say, that it is only a sign of the body of Christ carried about and eaten in the meal of thanksgiving, and all this with Scripture; or Luther, who wants to eat the bodily body there, but cannot eat it, for he would have to eat it as it is dead. Therefore, dear reader, you see that you read with little judgment if you allow yourself to doubt Luther's sermon. But it happens to you because you want to be so wise and well-instructed, and you do not yet know what doctrine is. I speak only to some simple-minded people, for I am well aware that this sermon has set them on the right track; thus it is without any reason, and cries out very loudly, but no one hears it, for it is not God's voice. See also in this, which is panned, speak of the corpse of Christ, of which all who have ever spoken of it have only 1) I have God's word? but one must understand God's word spoken and not understood nor believed; or have versed rightly, and therefore rely on the right understanding of the truth 2) and proved the words with Scripture, that they God's word. But if the pope did not do this, he fell into the have the meaning. Luther must still have this against us pit and took with him everything that God, with His grace, before that we do not want to reproach and disgrace him did not remove from the pit 7). So it must also happen to before the simple as he does us. But in Latin I have him here, or else we miss.

addressed him more freely, yet without scolding.

(4) According to this he says: we have gone astray laid before you. Our faith, which we have in God through because we have followed our thoughts. Where, then, and in Christ Jesus, makes us whole. This is true; would this chip 3) have come on the track before 4) we however, it does not come from the fact that faith can were born? for there have never been any thoughts that actually do this, since it originated from us; rather, the one are not challenged with it, as Luther also confesses about who believes was chosen and drawn by God before and himself.

(5) And teaches how one must cleave to the words to God; for thus God made the covenant with all the elect, with faith alone. In this, however, the simple-minded are that they should worship him alone, adore him alone (as struck over the eye, because you think that this word, "to one God), adhere to him alone; as also the Lord Christ believe in the words with faith," is spoken in common of Jesus, Matth. 4, [10.] poked the devil in the nose. But now the faith that we have in and on God's word; but Luther the covenant may not be changed (we are not speaking verbally refers to faith, that flesh and blood are eaten here of the outward ceremonies, but only of the inward here. Therefore, notice that it is indeed right to teach that ground of faith; for the ceremonies must have 8) been one should believe all the words of God without any changed), so it follows that also trusting in the Lord Christ hindrance; 5) but in doing so, one must also understand Jesus is based on his divinity alone; therefore that he is the word of God correctly before one places faith in it, or the true God, as he himself clearly states John 12: "He we would deceive ourselves if we did not understand it that trusteth in me, trusteth not in me, but in him that sent and thought to preserve our misunderstanding by crying me." Behold, as he saith, trust not in him, understand, as out that one should believe God's word. For example, the he is man, but in him that sent him, with whom he is One pope based his actions on God's word in all ways, but not God; so it follows that we put our faith in Christ Jesus on the rightly understood word, namely: "And on the rock alone, because he is true God. What then is mankind? A I will build my church. But he misunderstood it, and said certain pledge of grace; for which is given in death, that that the church was built on Peter, and extended 6) the the divine justice might be heard, 9) and be reconciled to word "rock" to Peter, and therefore, according to Peter, us, that we might run in trust to the grace and mercy of he was also the rock on which the church stood. And God, through the precious pledge of His own Son, whom Christ applies the word "rock" to himself, in the sense: He has given to us. For what can he refuse us, if he has "Upon the rock, which you have sewn, and of which I given his own Son for us, Romans 8, of which enough have given you the name Rucker, because you have has been said elsewhere and thoroughly? Now if those recognized it, together with the others (for he speaks in who want to eat the body of Christ in the flesh draw faith all their names, as is also found in John 6), yes, upon the to the conclusion that we should believe that we are rock, which I am, I will build my church. See now, dear eating flesh and blood, or else we would not be saved, brother, that it is not enough to cry out: they teach very harmfully. For our faith is thoroughly in the Godhead alone, and the true Son of God, Jesus Christ, has never pretended that anything is given to us through bodily eating. For, as it is said before, [in that] which Joh. 6. stands of his flesh eating and blood drinking, eating is to be taken for trusting. When then the disciples immediately in the same place pass away, we know and trust that thou art the Son of the living God. See how they speak and rejoice in the Godhead, but do not speak: We believe that your flesh and blood, eaten, forgive sin 2c. Now therefore take heed lest these men deceive us with the courtship, or the circumlocution, 1) which they have need of for and for. [They speak of the faith and do it justice, but they will then speak and lead it secretly, that one should understand by faith, believing that flesh and blood are eaten here; and they do this almost unjustly. God enlighten them and forgive them, for they teach this without the reason of God's word and faith.

7 Third, notice that there is a great difference between the words that promise and those that do not. For those who promise are undoubted by the believer that what they promise will come to pass; but those who do not promise, but tell or teach, they do and do not come to pass. For example, Christ's promise that if we give no more than a drink of water to one in his name, he will repay us, is quite undoubted by believers, and will certainly come to pass; but that he says, Whatever you want men to do to you, do to them; or, If you are smitten on one cheek, offer the other also; is an undoubted word of God, which we believe. But how? Do we also believe that all who believe him do so? No; for we have many who believe, but do not offer their cheeks. But this we believe, that it is godly and right to do unto our neighbor as we would be done unto us, and to overcome the enemy with virtue and goodness. Therefore, note that we trust in the words that promise something (if we are believers). But the words that teach or are called we believe; and so there is a difference between trusting in God's word, and believing God's word; for God's words are also distinguished. And does "trust in GOD's word" serve the word that promises something; and "believe GOD's word" serves on the words that mean or forbid something, ver-mean nothing. And the difference is also in faith; for he who relies on God's word must first believe that it is God's word, so that he is only certain that he will receive what God, in whom he trusts, has promised him. So now take the words: "This is my body" 2c. and the: "You will conceive in your womb and give birth to a son," against each other, and you will see how Luther deceives himself. We are to believe the words: "This is my body". How? That they were spoken by Christ, and in remembrance of his death. But shall we also trust in them? No, because nothing is promised to us with them; therefore we cannot rightly and actually say 2) German of them that one should trust in them or rely on them. For if we should speak according to Luther's saw: we should rely on the fact that with the eating of the corpse, bodily, sin will be forgiven us, then we have no promise about it; but if we should rely on the fact that, where we speak the words, the bodily corpse of Christ will be there from the hour (as Luther says), then we have no promise about it. For the word, "Do this in remembrance of me," is not a promise. On the other hand, Christ did not call his body to be eaten in remembrance of his body, but he calls the words praise and thanksgiving to be done in remembrance that he gave his body to death for us. This is not what I say, but what Paul says in 1 Cor. 11, when he interprets these words, "Do this in remembrance of me: As often as you eat the bread and drink the drink, you should proclaim the death of the Lord," that is, praise and glorify God. But that Mary was told: "You will receive" 2c., is a word of promise, because after that she was also promised the way and measure, as it would go: "The Holy Spirit will come down into you from above" 2c. This does not happen here at all, because it is not spoken 4): So it shall come to pass, when you speak the words, that the body of Christ shall be there, or the like. And therefore Luther gives us one thing above reproach, when he speaks of these words in the same way, as if they were words of promise, and places them next to the word of promise, since the birth of the Son of God is promised to Mary the Virgin, and says: "Let thyself trust in it"; which "let thyself trust in it" does not serve for the simple telling and command, but is enough for the simple telling or command in faith, since we believe that he is the Son of God.

2) "actually" put by us instead of: "actually".

3) "his" put by us instead of: one.

4) i. e. nowhere.

1) "Balz" will probably be the same as "Falz", "Umlitz" the folded over, so that the sense will be: by crooked ways and twists.

He has thus instituted his memorial, and we should do that he, having eaten, also accepts the sin; or do you want the same to him. But that his bodily body is given to us to hold to the truth, so that you believe that he has for the washing away of sin, we are not to believe that at instituted a memorial and thanksgiving of his death? then all, because we have a word of promise about it, or else we are one; for we also believe the same understandably. we are not Christians, but Luthrists. This is indeed a Remain now with it, God has well for good, you must not promise that his death will take away our sin, John 1, 3 believe further in this word, because God gives there no and 12. But to eat his body bodily has as little promise as more to believe; but if you continue, then you want to know it is promised to me that I will become emperor. If any one more, neither is necessary. But that thou shouldst then desires to see more of this reason, let him read what I draw the words, that they should be words of promise, is have written against the ostrich. 1) Behold then, how well violence: for he hath nowhere promised that we should eat it is, when we thus cry, Let words bring thee not, let not his flesh, nor that sin should be forgiven thereby, nor that words bring thee; and yet secretly is the opinion, Let faith should be strengthened, nor that the gospel should words that are not understood, which have no promise. be substantially brought with it, as this preaching Do not let the words you do not yet understand bring you. signifieth.

Sam 2) One would say: Do not let the mind tell you, rely only on the words, God give how they stand against other words, do not inquire into the meaning.

8) And therefore, when Luther says: 3) "He who draws faith from the words believes that God gives, Christ creeps into the bread or cup, or whatever he wants. When I have the words, I will see no further nor think" 2c., do you first see that he turns it around? One does not learn faith from the words, but God teaches it to us, 4) and then we see faith also in the words, that is, if we believe, we also find the word for it. Example: I find in the Turk Alkoran well the knowledge of their faith, I give him however therefore no faith; because it is larger fool way never of a faith invented, neither they have. So there are many who hear what the faith is, they also know the pieces of the faith, but they do not believe because of it; for no one believes, neither whom the Father has drawn. Therefore you see how all his words are to the effect that he does not want to let them be seen for what they are, nor does he want to set them against other Scriptures. Yes, he wants to keep his words and not ask any further questions. So tell me, dear Luther, What will you do? Eat the body of Christ in the flesh for the forgiveness of sins? Then you are wrong, for he was not given to eat for the remission of sins, but he was given in death for sins. So your cry is no more than a cry, until you bring forth an open declaration in which we see, Accordingly, Luther speaks of us enthusiasts: 6) "Now they have two things in particular which they bring up against us. First, they say that it is not fitting that Christ should be body and blood in bread and wine. Secondly, eat not of necessity." Behold, devout reader, how we poor enthusiasts are so badly supplied with intercession 7). First of all, he says that we say it is not fitting; as if we tempered "not fitting" according to human reason, that it is not fitting according to it; for that is where his images reach, which he then gives, that he would like to persuade us, Lord God, with images that are quite childish, and that do not rhyme with what will come afterward. But we give nothing for the likenesses, except on the basis of the Scriptures beforehand; then we let the likeness serve as an explanation, and no further. Therefore, notice, dear reader, our opinion, when we say, "it is not fitting," we are not speaking at all to carnal reason, but to the absurditatem, that is. 8) of faith and Scripture. In the first, Christ says, "He that trusteth in me hath everlasting life." If eternal life comes because we trust in Jesus Christ, the Son of God, then the eating of flesh goes away. 9) But Christ says, John 6: "He that cometh to me" (here "cometh to him" is also taken for "trusting in him," as it is also learned there), "shall not hunger; and he that trusteth in me, the same shall not hunger."

will never thirst." In short, faith or anointing feels in itself that God secures us with His Spirit within, and that all the outward things that come into us from without may do nothing to make us right. Therefore, God promises through the prophet Jeremiah on the 31st that He will write His law in our hearts; and Paul calls all the things that are done to us from without 1) the justification of the flesh, and also says that these things were only granted for a time, and are terminated by Christ, Heb. 9. 9) Also the description of faith, Heb. 11, against the bodily eating of the body of Christ, of which it is not now proper to say, since some think they want to put it on their part, 2) but in vain. 3) In short, the firm, righteous, sincere faith trusts in Christ's divinity, and recognizes his death to be our life; but he knows nothing of the bodily meal, for it is of no use to him, since God has not promised anything to the bodily meal, nor has he instituted it. On the other hand, it is not appropriate because of faith, for the articles of faith are: "He ascended to heaven, sits at the right hand of God the Father Almighty; then he is to be judged in the future" 2c. We believe that he ascended bodily, so he cannot be here; because his body is not more than in one place, even after the primal state 4). This is indicated first of all by all his appearances, with which he appeared to his own after the original state, none of which happened in such a way that he was once 5) in two places, let alone in many. Also in this way we have a bright word of the angel, Marc. 16. who thus speaks: "He is risen and is not here." If he was not there, then his body is not everywhere, but Luther wants to say that Paul's word Eph. 4: "Christ ascended above all heavens to fill all things" means that Christ's body fills all things, just as grain fills a sack. Now Paul does not want to say of such filling, but of the filling of the Christ, that he ascended into heaven, because he fulfilled all things that were spoken of him beforehand through the prophets; for Paul there draws forth information from the 67th [68th] Psalm, of which I have written enough to Luther in Latin. Much more information will come afterwards in the clumsy 6) Scriptures, which, however, also serve here.

16 And now therefore take heed to the awkwardness of the Scripture. The scripture may not suffer us to eat Christ's flesh or body bodily. As he says in John 6, "The flesh is of no use at all" (understand, to eat, as Luther himself also recognized in the sermon on the Gospel of John 6, although he now says something else), it also follows that he did not give us this to eat, for he says just before it, "The Spirit who makes alive. And Christ himself contrasts it, saying, "It must be spirit," not flesh, "that quickeneth the soul:" so ever the flesh is of no use, understand all, to eat. Jn. 16, Christ says: "I came forth from the Father, and am come into the world; again I leave the world, and go unto the Father." Now he may not ever leave the world according to the Godhead, for according to it he is by nature everywhere, pervading "all things: wherefore he must ever have left the world according to mankind. For that the opposing party says that he is invisible in the sacrament is true; yes, just as he is invisible in the lintmag, 7) or in the hearts of the faithful, but not bodily there; for if he himself were bodily in the sacrament, he would have to be there, as he hung on the cross, that is, visible, sensitive, painful. But that Luther fights a lot, as it is well possible for God to do, he does against himself; for in the book against the King of England he states quite theorously, 8) that it is not proper to conclude from God's ability to be. It does not follow that God is able, so it is. It does not follow that God may make harrows 9) into a snow goose, so he is.

11 John 16: "It is good for you that I go, for where I do not go, the Comforter will not come. If it is good for us that he should go, why do we say that he is here? Yes, if we say that he is here invisibly, we are always inferring the divinity, but by no means the humanity; for there is no evidence from the Scriptures, and even here it is heard that he has gone. He does not say, "I will be with you invisibly," which would have been a proper response to their mourning, which they had received from his absence, but he persists in his going. Now "to be here invisibly" would not suffer the word "to give up," nor the word "I leave the world," [least of all] which is John 17: "Henceforth I shall not be in the world, but they shall be in it." Behold, as they stand together, evil will he not alone after mankind.

be in the world; for the disciples, even we, are, bodily in the world, so he will not be in the world; for he sets them over against each other, his being in the world, and ours being in the world. There: "when I was with them" 2c. Behold, all this must be understood of his humanity alone, and may not be accounted for by invisible being here; for he saith, "I will not henceforth be in the world." Much more writings are, so may not suffer that the words of Christ: "This is my body", are understood unused 1), which I have indicated in Latin to Luther, as well as everything more abundantly. This is the clumsy one of which we say. For otherwise we know well, that the well, which is called or promised by God, and we understand it rightly. No one has any doubt about the virginity and birth of Mary, for this is promised and foretold with bright words, but here there is none.

All of Luther's parables may, as has been reported, prove nothing; for they have no "back in God's word," nor are they unskillful to the all, not befitting his presumption. How the soul is after the whole body, taken from the [Tractat] de anima Aristotelis, does not befit. But if Luther could give an example of a corpse being in all souls or ends, that would be appropriate. Our question is not whether the divinity of Christ, or the fruitfulness of his suffering around and around, serves as an example of the soul, but whether his corpse is everywhere. So all examples are sufficient to show that Christ is in the hearts of all men, essentially according to the divinity, and also bodily according to the respect and memory; but essentially, bodily does not indicate a likeness, nor would it help if a likeness were equally well suited. That it is formed by the word is brought out in Strausen's answer. In short, it must not be Zürlemürlens: 2) "As it is with God in heaven, so he gives it into our heart; so the truly preaching mouth speaks, and does not the spoken word bring the thing with it, of which it speaks?" Or else, if we said, as the river of sin has passed over the world, we would drown the world, or as Sodoma is burned, we would burn the world, and thus be counted cheap for witches. That Luther writes on the measure, sam des Engels Wort die gegenwärtige Empfängniß Marien ein gebracht hat, ist gar eine ungeschickte Rede, und Gottes Worte who says: "Let the Holy Spirit come down from above and overshadow the power of the Most High" 2c. Now the angel's word did not do this; for what else can the angel speak, neither that is called God? but God's power. 3) We would have liked to bring words that had also done something, so that we might prove that here the words, believed and spoken alone, would make the body of Christ present; but there is no reason for this.

Luther says: 4) "If we speak the words about the bread, then he is truly there. Oh, that God would have mercy on you, Luther, that you ever spoke the word, for it is an entirely papal word. Show scripture therefore.

14) "These words are given to us," Luther continues, "so that we know where to find him, namely in bread. Is false. For he has shown himself to us bodily at the right hand of the Father, there he will lie 6) until the last judgment, Matth. 26. But with grace he has shown himself in your closet, now go in and worship him in spirit and truth, you will surely find him. Further, he has shown himself: "what we shall desire in his name," though he has ascended to heaven, "he will give us"; so he is ever everywhere, and never comes from us, for he says: "I will be with you to the end of the world," must be understood of divinity and grace alone.

Since you, dear Luther, say that "the devil has possessed us; we have read that Christ is dead for us, 7) but we do not feel this in our hearts," we say nothing more evil than that: Why do you judge another man's own man? Rom. 14. If we tell you the sum of how we believe and what we teach, you either say, "We learned it from you; and yet if it is a miracle, we learned it from you, that you do not want to recognize your own teaching; or you say, "We did not believe anything that we understand. How then shall we do to him? Nothing else, but bear it cheerfully, and commend it to the right judge.

*The complete title of this writing, which is directed against Luther's "That these words of Christ: this is my body etc., still stand firm against the swarming spirits", is as follows: "That these words, this is my body, which is given for you, will eternally have the old unified meaning, and M. Luther with his last book has not at all proven his and Pabst's meaning. Huldreich Zwingli christliche Antwort, Zürich 1527." This writing, like the previous one, has been translated into Latin by Rudolph Gualther and given to the op "r. 2uinM, lom. II, p. 374 inserted. The date of the letter to Duke John of Saxony, June 20, 1527, will probably indicate the day on which Zwingli began this "reply." We give the text according to Walch's old edition.

The same is true for the other parts of the country. If, however, the matter requires in part that it be unconcealed even to the princes, and if, on the other hand, they are found to have such Christian and friendly hearts and opinions that they do not take offense at anything, we wicked ones are ever compelled and comforted to present our concern in writing. Now if Doctor Martinus Luther, in the business of Christ's supper, not only hammers over the cord of the Christian spirit and love, but also tries to penetrate and see the Scriptures with the splendor of his name in an improper sense, this should not be concealed by the smallest one who sits in the congregation, if he understands it, but should be contradicted; regardless of how great the name is that is contradicted: how much more shall it not be unheard by the nobles of this world, whether they be put to the sword of vengeance, or to the sword of the word of God? But if here, too, there is an artifice that would soon make the teachers' tyranny and violence no less strong than the papacy has been, which is an artifice, 2) the doctrine, against which we cannot, with God's word, cry out so cruelly: it is heretical, raving, superstition, seditious, red spiritualist, and the like; so that the ordinary powers are introduced to forbid it unheard and unjustified: It is all the more necessary, then, to stand up against such authorities and to prevent special scholars from taking the judgment of the Christian people and making it their own; from this it would follow that they would keep God's word in prison according to their misguided understanding, no less than the popes did before; as Luther does publicly in this book. Against all truth, he wants to force the word of Christ: "The flesh is of no use at all" into the mind: carnal mind is of no use; and to this end he falsifies the word, uses the Greek articulum dennen, 3) is "that," in which the sense takes much light. Therefore, may your grace read and judge this answer of mine, which is not mine but God's (for it is taken from His one word), for God's sake, in which Christian truth and modesty stand, and as far as the Almighty (as I do not doubt that He will graciously guide you from now on, as before) will give you the truth.

4) and follow them gladly, and in the meantime do not be displeased with the quarrelling, since it has come to a quarrel; but be on both sides of it that one fights with the friendly, peaceful word of God, not with such improper scolding. For if Luther supposes that the church is not injured by his lewd words, and supposes that he has delivered the gospel to it again, he must ever be sure of himself that he has drawn a church that has been used to such scolding; 5) which, after all, is not at all befitting a Christian people, among whom all things are to be done with discipline and the fear of God. Truly it is not that we have such a pale rind that we cannot suffer such evil 6) but that it is ever unseemly to educate even the most wicked tongues rather than brave hearts. It is also more formal with those who are of Luther's opinion, and more skillful to find the truth, to seek and judge without anger, neither with such nonsense. Although the good comes from the angry speech, that all enemies of the Gospel, especially the popes, now see that there is no conspiracy between today's preachers, no cakes, 7) or superior, but free teaching. May the Almighty guide and protect your grace together with all its territory with all believers in Christ in the right knowledge of the truth! Amen. Given in Zurich on the 20th day of June 1527.

Martino Luther's wishes for Huldreich Zwingli

Grace and peace from God through Jesus Christ, the living Son of God, who for our salvation suffered death, and therefore left the world in the flesh and ascended to heaven, where he sits until he comes again on the last day according to his own word, so that you may know that he dwells in our hearts through faith, Eph. 3, not through the fleshly eating of the mouth, as you want to teach without God's word. This we wish you from the bottom of our hearts, dear Luther, for many reasons. In which we hope to be raised much more Christian, neither if one raises it with the devil, 8) than you have raised this great book.

8) By this Zwingli means Luther's writing "that these words of Christ: this is my body, still stand firm" 2c. lived. God has arranged that both of our writings have gone out at one time: ours in Latin, in which we have done everything that you complain about being unaccountable until now; but in a foreign language, so that you would not complain that I had been thirsty to 1) make you look bad in front of all the German country; but yours in German, so that it would not do harm in foreign lands; but, since Germany has the best possible account of God's word in the church, the effortful battle would be waged in the language, which might be stained with it in the least. The gracious Father takes such good care of us, that he can order the things that we think are clumsy (when I also thought that you should have done this battle in Latin, so that all things might first be well considered among the scholars before they are poured out among the people): yes, he can order things well. Now that everything you write here in German is sufficiently explained in our Latin, but only the Latins read it, I am also compelled to bring in German what serves the matter, so that both opinions may come before the church, and the truth may increase. In which of our opposition you shall have the advantage, that we do not want to insult you at all with such intemperate words, as you are accusing us of; but do not reckon us here under malicious words, when we will say: Here you pervert our words, here you reproach us without need, here you make gifts according to your own will, here you lie to us, here you falsify the Scriptures, here you do not understand them, here you are against yourself, and the like, for we want to explain all these things clearly. And yet we are still so rich in words that we have enough of the litter, nor (praise be to God) are we so angry that we cannot beware of them. But since you so strongly expose the untruth with such impudent, immodest words, they must also be forcefully drawn out according to the word of Paul, and point with the finger where the prest 3) lies; also put something before your eyes, so that you also learn to recognize yourself from your own words, for we truly, truly see that those falsely boast of the spirit, who write so very carnally, and speak with such great diligence, to injure the neighbor and to go out. 4) Be patient also, that we may answer thee according to the length of all thy writing, which thou wilt not, as at the end of thy Book stands. Let us not forget the two points: "He sitteth on the right hand"; and, "the flesh is of no use at all." But, if we come to them, we will establish them abundantly on the basis of the Scriptures, for ever this is not to be suffered, that you, in order to redeem the matter, make us out to be such shameful lying people, that, if it were so in truth, not only our writings, but also our names, should be accepted and interpreted by all men. But the matter will be different (with God), neither you will muck it up. Here, God's word will prevail; not gushers, devils, mischiefmongers, heretics, murderers, rebels, gilders, or hypocrites; defiance, botz, blotz, Blitz, Donder, Po, pu, pa, plump, and the like. Dishonor, dirty words, and dirty tricks. Therefore, dear Luther, notice how we want to keep order. Go from one point to the other in general, and resolve it in short or long, according to the requirements of the matter, and if it comes to the two points mentioned, indicate and fix them clearly, as has been said. But that we do not follow thee, since thou dost urge us to let all the rest of thy speech fall, and to the two points alone: "He is seated at the right hand" and "Flesh is not useful," so that we do not go astray, happens for the following reasons: First, since you obscure the truth with so much useless talk, and then think that we should overlook it, we cannot honor you, for we would dishonor the truth, or else my service, they say. On the other hand, you would have your reasons of the two points: "He is seated at the right hand," and "the flesh is of no use at all," you would have brought them to two sheets, and made nine and a half of them: what is the rest, then, that is not necessary, which you also allow us to leave unaccounted for? Is it in your opinion? why; do you then permit us not to answer about it? since you so often cry murder, that one has not answered, which you wrote against Carlstadt, how would [you] only do so here? But if it does not fit your opinion, why did you put the useless many? Therefore, we will do enough for you, and not give you cause for further unrest, we will leave nothing unaccounted for, even though we would like to advise the work to be good, and lend it to more useful things, so that you cannot "say" that we have not accounted for this or that. Thirdly, it was also right and proper among the Athenians, as Demosthenes indicates per Ctesipüonte, that the answering party should not be imprisoned 5), that he only had to answer as his adversary wished. How much Less should you dictate to us that we do not answer for the things that you have sown in the hearts of men with such impious words? But we will gladly do so, in God's name, and consume the words more with the seriousness of the matter, neither with long prefaces. You, devout reader, do not judge out of temptation or lack of understanding, but see what befits the true divinity and humanity of Christ, which are both real and natural in him, not from my but from his own words. May the Almighty of His grace give light to this, 1) so that no one may err, but may look upon the bright truth unblinkingly 2). Amen!

(1) Now that you, dear Luther, have told how the devil ran away the bridge, that is, the Scriptures, from the first Christians, you should have weighed yourself against us from the beginning; then you would have seen that it is our only work to stick to the Scriptures that are well and rightly understood; and herewith you would have found yourself wanting to force us away from the Scriptures in this matter and give us your word for it. As thou teachest now in the book only new error: the body of Christ eaten, even with the mouth, put away sin, establish faith, fill all things, and also be present in all things, even as well as the Godhead; preserve the body of man unto the primal state, 3) and such like things as shall come after; which thou teachest all the word of God; but wilt in short that men should believe thee, if therefore thou hast not the word of God, but it disputes against it: then see thou now, wedre 4) Part of the other want to run off the Scripture. But I hope that there are now so many 5) richer in the church in all speeches and understanding, that they may well know, not the speech of the puffed up, but the power, 1 Cor. 4.

(2) But that thou showest how the statutes of men are brought in by the concilia, is found to be really against thee, neither against us. For you make laws how the Scriptures are to be understood, which you do not like to shield in your way; as where "flesh" stands without "my" consent, it is called carnal wickedness, 2c. as will come afterward. Thus thou art more like unto them that bring in human statutes, neither we; for thou givest statutes which God's word doth not signify, neither doth he suffer.

(3) And when thou shalt show thereafter that out of the Fathers' statutes the quarrel in God's word is accepted, which is a divine quarrel; but it does not affect us, because we alone have God's word for our reason. If, however, someone wants to fight with us, we want to protect ourselves with the sword of God's word alone. If this is a divine quarrel, as you say, then we will do justice to the matter. But not so. In the word of God one should not quarrel, but open it earnestly to one another, and if the truth is heard and seen, yield. All this is to be done with the kindling of the believing heart, as happened to the disciples who went to Emmaus. Our controversy is not only with the devil, but also with the flesh, which is always against the Spirit. Therefore, really know what these speeches are, as Ephesians 6 says. In short, we do not want to fight with you in any other boundaries, neither in the 7) New Testament nor in the Old Testament. But that the teachers are attracted by Oecolampadio and me is not because we want to base ourselves on them, as we have often enough indicated, but because we want to bring word from everywhere.

(4) Accordingly, you show yourself worthy, as you have brought forth the Scriptures under the bench; in my opinion, unreasonably. For if you ever consider those who have brought the Scriptures to us through the means and instrument of languages, you must recognize Erasmus in our time, and Vallam a few years ago in one, 8) and the pious Reuchlin and Pellicanum in the other, without whose help neither you nor others would be nothing 9) if only man, and not God, were to be recognized as the author. But what need is there of praising? Is it no longer he who makes everything grow 10) together? Does Paul no longer count for anything? 1 Cor. 3: "Who is Paul? Who is Apollus? I planted, Apollos watered; but God made it grow: therefore he that planted is nothing, nor he that watered, but he that made it grow, God. And not unto us, O LORD, not unto us, but unto thy name shalt thou give the glory." I will spare you here, dear Luther, publicly, because you have boasted of yourself in many writings, by epistles and otherwise much more proudly, so that you should probably be astonished; 11) but we will, if God wills, be moderate, and let you remain a man. For in truth you know well, that at the time when you stood out, there was a great multitude of those who were much more skilled in reading and languages than you, although they did not stand out to protect Israel and to fight against the great Goliath of Rome because of fear, because God did not raise them, up and make them male. (I also follow your praise.) But you were called by God in all this, no different from David; you faced the enemy so comfortingly that all who were afraid of how the shameful Antichrist would be taken, were strengthened, jumped to you, so that the gospel came to a successful conclusion; Therefore we should thank God that he raised you up, since no one dared to do so, and hold you in honor as a useful piece of crockery, as we also gladly do, even though you turn the same into many ways. But anger is a bond of reason, and an enemy of love, nothing less, neither also nonsense confuses reason. But who is so unwise as to be angry with a good man who rages, if he rages more and more? No one; but the more he rages, the more one feels compassion for him. So we can truly see to this day how you have stormed the papacy, even though you have brought the powerless, hopeful flesh out into the light, how much God has given you power to speak. And even though you now rage out of anger, we would like to overlook [the same] for the sake of your former service, you do not want to recognize it. But that you are now raging out of anger, you cannot deny, if God wills, if you only read your own book, for the multitude of evil words and wrong opinions, as we will make clear, cannot come out of love and good consideration. For look at all those who have ever written out of bitterness, where no one has ever escaped himself as much as you have escaped yourself in the book. And shall you ever be able to reckon it to a spirit? or not speak against you? or give way to error? Saul was at first gentle, and dear to God, and skilful; but when he became haughty and tyrannical, God made him daily deaf; [he] did dishonorable things to him: shall it therefore have been right, because he was not skilful? The great Alexander also kept himself more free in the end of his life, neither in youth. Marcus Manlius, by his glorious deeds, came to know that he sought the empire, and was killed for the sake of tyranny. Pythagoras, the most noble philosopher, became the greatest tyrant; should it therefore be all right what they do? Much less should anyone in the Christian community, for the sake of a noble deed, carry himself in such a way that he should not be persuaded, or believe what he wants. Therefore, I urge you by God, who created you and me, to go into yourself and let other people sing about you and say that you may be worthy. For "what do you have that you have not received from God? But if thou hast received it, why dost thou boast?" 1 Cor. 4. And if all this does not help, I will make thee know thyself more truly in all goodness. Thou wilt ever be seen, if thou alone hast judged the course of the gospel, wherein I almost admit much to thee. But I will make thee see that thou hast not known the wide and glorious light of the gospel, because thou hast forgotten it again. You have taught that Christ Jesus, the Son of the living God, is our only salvation, that faith comes from the uniting Father and Spirit, and the like. For you have therefore brought forth Scripture, both new and old. But if, in addition, you have strongly taught that absolution must be given to anyone who is to be sure that his sins are forgiven, and that this absolution is the key, you have not really recognized either the key or the gospel. For from the gospel comes the assurance of faith, since we know that the Son of God paid for our sins with his death. If there is faith, then there is also absolution or redemption, so there is no need for man to be made sure, for he must become sure in faith alone, and no one gives faith, not God. And even if a man were to say ten thousand times, "Your sins are forgiven you," no one is certain of this, not even one who is assured of God in his heart; for if one were to say, "Your sins are forgiven you through the death of Christ Jesus, and you are also made a son of God through Him," these words are the gospel. But no one accepts Christ JESum, because the Father has drawn him. Therefore it follows that as soon as he is drawn, he believes; and if he believes, he is already sure; for because assurance is not there, perfect faith is not there either; but if faith is there, assurance is there also. What is the need for man's assurance, or absolution, or deliverance? Doesn't Paul say in Romans 8: "The spirit itself makes known to our spirit that we are children of God"? Do you not see who makes our spirit secure? and Gal. 4: "But that you should be sons, God has sent into your hearts the Spirit of His Son, who cries out, Father!" From this comes the certainty of our spirit, that we are sons of God, not from the saying of the armpit. 1) By this you yourself

1) Mockingly put instead of: Absolvirer.

You may well see that you have not seen the full extent of the glory of the gospel, nor have you really known what the keys (claves) are, namely, the preaching of the gospel. And although Christ assigns the binding and unbinding to the disciples, it is of the working Spirit alone. They preached that the Spirit had also made alive in them before, and makes it alive for and where He wills; therefore, out of divine friendship, the apostle's name is given to it, which is of the Spirit alone. As soon as he speaks John 4: "He that trusteth in me, the works that I do shall he do; yea, greater works shall he do." But God alone does the miracles, nor does he put them to our names, so that we may see his love and grace all the more clearly. Here you have overlooked something, you cannot deny it. Item, you have added something to purgatory (is it, as they say); but which the gospel may not suffer. "For he that dieth in faith is saved, and cometh not into judgment or condemnation, but is passed out of death into life," John 5. And if we had to do enough for our sin, or purify ourselves, "Christ died in vain," Galatians 2. For this there was no purgatory before Christ, and it should be built only after the payment for sin is already paid in cash? Item, you have added something to the intercession of the blessed who are in heaven, without reason of Scripture, when we have only one mediator, intercessor and payer 2c., Gal. 3. and 1 Tim. 2. and 1 Jn. 2. and have you been deceived in this by the counter-accusation that the popes make, saying: "They are in love, because love does not fall down", 1 Cor. 13. 8. and therefore they ask for us. For you have not seen here, for one thing, that this little word xxxxxxxx should not be translated: does not fall down, or does not fail; but: love does not fall down, or does not forget to work. For the other, have you not seen that love is not described there as it is in heaven in the blessed, but as it should be with us here, because we are in the valley of tears, of which Paul's description is one, one, one, one, one, one.

Pre-painting. Item, in the matter 1) of images you decide the matter thus: that from the law of Moses only that which is measured by the law of love of neighbor applies to us; now the images are not counted there, therefore one may have them or not; as also Paul is of opinion, since he 1 Cor 8. thus speaks: "We know that the idol is nothing 2) in the world." In which of thy decision [thou] therefore errest, first, that it may be not to suffer, because your canon or cord is contrary to God's word. For Christ says Matt. 22: "In the two commandments hang all the law and the prophets." So we must measure everything that is written in the Old Testament according to the two laws, namely according to the honor and love of God, and according to the love of our neighbor. If we now measure the images according to the first law of the honor and love of God, then they are completely against God. For the images are erected for worship, after we have taken those to whom they are depicted for helpers and gods. In short, faith should not and may not suffer images to be worshipped, or to stand in such a suit and danger of worship as they are presented in the temples, as Exodus 20 is well understood. If any man say, But if it be taught hereafter so strongly and truly that they should not be worshipped, it is not because they are left standing in the temples, or not: he speaketh out of his own conceit; and considereth not that God, who is eternal wisdom and prudence, hath well known what would come of the presenting of idols, although his word hath written, Thou shalt not worship them, nor serve them, or command discipline; and hath forbidden it. Therefore let us not be wise, neither let us say to God, We will or may have them, if we worship them not 2c. For if we leave them, we give hope to all the ungodly to bring back unbelief, and cause that the youth and descendants for and for may, where a little time the word would be omitted, be led again into idolatry with the present idols. We are certainly told that in some temples in Saxony and other neighboring countries the idols in the temples are placed unequally, one is placed behind, the other on the head, and thus one wants to prove the indifferentiam, that is, one may have it or not. This is called being good foolish. If one may have them, let them stand; if one should not have them, what is one doing with them? We speak only of the images that may come into veneration. For we, too, through the bank, have put away only the images that were there to be worshipped. Secondly, you are mistaken in the understanding of Paul's words in 1 Cor. 8: "We know that the idol is of no use in the world: For you think: 3) Paul understands by the word idol the carved or made image, which however is not Paul's opinion, but he wants to say: One knows well, that the gods, of which the Idols are nothing 1) as often in the holy scriptures idols are called idols, in derision, metonymice, even devils, because they answered out of images. And Paul wills the foolish, who thought that it was nothing that they were in the idols or idolatrous sacrifices, 2) they knew well that the god of the idol that stood there and was worshipped was nothing, therefore they cared little whether they ate with it or not. Yes, Paul wants to reproach the foolish in such a way: We know that idolatry is nothing; or: We know that all idolatry in the whole world is nothing. But that this is the meaning of Paul's words, we can judge from the words that follow from this point on: "and that there is no other God, neither the only one" 2c., by which and by the following words it is clearly seen that Paul did not take this word, idol, for the carved stick, but for the idols to which the images are presented. For no one has the idol for a God, therefore incomprehensibly opposed to it, "and that there is no other God, neither the only one" 2c. And in the same place Paul argues thoroughly against the compassions, that, 3) although they knew well when they boasted that idols were nothing, yet they should not give offense to the simple. Which is right against you, dear Luther, because since the simple and weak are hurt with idols, we should never have an idol in eternity. For to have idols is far more hurtful than to eat meat sacrificed to idols, of which Paul says: "Before he would hurt the weak with it, before he would eat no meat at all," not only to be without meat sacrificed to idols.

5 I have placed this place before your eyes, esteemed Martin Luther, so that you may see that you are not lost in one place, but in many, and that you may hereafter restrain yourself from the high praise among Christians, because you alone have done everything, which we would very much like to grant you, if it were so. But you alone are an honest Ajax or Diomedes among many Nestors, Ulysses, Menelaus. Thu gemach, lassen dich das kleine Lied, von dem Jacobi am dritten Kapititel geschrieben steht, nicht übereilen. We know the fame of Pauli and Demosthenis among the Athenians, also Ciceronis among the Romans, but

We need to think about this in every way: First of all, who are those who praise us, and then to see whether we are as they praise us. For we truly saw in your beginning where you were lacking, yet we kept silent about it amicably, for your name's sake, but we faithfully practiced the teaching, in which you did not walk rightly, without ceasing, so that there would be very little injury.

(6) If then thou canst not renounce in the good things 4) neither that thou hast failed in them: dear, do not argue thus, because thou seest that thou hast also failed in other places, and say: thou hast also often argued before, and therefore 5) hast not been right; but therefore thou mayest fail 6). So much of your boast, which you lead hiev nevertheless etwas more moderately, neither in other places. For my part, I say that I have always been grateful to those who have taught me, how much more should I be grateful to such an excellent man, whose honor, I know well, will never attain, what should it press me then? But I have my little knowledge from that, as I indicated to you in Latin; and little from you; neither, 7) that I am grateful to God and to you, that you stood out for the first time so graciously.

(7) Therefore, when you make us suspect that we have fallen backward into you, because you brought forth the Scriptures, you do us wrong. For many excellent men have kindly warned thee, saying that thou shouldst bear thyself well, 8) and do nothing out of temptation. I have suffered for myself, since you have given me the fourth time over with unkind writings, when, God willing, I will not let one go out against you, nor have I substituted myself, 9) never again to write against you by name, until you have let secret epistles go out everywhere, and open writings so much that I am forced to jump to the truth.

8) But since you make ten heads 10) of us, you do as through the whole book, which has long since been honestly answered for, you cry out for unk for, as if it had never been thought of. Notice, then, that Christ Jesus, who is the Truth Himself, taught some of the truth of the Gospel in one place by the similitude of drinking water, John 4; in another, John 6, by eating and drinking His flesh and blood; in the third, by an act of the Holy Spirit.

How much you yourself have taught by others and others precutting, so that the sum of the sense remains intact, and the words may suffer the tropos welfare. Who will reproach you for taking up these words of Paul 2 Corinthians 11: "I have mated to you a pure daughter to give to Christ" in many ways? in the word: pure daughter; in the word: mated; in the word: to give, or to bring; and for this reason no one is reproached for many doubts. Thus, if one person records these words of Christ in the word "that"; another in "is"; the third in "my corpse," so that one meaning remains, and the truth is not only intact, but is only brought forth clearly in this and other places, then there is never any discord.

9) But that you say that we are united in ostracizing Christ, 3) we want to order the right judge, who knows whether it is so for him. It is also well learned in our answer who is most likely to ostracize Christ.

10) Do you also want to say that the devil will attack more articles: baptism, original sin, yes, Christ, that they are nothing. 4) I don't care much about baptism, that Christ is nothing, to overcome the opponents. If they come, we must receive them with the sword of God, just as the ancients did. Now keep thyself before God well, because of baptism (say those who read your books) you have no other reasons, neither those of the Anabaptists ring 5) may be overthrown. For the sake of the Lord Jesus Christ, his true humanity may not be put into conflict any way before, neither with the doctrine that you lead in this book, as we want to convince publicly afterwards. The original sin says no one, nothing to be; but that it is a pest and disease, not a forfeited guilt of ours, but of the first Aetis 6) Adam 2c. when we wrote about it in Latin. Read it, and what is wrong in it, indicate, will I kindly report or give way. It has probably an old mutton against it in German something brögt, 7) but is not worth that one deß take.

11) The human statutes 8) half that one will have to come to the aid of the disputes, until without worry, as far as you do to him, as we do. We do not forbid any doctrine to be brought to the churches, be it pontifical, pure, 9) turbid or impure; but then we stand over it with the flail 10) of God's word, also lead the treading ox over it and astonish it quite well; then as much falls from some as when evil years are and there is no grain in the chaff. Thy two books, of images and of Christ's supper against the scribblers, have been freely read among us, and therefore threshed out with earnestness, there is nothing left but inanes paleae, empty straw, so much as meets the opinion, that is, nothing else, neither appearance of wise words, and is the fig tree, which alone has leaves.

12) Thust well up, 11) if one wants to be of the devil, he will leave us half of the scripture well quiet. Answer: Of course, we would much rather argue with him 12) and you forever in the insurmountable weapons, neither be his. Here we are on the plan. It will not end with a year, when you say that you want to fight with the enthusiasts this year. One year may not be enough. For even though you will give way in this, as I hope to God, even greater heresies will arise only when you yourself are threatening, against which we, with God, will argue more honestly than now with you.

13th Schreiest: Alas! and alas! 1) About our teaching and writers, that they do not look at a thought ten times, whether it is right before God, before they spew it out. To this I say, like Christ to the weeping women: Weep over yourself, my Luther. If you had considered all things as good, not only ten, but a hundred times more than we have done in all dogmatics, that is, 2) opinions, then your doctrine would now also stand everywhere unconquered, as, by God's grace, ours stands. Go over them and break a dogma for us.

14 Now I must once put your own words, Luther, [Bog.] a. am 4 [Bl.] other Theil [hes Bl.] 2): It is precisely the same devil, who in the end attacks us through the enthusiasts with blasphemy of the holy reverend Sacrament of our Lord Jesus Christ, from which they want to make vain bread and wine into marks or symbols of the Christians, as they dream and like it" 2c. Do not be angry, my dear Luther, I must indeed be astonished at these words, and I must also be surprised at them; 4) only as a test, so that you may see how the whole book would fare if it were to be disheveled properly. 5) First of all, how is it that the poor devil must have done everything to you now, like nobody in my house? I thought, 6) the devil had already been overcome and judged. If then the devil is a mighty lord of the world, as thou hast spoken just before, where is it that all things are done by God's prudence? Say [thou], But he worketh by the devil in you, say ye, may we be against it or not? I mean, no. What kind of Christian are you that you have no mercy on us, seeing that God has given the devil so much power over us? Think about it and ask the devil, is he like that to you? Well known, what does it matter, he will tell you that all false doctrine will only come to nothing when all the hope that you and others have without God's word is accepted; then we will only go without learning anything. Moreover, we may well know whether the contestation of honor stings us in the heart or the love of truth and of our neighbor exhorts us to such a dispute. If, on the other hand, we see the motive for your crying and writing, we will not devil so much, but we are sorry that Luther and many others do the same, as if they were full of "God who protects us. "Weep with those who weep; seek good from all men," Rom. 12. You call us enthusiasts, and I do not really know what enthusiasts mean. If it is more than a deaf man, a fool, or a foolish wise man, I cannot help but recognize something in myself; so mean and kind is my gracious wife Stultitia (Thorheit) to all men, and to me especially. Oh, I think, Luther, not that you therefore call us enthusiasts; or else you peel us alone with that which is common to all men.

Or is it as much, as praestigiator, fanaticus, Latin, which we might well call in German a deceiver, sorcerer, fantasist or fool: See, in fact, who are the foolish ones; those who recognize that no other eating of the body of Christ can be, neither the spiritual, which may be unanimous in Scripture everywhere; or those who want to eat him bodily and extend his corpse against all ability of his own word according to the Godhead, want to eat him completely in the mouth of man, and whoever does not desist from this, is a fool, a foolish man, 9) yes, a devil, a murderer and soul destroyer with blasphemy of the holy reverend Sacrament of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Dear Luther, you have outdone yourself. Long before that, you said that no more shameful heresy had not been seen. Everything is too dear. You may not make a thing greater with fine words than it is in itself; but with fine words you may deceive people into thinking that a thing is greater or better than it is; that find verborum praestigia, as the merchants and horse-deceivers and traders do. But if thou wilt do well, make the words correspond to the thing. So you will find that much greater heresies are found, neither would this be, if it were an error. You put too much in your mouth. But they blaspheme the holy sacraments, admitting to them that they have not, and admitting to the sacraments, which are nothing else, neither signs of holy things, that they are the holy thing itself; making the creature equal to the Creator, which is not only a blasphemy of the sacraments, but of God Himself, as is well judged from Rom. 1. "Out of these they will make vain bread and wine (you say) the mark or sign of thanksgiving of Christians." In the words thou makest thyself, dear Luther, so suspicious, yea, in all the book, that [it is] a wonder. For thou likewise complainest, as the popes do, of things that are you do not have, and have never been promised to you. For what are we promised if we eat the body of Christ in the flesh? But if you preach to us in a good papal way, how sins are forgiven by bodily eating, how faith is strengthened, and how the corpse is preserved in its original state, all without God's word, what do you do differently than the pope? He also says that the blessed oil made holy, took away sin and consecrated. And when you reversed his books, did he not also cry out: "They want to take away the holy sacraments! What do they take away from you, dear Luther, if they teach to keep the sacraments as Christ and the apostles kept them? Nothing else, neither that one does not accept your word for God's word. In this you do us wages and injustice, because we want to make vain wine and bread out of the sacrament. For inasmuch as thou speakest of the whole thanksgiving, we hold that this gathering is to be arranged in such a way that all who see the Lord Christ Jesus 1) to be their Savior give thanks here for the death which he suffered for us, and eat with one another the true sign, so that Paul teaches us that we are] to become one body and one bread. By this you see that we do not make it a vain common bread by custom. For it is a signifying bread and measure 2) than not we, but Paul teacheth 1 Cor. 10. Why then reproachest thou these words, tokens of thanksgiving, tokens (if tokens be taken for good), and emblems? Do you not hear that he says: "One loaf and one body are we the multitude; therefore we eat of one loaf"? But if thou wilt speak of substance or matter alone, whether it be bread, or the flesh of Christ, answer thyself. For you have taught that it is bread, and not the body of Christ, and that in so many places that it is not necessary to tell; but in the bread the body of Christ is eaten. So you have made vain bread and wine of it, not we; for if you look at the custom, you will hear that we do not use it and keep it as simple bread in the evening meal, but for a sign of truth and duty or unification. But if you look at the matter or substance, you have taught that it is nothing but bread. The other thing, when thou sayest: but in the bread is eaten the body of Christ, thou bringest from thine own, not from God; for he saith: "This is my body"; not: in the bread is my body. Why then dost thou lay upon us that which thou hast done? or dost thou measure us in the midst of evil, which thou hast done?

1) i.e. confess.

as they dream (you continue to speak) and like, they are called "dreamers" by the prophets, Jer. 23, "who speak the poem of their heart: which God does not commend to them, 3) that is what they speak". See now, who dreams more, you or us. You teach so many things without Scripture, and we cry out that you nevertheless teach a thing that we do not teach with honestly understood Scripture. That you teach without Scripture you cannot deny; for you may not present what you teach. See then, dear Luther, I have intended these mean words of yours to endure you to good, 4) only that you may see how all your veins in the book are only shameful and perverse words, and that you speak against yourself publicly. For that which you taught before, you now reproach others for. And saith Paul, Gal 2: "If I build again that which I brake before, I make myself a transgressor."

16 When you therefore pretend that we acted with such a stupid, despondent conscience that you think we want the beer to be back in the barrel, 5) you are speaking from a wrong mind. For our submission, which we have always made free to all Christians to consider and, where we were wrong, to inform ourselves, you have dragged us along in Carlstadt's recantation, as if it came from wavering: but in this (praise be to God) we have done much more Christian, neither you. For we wanted to leave all churches and every man free in his judgment, not to do violence to anyone's judgment with our iniquity; but you have taken a stand with such words: if it were a matter of your standing from your opinion, one should not be moved by it, but think that you have fallen from the truth. How then will it be possible for you to be told what you have already told? Shall it be so that a prophet does not let himself be instructed by another prophet, as Paul teaches in 1 Cor. [Chapter 14, then each one will say what he wants, and conspire to depart, which will be right in the church of the devil, but not in the church of Christ, in which also the prophets give and loose to those who sit and flare up, 6) if God has opened something to them. Instead of giving and loosing 7). Neither do we have repentance of the wine poured out. 8) We truly like it for the good of the whole community. For we have enough of this, praise be to God, that is, we have enough of all kinds of advice, enough of weapons, and enough of heart. We do not want to take away anyone's judgment with our power.

17 You admit to the Germans, 1) "that they fall for new things like fools, whoever resists them, they only become more mad about it: but if no one resists them, they themselves become full and tired. That rhymes well, if they are such careless people, yes, fools, as you say, and fall so easily, then do not hinder them, so they themselves become full and fall from it. But I hear well, if thou knowest their ways, and warnest them, and knowest that they do nothing that thou wouldst like to see them do. Dear, how does this speech rhyme with your intentions, neither that you want to eat everything that comes into your mouth? What have the pious, simple-minded Germans done to you?"

18) You hope that no teacher of heresy will be converted. 2) Yes, you say that it is not heard that no one has ever been converted. Why do you speak such words, knowing that you speak falsehood? What greater heresy is it than to teach that we are saved by our own works? For heresy sheds Christ. Now you have taught and kept the same heresy, for you have been a monk for a long time because of it; but now God has pardoned you, and you recognize your error. How many are they? Or are you lacking in this example; then take Carlstadt, who first (when you were speaking) brought this error onto the path. He has openly recanted, and has turned back from the error. Probo; for you gave him an open declaration of this in an open print. If he has done so, why do you say that no one has ever been converted? If he has not, why do you give out an open lie about him?

19. Christ has not converted any high priests, but their disciples have; more are enough against you, but not against us. For you, compared to him, are the high priest who does it all, and we poor, unlearned, foolish, devilish little enthusiasts. For this reason God has given us foolish ones and small ones 3) to know and accept the truth, and has darkened you wise ones, "so that you see with seeing eyes and do not know, hear and do not understand," Isa. 6.

20. that you count us among the false apostles, recognize GOD; but that you have rejected the word of Paul:

"If you have warned a heretical, self-centered person the other time, you should avoid him," you should also know that it points to you. For you have testified that you will not deviate from your opinion, so we have always promised to take report as soon as we are instructed with God's word. In turn, you are sufficiently rebutted, but you do not want to give way; this is what Paul calls pushing. 4) But I realize very well what you want to reckon here for a heretical perseverance: anyone whom you warn, but do not desist; but that is too much. For he is heretical who is overcome, and nevertheless adheres to him, and does not want to take warning. Where have you overcome us? May we not say that you are heretical? because you do not want to be rebuked, you have also testified to this. But not so. Let us bring forth the Scriptures without deceit and wrath, and then let the church of Christians judge; it will well meet it, provided it has the united breath of the church.

21) The example you give with the painted glass 5) belongs to you. For thou hast the painted glass, that is, thy own design before thine eyes, out of which thou speakest what thou wilt, even that which is contrary to faith and scripture. But we have the Scripture, the unpainted glass, and what that pretends to be, that is as it pretends to be. But here we must see that our eye is not strained; 6) for if it is, it does not help that the glass is clear. For if the eye is dark, how great will the darkness become?

(22) Saying, if you do not convert any of the rebels, you will have washed your hands and done what you have done. You are right. Be calm now. I will surely assure you that God will not reproach you for it. Only let it be that you can give good account for the resistance.

23) Our writings (you say) made you strong and full of joys. 7) I believe that, yes, the truth is dearer to you than it should be, because we bring it forth strong with God. But if this is not the case, then you are as happy as that priest, whom the maidservant had roughed up, that he grinned, and when the neighbors came, he said: he laughed at the sausage, [which] the cat had stolen from the grate. I know well the joys who speak such kind, honorable, chaste words as you do in this book. I have read it with the Anabaptists...

They're as happy as if they were at a wedding in hell.

You also put on us how we boast how holy martyrs 1) we are, how much we suffer, how patient we are 2c. and you go on with so many Alfanzian, mocking words that it is an effort 2) among Christian people to let go of such a dishonorable, lewd speech, which may offend so badly on all people's tongues. I am silent that you speak the untruth, that we ever make such fame of ourselves. Read all my writings, and if you find one of the boasts now counted, then I have spoken the truth. Much less Oecolampadius. And drive this hard and strong throughout the whole book, so that it may be seen that [the] proverb is true, since it is said: He who wants to speak and does not have the truth, must lie; for everything that you complain about, how you were scolded, [you] wrote. Neither my word nor pen hath ever reproached thee an idolater or denier of Christ. Say that you are not what some may say about you, and let God rule accordingly. But if any man say such things against thee, and do thee wrong, see now that thou do not that to any man which thou hast so disliked; so shalt thou not lie against us one lie upon another.

(25) Some have said, for the sake of peace, that this thing is not so great that it should be broken up. But they have spoken rightly for the sake of disruption; for not only the matter, but none in the church of God, shall cause disruption, but one shall loosen the other, and if the truth be heard, the erring man shall depart. As we had indicate from 1 Cor. chapter 14: "Let the elder also," according to Christ's teaching, "be as the younger," and "the forerunner as the servant." But where this is not done, the children of the flesh begin [to] quarrel, not wanting to be overcome. Saying, "Who hath written Zwinglin and Oecolampadium called?" 5) He who has preached to us, I hear well, we should not have written without your leave? Who has allowed us to write before? And since we have [to] write, we touched you ienen 6) unkindly? Yes, how long have we been silent to your secret and public scolding? You have an angry unfounded epistle to the von Rütlingen written. A proud one, yes, so haughty to those at Strasbourg that they spared yours in it, that they did not let it go out. After that, Carlstadt's recantation, in which you singled me out by name. Fourth, the Swabian booklet with our great disgrace. To all of which I kept silent, but against others showed the reasons all the way, or vice versa, which you lacked, or forgave, and did not touch your name, so that you, first, may find no cause for quarrel. Second, that thy other doctrine, which thou hast well and rightly led, be not cast into suspicion or doubt. Have yet, so that the error does not break in, since you wrote for the fifth time the shameful epistle in Latin to the chariot 8), not in German, but also in Latin, written with quite a different discipline to you, neither you now break out in German. See now who is the wolf that has wanted to have peace by force, and who are the sheep that have sought nothing else but peace. For since we had known the truth, and opened [the same], who would have told us that Luther would neither report nor make peace with the divine truth, nor with the friendship of those who were so secret to him with writings? Helias does not make discord, but Ahab. For that one leads God's word, and this one gave nothing for it, 3 [1] Kings 18.

(26) Our work is not to learn to say wine and bread, but to learn to know that wine and bread are not God, as you yourself profess; otherwise they would become Ceres and Bacchus; and to see that they are not to be worshipped, as you have taught without any reason of truth in the book of the worship of the Sacrament. Also, when you complain that we do not consider anyone spiritual or learned who does not hold to our opinion, you look at me as if it grieves you that you are not considered as learned as you are. So long, erudite Luther, we considered you much more learned than you are, but God does not want to give us that, but thrusts our foolish rights 9) into our eyes 2c.

the open grave should give such breath. But that you are so merciful to us immediately after that that you also want to lay the blame on the devil, you do this out of false presumption, because you have been pressing on us from the beginning, as we have a counsel: we are desperate about the matter, therefore we say that it is not a big matter whether it comes to danger, that it is only 1) a small matter 2c., with many fictitious words. He who calls this matter small does it for your sake, for since you have no promise of bodily food, you cannot complain that they want to counterfeit or take away the divine promises from you. And to make small is no other than to say, What do you complain of? What is going on with you? 2c. I do not estimate it small with myself, to pretend without Scripture, or to build on Scripture, wrongly understood. It will also be ring 2) for us to preserve our doctrine through all writing. For if the thirsty man 3) wants to hear God's word, we have overcome; if he does not want to hear it in this piece, he will not hear it in other pieces either; for, in short, no excerpt will help. He who does not want to hear God's word in this matter as much as in others, wants to use God's word only for his own benefit or pleasure. If it is true in one thing, it is also true in another. Yes, it alone shall decide everything.

28) And when you therefore dismissed the matter, that either they or we blasphemed God, you said: 4) "Now let every devout Christian see whether this matter is small, as they say. There you have the blasphemers and their spirit." Speak also to us, how we count God's word small: and do us violence in all things. For that which we teach in this, we do out of faithfulness to and magnifying of God's word; for Christ Jesus immediately said, "Again I leave the world, and go to the Father," John 16, and: I shall be no more in the world," John 17, 2c., -when he had said: "This is my body," 2c. Should we now leave the word: "I shall henceforth be no more in the world", and not consider what it wants and is able to do, because Luther is on the contrary? I mean, no! It is to be taken into consideration immediately as well as: "This is my corpse", and this immediately as well as that. So you note that we do not magnify God's word in one place and deny it in another, but you do. For what we say against you, you shout hard like a Tauber: I remain on the meager words of Christ; just as if we indicated next to them, which are not also precious and Christ's. Is this a clean, Christian judgment? Is this a clean, chaste, Christian judgment? and although the saying of Jacob 2, "He who lacks in one is guilty of the whole transgression," does not reach where you draw it, nor is it that he who lacks in one place is therefore guilty of the whole faith. So Assa did not remove the altars 5) in the high places, was nothing less a friend of God, 3 [1] Kings 15 [v. 14] The Christians initially thought that Peter should not preach the gospel to the Gentiles. See if this is a small error, and were nothing less Christians, Apost. 11. 2c. The Scriptures are full of these things. So you speak into (the) air what the wrath states, but which is not according to the truth. Now this must not be; we firmly believe that the words of Christ, "This is my body," are his. But this we do not believe, that these words, spoken or thought, or, which way thou wilt, practiced, make the body of Christ a bodily food to us, as thou speakest openly; yea, let it be eaten with the mouth. For this reason we have no promise, but we have a bright word against it, "I leave the world," and "I will no longer be in the world. And so the chip is from the understanding of the words; not whether the words are God's words or not.

29 Therefore, when you speak of nothing, neither of a fanatic, nor of a reprobate, nor of a blasphemer, nor of a liar, nor of a devil, nor of a seducer, after your own manner, you do so only to stir up the fire with cruel words, and to incite the simple to reject, more out of temptation of wrath, the gathering together of Scripture, nor to discipline the invention of truth. You also say that with this error we bring many souls into the hellish fire. You must have a word of God about this, or else you will not bring us further into hell with your word, nor the pope with his. Now then, let him who does not eat the body of Christ bodily with his mouth be damned. Do you see now how you stand? Like the pope, you speak out of temptation, and if you are asked, you have no reason. Yes, God has said, "This is my body." Surely he has spoken it, who doubts it? But where did he say that we should make him for and for and eat him with our mouths? Where did he promise us salvation for the sake of oral and bodily eating? or, if we did not eat it in this way, condemnation? So your un-Christian per callumuiLm to Argem. Half of the boasting [you] have heard before, that you deny us sacrilegiously. So it is also a sacrilegious traffic, that we cry out for peace for fear alone. For, my dear Luther, what matter or doctrine is there in the whole voice of faith to which we do not speak with peace? Thus thou pressest the prophetic word upon us, "They speak peace against their neighbor, but evil in their hearts." And if you look at our work in the Lord, you will find by God's grace gold, silver, precious stones, and a goodly building, if only the tree can be recognized by its fruit. Why dost thou reproach us with strife, when our church is in great peace, as much as it should be peace, when perhaps not all churches are? But see thou what peace thou seekest. For an epistle is carried about under your name to a prince, in which it is written among 5) others: . Now it is time to strike. Dear, what else shall the word teach us, neither that thou wilt defend thy cause with the word, that is, that princes shall smite? Now see how you seek peace, and how we! Do you write such secret writings to the princes, and yet you write publicly that you want to fight with us only with the one word, my dear, how does this fit together? Have we not all taught from the beginning that one should not teach the papacy with one's fist 6) but with the Scriptures? And that is why I will henceforth generally transgress your invectives, falsehoods, falsifications, lies, and all such things, for they all come from impotence of mind and mistrust of the matter, and mostly rely on the thick, solid Scriptures, and in the well-founded 7) arguments. Until you, simple reader, also a simple dissolver and judge.

30. Accordingly, [you] come forth with such weak disorderly stuff that, while you bring forth God's word, you may not quickly say: Thus, or thus, shall the words be understood; but thou dost beforehand all along a long insult, that the simple may be introduced with thy authority or name, to which he gives much credence, to astonish thine adversaries, and with such contestation thereafter not baptize thine unfounded opinion, but with thy insult, as with a forest water, be accepted, and with thee also rage and cry: Flesh and blood, words are dry. Dear, why do you do this? If you have a good thing, why don't you do it stiffly and 2) in a triumphant way? Thou hast read in Tullio and Fabio that those who have good things should present them thoroughly and earnestly, and need no blasphemy or suspicion; but those who have not good things are apt to puff themselves up with blasphemy and suspicion. As you do here, you say: 3) "Now that we come to the meeting, let us take before us the saying of Christ." And you do not take it before you, until you have made your adversary more objectionable (than you think) with much disgrace and blasphemy, which is all an indication that you do not hope to gain anything for the cause, but you may well want to make the person hateful, you think. So the popes do to him, call the gospel Lutheran, and then reproach Luther for the greatest heretic that ever was, so that the simple church has an abhorrence of the matter, as if it could be nothing good, if it were handled by such a wicked man. And so you tell us how we are uncertain, how we boast, how we cry for peace, must also cry for peace and write unjustly; and you do this throughout the whole book, but everywhere with alfa or untruth. For how certain we are, you can well see from our words and reasons, for you yourself say that we swear that we are certain, which is also untruth. But that we do not want to infringe on anyone, nor do we want to distort the church's judgment with our name, 1) you turn that back on us.

31 When you now, dear Luther, thus state that you alone want to take the precious words: "This is my body" and overcome us, you need an evil advantage under the guise of honesty 8) and security. For throughout the whole book you should never act on these words alone, but always add the words, "He who is given for you," as Lucas and Paul have. For two reasons. [One is that the two wrote after Matthew and Mark, and no doubt omitted words of theirs, which were more diligently kept together, that the thing might be the more truly judged what sin is.

nes would have them. The other is that these words are as precious and bright as those: "This is my body. Therefore we may brightly judge that, if we should understand the words, "This is my body," to mean that the body of Christ would be there: so we should also by the: "Who is given for you," which are alike as light and barren as those, we should understand that we must ever eat the body of Christ as he hung on the cross, for he is visibly and sufferably given up for us; so we should eat him also. Yes, you say, just as 1) you want to benefit us, I do not want to take before me more than the words "this is my body", as Matthew and Marcus have them. How? Do Paul and Lucas count for nothing with you? Do you not know that even the scholars of the law have a rule, where they have two laws, and in the younger one something further, brighter or more narrow (sic) is understood, neither in the older one, that therefore the old one is not reviled, if one looks only at the younger and brighter one? but so it is to be considered that the time in which the old law was made, the customs and piety were still so simple, that it was enough for the pious with few words. But as the world becomes more and more cunning, and everyone takes the liberty of circumventing the law, it is necessary to explain for and against. The two holy evangelists Matthew and Mark did the same, presenting the words in a simple way, so that such words were understood by the Hebrews as "this is my body", for: "this is the memory of my body". But in the times of Paul and Luke it was seen that the gospel would also come to the Gentiles, and for them they took care that the words would not remain unrecognized to them, or be misunderstood, and they carefully added the word of Christ, which the others both omitted. Now see if you are not caught in an open alanza; 3) for throughout the whole book you take the words: "who is given for you" no more than in three places (unless I have overcounted), and yet in the same places, nor throughout the whole book, you do not speak a word of it, but exceed it in all places, and hear that we cry out like a bugle that the words "who is given for you" are the sign or handle by which one learns the meaning of the previous words, "this is my body.

32 So now, dear Luther, I want to ask you whether

Do you want to leave us the words: "Who is given for you", and let the sign of Lucas and Paul be considered as good as Matthäi and Marci, or not? If you say yes, then we must not do any more work; but the few words as reported before indicate to us enough that the previous words, "this is my body," must be taken meaningfully; for if they were to be taken according to the dry understanding, then it must also follow according to the dry understanding that we must eat him as he hung on the cross for us and was given up. Here you all cry out (but you especially) that the believer should not ask afterwards how he is to be eaten. Thank you! But we sing after him. For he said at once, "He that is given for you," or he said, "This is my body. So I do not have to jump over the words, but I want to understand them as right and true, because they are the words of my God, as well as the previous ones. But they teach me that if it is the body of Christ that is given for us, and we know very well that it is given painfully and sensitively, then there must be two things: either that the body of Christ must be eaten visibly and sensitively, or else that the preceding words may not be taken in the sense that they are supposed to have in the first place. Yes, these words are capable of so much (that will first hurt you) that they force us to understand the previous ones in the sense used 4), and yet they remain in their natural sense: This is the memorial or meaning of my body, which is given for you. Behold, how our (yea, yours also) words also remain in their natural form and understanding in your proper sense. And have already overcome you, that you must understand them in a right sense, but the same in another form of words. And do not help shouting: Let not the anterior words, "This is my body," be changed; but let not the posterior ones be so grossly understood, that we eat him as he was hanged upon the cross, visible and sensible; for the posterior ones are very unwilling to suffer understanding, that we should say, He is there who suffered death, but unsufferingly; for he did not suffer death unsufferingly; or, He is there as he was after the original 5). For he saith, "He that is given up for you," not, He that is risen from the dead. For when he is risen from the dead, he neither dies nor suffers, and always says, "He who is given up for you.

will give you". For he is not given in death without suffering, and yet is without suffering after the original state.

If you say no, you do not want to have the words with you, then we could sing the song to you right away as a good thing and with the truth: Enthusiasts, Enthusiasts! as you do us. But we do not doubt that you will not deny them, but will gladly have them with you. For if not, We would compel thee with other places of Scripture, unless thou wouldest deny all Scripture. And the same work we will gladly have here for the sake of the simple, who thus note: Of considering the Scriptures against each other.

34 The word of God is therefore a perfect thing, not deceived, so that in it there is nothing inconsistent, nothing unintelligent, nor repugnant. For where we do not understand it, the lack is not of the word, but of the conceit and gloom of our minds. Now where words are not joined together, but have a form that is thought to be repugnant in the first sight to some other words spoken or written elsewhere, they should be set off against each other, and the sense of one place should not be taken according to the first sight, so that it may also suffer the other; but it should be understood and interpreted in all respects in view of what is opposed to it. Everything is made clear with examples. Arrius, a pernicious heretic, took the words of John 14, "The Father is greater, neither I," as a screen of his error, for he said that Christ was not truly the Son of God, and co-equal and mighty with the Father, that he himself had said, "The Father is greater, neither I." Then Arrius should have measured besides the words, John 3: "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that every one" 2c. in which he calls himself the only begotten Son of God. For the Father and the Son must be of one nature. He should also have judged the same: "I and the Father are one thing", Joh. 10. Also: "All that the Father has is also mine", Joh. 16. Also: "He was well aware that the Father had given all things into his power", Joh. 13. If Arrius had looked at the places without number in the Gospel of John and elsewhere, besides those "the Father is greater than I," he would have found that he must have understood the words to refer only to human nature, that according to it he is less than the Father, not according to divine nature. Now this is an example of the places in Scripture that do not stand 1) next to each other,

1) d. i. near.

But they must be set off against each other. How much more should words not be divided from one another, which are opposed to one another, and if one part is separated from the other, the meaning is broken, made imperfect or obscure? Example: Christ says to John, John 13: "He it is to whom I offer the bread I have put in the oven." If we omit the word "to whom I offer the dunked bread" here, there is no more, because: "it is he"; then Christ would have shown him with his finger, and did not follow, which afterwards is written: "and when he dunked the bread, 3) he gave it to Judah" 2c. Item Matth. Cap. 1. the angel says: "Joseph, do not be afraid to take Mariam, your spouse, to yourself; for that which was in her is of the Holy Spirit." If we omit the following word, "for that which is born in her is of the Holy Spirit," the meaning remains imperfect, and Joseph is not made calm, although the birth is spoken to him, "Fear not to take Mariam thy spouse unto thee"; but if the following is added, all doubt is accepted: "for that which is born is of the Holy Spirit. Notice here, my dear Luther, that I am only telling you about the relative or demonstrative manifestations. Item John on the third: "No one ascends to heaven without the Son of Man, who is in heaven." If one should omit the word "without the Son of man," nothing would remain, for "no one goes up to heaven." Therefore it is necessary not only to speak of this, but also to understand what belongs to it. Item John in the 4th chapter, the Samaritan woman says: "Come and see a man who has told me everything I do. If I want to omit the following part, "He who has told me everything that I do," then nothing more remains than: "Come and see a man. But what miracle would it have been to see a man? Item John in the 6th chapter Christ says: "Not that any man hath seen the Father, but he that is of God hath seen the Father." If then "without him who is of God, he has seen the Father," nothing remains but that no one has seen the Father. From this it follows that Christ has not seen him either. But if you leave the words together, they will become clear, and the part that follows will give light to the part that goes before, so that it may be well recognized and understood.

35 So it is also with the words of Christ, "This is my body"; if you cut the one "who is for you," you will have the same thing.

2) d. r. near.

3) In the old edition: dünket.

If you leave them at that, then you see the natural, actual meaning that is in them, as the sweet kernel in the hard, unsweet shell, namely, that this feast or bread is a meaning or memorial of the corpse of Christ, which corpse is given up for us. Now consider, dear Luther, your insolent, uncouth words, überhinschnaußen, waschen, flatter (which I do not actually understand all of) and see who jumps over. You skip this word, which is so clear throughout the whole book, that you do not say a word about the understanding that is gauged from it, but you do not overlook a dirty word. If the same is called wash, flutter, snort over, 1) then see, wedre Part das more thue. Now you have, I hope, bright before the eyes, that one understands that you stand out from Alfan, not, from joyful confidence in the thing. Yes, I alone will take the dry words, and will pass them. 2) For the heretic Arrius also took the thin words, "The Father is greater than I." And yet there is such unity in these words that they cannot be divided. Mark, thou simple one, when I say to my companion, "Saw! he does not know whether I am paying him for a new meal, or where he should eat it in my name, or why I am giving it to him; but as soon as "you lent me" is added, he is already told that it is the six kreuzers that he lent me before for a night meal. So here the words "which is given for you" may not be left behind without our willful misunderstanding; for although they are the more subsequent ones, they nevertheless give the foremost understanding and light.

36) Accordingly you attack us, 4) I say, "is" is taken for "means"; and Ecolampadius says: "My body" means as much as "my body's sign". And you devil and defy that, where we are not armed against the words of God. Grace, [we] would cheaply flee. But we do nothing from the dust; we have been accustomed to break down idols and altars, which you teach that one should have, so that one may learn to kneel with both knees: teaching that one should not worship idols, and teaching in the midst that one should not worship the idols.

that we have just worshipped. What else can it be, neither can it be kept, if it comes to being worshipped again? Do not be angry, I must also agree with you in the middle, because you are so happy, but not so that it is to your shame, but to teach you, along with all those who do not yet recognize the wretched idolatry, blinded by you. Yes, if you attack the matter with many obscene words, this is the sum that you lead there: we wrote such things from distant heads, and then it should be enough. [You] also give such a pitiful example, 5) that I am surprised that such sloppy work comes out of your workshop. Namely, this pretending of ours is the same as if one did not want to believe that the world was created by God, and if one reproached him: God created the heavens and the earth in the beginning, he would say: "God" means a guggler, 6) "created" means eaten 2c. And the rest you say with many loose words. Look here, dear Luther, how much you forget yourself; since you think you are giving an example or a similarity, you are giving a dissimilar and inconsistent one. For perceive, we stand and bring many writings, in which "is" is taken for "means," so you stand alike as a drunken peasant, who also takes up the bagpipe, and lüderlet, 7) but which no measure sees alike. For where does the word "God" appear in the Scriptures, so that it is taken for a "Gugger"? So if you wanted to bring in a crooked thing, you should have indicated that the word "GOD" is also taken for a guggler in the Scriptures, and thus have first made such a crooked thing in another place, since it did not rhyme; but if you cannot do this, then you come in with such a reel. It seems to me that you can neither come out of the matter with equals nor with inequals, for all your parables are inequals. But you come to the last and say: 8) you do not mean to touch Zwingli with examples, nor Ecolampadium, to whom God has given so many gifts, but the mocking devil, who has deceived us. Dear, then write out the devil's unedited parables, with which you do not want to offend us, from this book, and send it to St. Bernard's Mountain, or to hell, so that they do not go around in the world under your name.

37. you also cry out, you want to cling to the simple words (for I will give you all the read your clumsy 1) in the piece zemen, and accordingly give clear answer about it). And as soon as we speak: Now therefore, let him say: "Take, eat, this is my body"; here this little word "this" points to the bread, so the pope is right with the transformation of the substance; for if [that] which he shows is the body of Christ, and he shows the bread, then the bread should be the body of Christ: then thou and thy multitude answer, This is not the sense of the words, but bread remains bread, and in the bread one eats the corpse of Christ; as Mr. Johann Pomeran, your pastor, speaks to you. Do you see that you are the first who does not remain with the simple words? For Christ did not speak: My body is in the bread, or, is eaten in it, or, This is bread and my body, when in some places you also speak out brightly. Behold, how thou dost dwell so prettily on the simple words! Again, if we say, "If it is necessary to keep to the simple words, do not take away from us the word "which is given for you," for it must follow that we eat in all manner and measure the body of Christ which is given for us," then you say, "We are fools, asses' heads, and foolish, and cannot understand that the words should not be so roughly understood. As if the words "which is given for you" in the natural dry way (as you speak) meant anything else, neither the very body that is slain for us. So we must also eat him as he was when he was killed. For when you say that we asses' heads do not understand, we, Lord God, well understand that you would like to understand it in a metaphysical way; but it may not suffer your pretence, since you say that we would like to remain with the simple words; for they bear the simple meaning that the body of Christ is given to be eaten, just as it was given for us in death. But this you deny, yes, all men, because we would have to feel him thus 2c. But here (as I hope) thou feelest a fault in thyself, that thou art unwise in declaring thyself to be willing to abide in the simple words, and abidest not in one thing, according to the simple sense. You cry out that we are mad and do not know it; dear, yes, teach us to know turnips. See how it would be with you now, if we had intended to hail you with evil words, as you do. Yes, you cry out, who does not believe the simple words, God punishes him of falsehood, he is an antichrist, a hypocrite, a murderer, a heretic, a mischievous man, a swindler, a show-off 2c. And do thou never speak of letting them remain in the simple mind, for if they remain in the simple mind throughout the bank, the pope has taught most rightly, eat the body of Christ here, how great and long he was in the manger and on the cross suffering 2c. For the pope can also cry out for it: Do not ask afterwards how it happened, you certainly eat him, even if you do not feel it. Is not everything possible for God? In short, you bring no other reason that the pope did not bring to shield his error. As you have so often told us that we asked God for His omnipotence, because it is well possible for Him; and in the midst of this you say that it does not apply to conclude a possibili ad necessarium, that is, from God's ability to be.

38 Therefore, simple Christian, for Luther may not learn from us that this word "is" in Scripture is taken for "means", we have drawn in many undoubted places, which Luther childishly taunts 4) and tickles some, but may not substantially affect them. For since Gen. 41. says: "The seven fat cows are seven fruitful years; and the seven withered ears are seven hungry years"; and since in both places "are" is taken for "means", they cannot say otherwise, neither it stands there in the interpretation of a dream or face. As if they wanted to take something away from Joseph's speech, because he interprets a dream; nor is the interpretation a perfectly true speech, and now all the more precious that it is an interpretation, which has become so true; nor is "are" taken for "means", they cannot deny, therefore they want to say a lame word about it: It is in an interpretation of a dream. Immediately as that one, to whom one raised, 5) he had eaten thirteen large pieces of fish, he said: Yes, only 6) carps. So their answer is, not that they could deny that "are" here is taken for "mean", but it is written in an interpretation of a dream. It was only carps. Nor did he eat the fish; nor is "are" taken for "mean" here. But with it Gal. 4. stands: "These are the two testaments", for: The things, or sons of Abraham, "signify" the two testaments. They have not yet practiced this. 7) Item, Matth. 11. stands: "He is Elijah", Christ speaks of John, for: That is written of Elijah,

4) In the old edition: pfätzt und kützlet.

5) i.e. interpreted, reproached.

"means" John. We would like to hear here how the opponents would do to us if we would say: we would stay with the simple words, because Christ has said: "If you want to believe it, he is Elijah, who is hereafter. Therefore he must be the right Elijah, Christ has spoken it, therefore he must be it. For God is well pleased that Elijah should be born again of Elizabeth. Want to say something of the παλιγγενεσία or μετεμψυχώσει of the philosophers.

They would undoubtedly cry out: "Behold, what ignorant fools, swarmers, gushers! you know nothing in the Scriptures. In the first chapter of Luke it says: "He shall come before him with the spirit and power of Elias. Here you see that he is called Elijah by the spirit and power with which he was like Elijah, but not essentially Elijah. Answer: But God thanks you for bringing the truth yourself, not willingly, but out of unawareness, namely, that one should not be foolish about the simple letter 1) where there is something in another place that is contrary to it, much less where there are words that may be used to illuminate those that come before it. Still, here the word "is" is not taken for "being," but for "being like" Elijah, or that John is signified by Elijah's name, as Malach. 4. and Matth. 17. is more likely.

39 Item, that we have indicated from 1 Cor. 10: The rock was Christ," Luther storms with such arrogant words that, if he had anything to do with it, no one would think it unreasonable that he thus rages; but if they have no power, he creates as much as if one wanted to storm a strong castle with words. First of all, he makes interpretation into interpretation (I mean, he thinks of the song that God speaks in his mouth as one speaks); if it is done by turning right words into mocking ones, Luther has won far ahead of us, for he knows the art so well that no one will undoubtedly do it to him. But this may not make the matter different in itself, nor change the truth. For the great man does not become small, whether he is called little Hans, or the small man great, if he is called Hans. [Such a theologian should be far from such wanton: superfluous spittle. On the other hand, he charges with an open lug and speaks: 2) Since I should indicate to Mr. Johann Pomeran that "is" in Scripture would be taken for "means", I pretty to sing a song about my suffering. For in the whole booklet there is not one word neither about my suffering nor work. In addition stand in the same Book three places on each other, since "is" is taken for "means". Ex. 12, Matth. 11 and Gal. 4 are drawn beyond the lists 3). Then I get into a delusion that Luther wrote this book solely on the opponents 4) since our books are forbidden to be read, he may lie about us as he pleases. For we are not released from our responsibility, just as a grocer among ignorant people sold goats for lorbs 5) lied a lot about what virtue they had 2c. Thirdly, he twisted my words, as if I had said that Paul said, "The rock means Christ," which is not so, but he said: The rock was Christ, and [now] I have spoken no other word than Paul's, "The rock was Christ," but much more than, "The rock is Christ. For if I had spoken that, it would not have served my purpose; but such things are written, that one might find cause for many words and enchantments, and that the book might grow large, that one might despair of answering it. Now these are the reasons for Luther to turn us around, so that here "to be" is not taken for "to mean. And then he adds: Christ was the real true rock, he was the spiritual rock, and the like; but all this is nothing, because the laborious and weak word fight is as Paul speaks. Therefore, notice that even if we deny all our lives that there is no tropus in the words "the rock was Christ," we get nothing else, neither that Christ was a natural stone 7) or rock; for in short, petra actually means a rock. Just as if one Luc. 15. made Christ out of the fattened calf (because he meant himself by it), he wanted to say: Yes, he is the right calf, which is killed for us; and did not want to give way by the word "right calf", but should not mean anything else to him, neither that Christ is meant by the calf there. Wouldn't that be a peculiar 8) boor? For even though Christ says, "My flesh is truly meat," or, the right certain food; still his flesh and the word food are taken tropically or otherwise, namely, his flesh for his death, and food for the nourishment of the soul. So here, Christ is the right calf, taken for, Christ is the right slain sacrifice, signified by that calf. And there:

"Christ was the right rock", which was signified by the physical rock. For as soon as we recognize that Christ is not a substantial rock, the trope, that is, the other mind, is there from the beginning. But Luther says: "It is well known how Christ is a rock; he is the spiritual rock, for it says before it: 'They all drank from the spiritual rock'; so you can see that he is only called a spiritual rock. But for this reason I give him thanks that he brings back the brat like the fox. So, I hear, the tropical words, 'But the rock was Christ,' must again be opened up and made intelligible by the words that precede them, and it does not behoove me to make a rock out of Christ, but to loose what precedes it. So also go in God's name, dear Luther, and learn to understand the words 'this is my body' through the words that come after; for it is not a matter of whether the words come before or after, through which we see the meaning, so also through all Scripture we must lift up the senses against each other, which are not at the same time with each other. If one says, 'John is Elijah,' [Aas] is a trope; but if one says, 'He is like Elijah,' or means or names under the name Elijah, the speech used is uncovered and made clear. And when Paul says, 'But the rock was Christ,' it is a used speech; and when he says before, 'They all drank of the spiritual rock,' the used speech is made right. So, when we say alone: 'this is my body', it is a trope which we learn to open with the following words: 'which is given for you'. And so we speak: This is a meaning of my corpse, the speech used is uncovered, and still stands stiffly with Augustine: 'the rock was Christ' for: the rock signifies, shows, or means Christ; so that Luther does not think that we want to let ourselves be fooled with the word 'signifies. 1) But this is the most beautiful thing, that Luther forgets himself in the forefathers of his writing, and speaks these words, [in the arc D. 3. at the foremost part, at the 20th line: 2) 'We know almost well that the physical rock signifies Christ, and Christ is therefore a spiritual rock and is called; this they must not teach us: but whether interpretation would be in Paul's words, as Zwingel dreams." See, dear Luther, what a poor man you are. In eighteen words you have placed the word "means" before it yourself and said: you know well that the physical rock means Christ; and after that you charge me to prove that meanings (that I understand by your alphabets) are the same.

The words of Paul are an interpretation. Are you nonsensical, or how has it always been with you that you are not aware of what you are saying in the midst of it?

40 From Genesis 12 we have the words: "It is the Lord's transgression. Which words mean: The feast, or the lamb that was eaten at the feast, means the Lord's transgression. Luther beats out this meaning with a very well-meaning interpretation, and speaks after a whole sum of useless words thus: 3) "For one soon answered, thus: Eat quickly, 4) it is the Lord's Passover. As we say in German: Eat meat, for it is Sunday; drink water, for it is Friday" 2c. Here I ask you, dear Luther, how you please yourself with this likeness? Have you then proved with this simile that "is" does not mean "means"? I think one should present some writing about it, so you present a loose simile, which is just not in use by anyone, and leave all the plots, which is why it is called the Ueberschritt, and mouth over (as you speak), when there are so many excellent places in the aforementioned chapter, which you should not exceed, which all serve the cause. Thirdly, if you call this remembrance by the Hebrew name, and do not translate it to the last, you give it an unpleasant German: "da der HErr in Egypten ging" ("when the Lord went into Egypt"), and if you had never seen the same place all your life, you could not speak of it more contemptuously, that is, more neglectfully. And yet you have translated the word Passover before: to go before you, which I understood according to our German: fürgehen für euch. But here in this book you say, "It is the day when the Lord went into Egypt." Yes, dear Luther, how do you please yourself, that you introduce such a cunning blindness? But we want to show you the reasons of the same chapter, so that you yourself may be ignorant of it, and the simple may know the truth through your fog and darkness.

6) d. i. meal.

the blood shall be a sign unto you in the houses wherein ye are, and [I] shall see the blood, and shall pass over you," or leap over you, "and there shall be no spoiling smiting among you, when I smite Egypt."

(42) Here you see by all the ability of the speech that it is not much talk that you should have translated this feast, Pässah, in Our language as the Ueberschritt; when in fact the cause comes afterward, in which God Himself says that He calls it the Ueberschritt because in the plague of Egypt He will leap over or pass over the Israelites, so that no harm will come to them. So you come and tell us that it is a sinful cause, just as if one said, "Eat meat, because it is Sunday. Who speaks thus? Why do you omit the cause that God Himself speaks? Why do you conceal it? Is this done honestly? Should I, as I am also in [the] pope's right hand, say to the Christians, Eat meat tomorrow, for it is the resurrectio; and not say to it what resurrectio means, namely, the primal states, and that one eats meat for this reason among all men, that Christ rose again on that day; would I not be a great obscurantist? And since I have come to this place, I will also tell you the other things that serve this cause, 43 Thus follows: "And this will be a memorial to you," Tell us, dear Luther, what does this little word "this" mean to us here? Does it mean the feast or the lamb? Yes, it means both together, or each one in particular, Weber's 1) you want, as will come afterward; and it applies immediately that you will put it to us, we juggle, as we want, with the Scriptures. But see that he now says, "And the feast, or lamb, shall be to you for a memorial"; so you learn that it is a memorial of the living transgression that has taken place, and not a transgression, but is called after the essential transgression because it is remembered in this feast or thanksgiving. It is still written: "it is the overcoming", and neither the feast nor the lamb is the overcoming; but a remembrance or meaning of the overcoming; so also our remembrance is called the corpse of Christ, not that it, the feast or bread broken at it, is the corpse of Christ, but that one remembers the corpse of Christ or death at it.

44 Then it continues, "And you will celebrate it as a feast of the Lord. What does it mean? The feast together with the whole act of lambing.

Food and unleavened 2) bread. Now you see that the whole feast is called memorial (are all synecdochae), that this feast is the feast of the Lord. And why do you make so much talk about a church consecration in the last part of your book, because I called it panegyrym, as it is?

that is, a coming together feast. I worry you don't actually know yet what panegyris means, and think that it is only called a day of stuff. If you now tell us about and spit out the nonsense that goes on at church consecrations, do you know that it is a happy gathering of the entire congregation for the glory and thanksgiving of God, or of noble lords, or peoples, or special but great people? Yes, if you know what it means, and thus speak to us, you are well worthy to have the name made greater for you: from Theologo Mataeologus; for it is a courageous intercourse. So we have called it from the words of Paul, not a day of stuff, but panegyrym, that is, community meeting day, which speaks, 1 Cor. 11: "You do not come together for betterment, but for trouble" 2c. and the words more there; and from this place actually and well, yes, to a hundred times in all three languages, seen, and have not gone beyond, although I read of the transgression. Even those who do not yet actually see the thorough custom 3) in Christ's Supper will undoubtedly see that we are not dealing with fools.

45 Thus it follows, "Ye shall eat seven days of unleavened tents," or cakes, or bread 2c. Behold, of the Bread, which was not heblet, was called afterwards the feast also) as afterwards will come.

46. follows "And on the first day there shall be a holy convocation", that is, a general one, at which no one else shall do anything proper, neither to come there; as the feriae, or sacrae epulae, have also been among the Gentiles, by which you see that it has been a holy feast. So also our holy gathering of the saints, that is, believers, should be holy, not become holy with the meal.

047 And it follows, And ye shall keep the unleavened cakes: for I will bring your train out of Egypt at the hour of the day. If you look at the words here, you will see that he calls the feast the unleavened bread or cakes, which he had called Zichron, that is, the remembrance, and Pässah, that is, the passing over. You will also see that all this is done through the synecdocham,

2) i.e. without yeast, unleavened.

3) In the old edition: "after".

So that from one part the whole feast is called, namely, here from the unleavened cakes, which one needs at it, as the apostles also called, Matth. 26: "On the first day of the unleavened bread", which is as much as, on the first day, or on the memorial first day. You will also see that we do not teach out of imprudence that when it says, "and this will be a memorial to you," this little word "this" may indicate the lamb or the whole feast, together with all the action that you speak of here, that the whole sum is also named with one part, namely with the unleavened cakes.

48. Neither shall any man remember, Yea, the commandment is here given of the unleavened bread, and not the feast so called; for the commandment is sufficiently before and after, and so it is here at the feast of the unleavened bread: "For I will bring thy dukes out of Egypt at the hour of the day"; from which we see that the remembrance gives thanks not only because of the transgression, but also because of the performance; wherefore thou, dear Luther, wilt not be surprised that in the words: "This is my body," teach that the little word "this" may extend to the whole feast of remembrance to the sense: This is the remembrance of my body, or meaning; for: The feast or thanksgiving you shall do because I have given my body to death for you. For he says above, "Do this in remembrance of me." Or that this little word "this" refers to the bread or wine, as to the one part and sign of the feast, as is also indicated above (per synecdoche on the meaning: The bread or wine is the memorial or meaning of my body, which is given for you. Or (lest you say we did not remain on one): The bread signifies my body, which is given up for you. Likewise also, the lamb signifies the transgression, which is the very least 1) and most open sense, and to the simple the most intelligible.

49) But soon after this follows: "And the Lord will see the blood on the overdoor, and the two will be provided, 2) and will go over or for" 2c. But by this thou seest how loose is thy dissolute word, "Eat meat, for it is Sunday." For even if this were a cause why one should eat meat, there must still be a special event that happened on Sunday, for the sake of which we admonished to eat meat; and this would also be a remembrance. But if there were no other cause or story behind it, then this speech would give:

- 1) i.e. the lightest.
- 2) d. i. post.

Eat flesh, for it is Sunday, no more cause why I should eat flesh, neither if I say, Eat flesh, for the ass hath eaten the figs. I don't know what your language means by foul language, but if I understand it to mean foul, loose, dissolute, unfruitful, unfounded words, then these words of yours are not only foul language, but also utterly scurrilous.

50 Therefore it follows, And when ye shall come into the land which the LORD shall give you, as he hath spoken, then ye shall keep this service or feast. And if your children shall say unto you: What feast is this unto you? then ye shall say unto them, It is the sacrifice of the transgression unto the LORD, which transgressed the houses of the children of Israel in Egypt, when he smote Egypt, and redeemed our houses." Behold, what brighter thing can be said than this? When your children shall ask, What feast is this? Says not Moses, Eat the lamb, for it is the day of reckoning; but, "It is the sacrifice of the transgression unto the LORD, which passed over the houses of the children of Israel in Egypt." 2c. Why do you, dear Luther, disregard God's word, and do your thoughtless, loose thing? What may you say is such a speech, as if we said: Eat meat, for it is Sunday; if Moses himself teaches here what speech, feast, trade or ceremonial it is?

(51) You deceive throughout the whole book, as we taught without God's word, and do us wrong; for we allow you to show an opinion that we 4) taught without God's word; and not only do you teach here without God's word, but you omit God's word and present your impotent false word. If we were to draw the arrow to you according to your ways, what would we not have the right to say against you? So here we have that the lamb is called a sacrifice, but it was not really a sacrifice, for nothing was offered of it, but it was eaten; for the legs that remained of it and the impurities were burned, but not as a sacrifice; nor is the whole feast called a sacrifice from the beating or killing of the ram, lamb or goat. But from this you first learn, dear Luther, that the whole feast is called a sacrifice or slaughter, only of the one part of the feast; after this we all [learn] against the papists that sacrifice is also called, which is not a sacrifice, as here the feast or lamb; and whether Christ is his

- 3) "deaf" - to make deaf (by much talking). In the althey edition: trübest.
- 4) i.e. crooked, upside down.

If he had called the remembrance a sacrifice, which he by no means did, he would not have wanted more with it, because here, too, sacrifice is taken for remembrance.

52 Thus you, dear Luther, have places enough by which you are overcome that this word "is" is taken for "means," or "is a sign. But if I know that you will cry out aloud, "You see, this is what the enthusiasts do to him; they say they have proved a thing that is not so to him; it is not compulsory that here "is" be taken for "means" or the like, then I say thus: I doubt not that thou wilt be forced, though the truth be in the day: for thou wilt indeed take comfort in another sword, neither in the word of God, but the same shall no longer cut deeper, neither shall he that smiteth above, who also called Abraham kings 1) and delivered Ahab's hand, that he could no more bring it to him. For the sake of the simple, however, I will put everything that is said here about the paschal lamb into a small sum, and show how "is" is taken for "means," and how we take meaning here; thus:

The paschal lamb is first called the "crossing over"; therefore, the crossing over followed after it, and one gives thanks to this lamb for the crossing over that once happened. After that, the feast is called a "memorial", because there one remembered the good deed of God, proven to the children of Israel with their crossing over and carrying it out. Now the lamb could not be mindful, but means that, therefore they should be mindful. Thus "signify" or "be a sign" is not taken by us as you, dear Luther, present to us (per synecdoche): What does the bread signify? 2c., as if we want to say: It signifies something only in the future; but, the supper signifies the death of Christ, which happened before, just as the lamb signifies in the following time the passing over, which had happened before. And when once at the Ascension the idols were taken off, we children asked what this meant? we were told: It meant that Christ had thus gone to heaven; and the nuts, pears, apples, wafers, which were thrown down, meant gifts, of which it is written: "He has given gifts to men. See that "signify" also reaches behind, for: to be a sign, for: to be a memorial; as also tropaea, that is, erected stones, signify about a victory, about a death blow, about an great kind man. Lug now, devout Christian, whether Luther is overcome, and forced that "is" in the speech "it is the transgression" is taken for "means", or "is a sign", or "memory of the transgression", if the text calls it a memory or meaning?

Third, this thanksgiving is also called a "feast" or "gathering" of the whole congregation. And yet it is also called the crossing. From this it can be seen that the words: "It is the passing over" mean: the feast is a memorial of the passing over; or the lamb, which was the most distinguished among the visible things, is a signification or memorial of the passing over. So also the gathering in the supper of Christ is a memorial of the body of Christ; or the bread, which is chiefly carried about therein, signifies and points to the body of Christ which is given for us. Fourth, it is called the Feast of Unleavened Bread; but this comes from a part of this feast, namely, from the unleavened bread used at it. Fifthly, it is called a sacrifice, because the lamb was slain, and yet not sacrificed.

55 Now put the names together: Passover, Feast or Gathering of the Whole Congregation, Remembrance, Feast of Unleavened Bread, and Sacrifice of the Passover; so we see that the Lamb's Supper was nothing else, neither that it signified to the whole congregation gathered together, nor that it represented and showed the Passover that God had shown to their fathers; therefore they gave thanks to God. Now you see whether "It is the transgression" means so much as: "It means the transgression", or so much as: Eat meat, for it is Sunday; and so be wise to whom God pleases. Read, dear devout Christian, the 12th chapter of the 2nd book of Moses yourself with diligence, so you will see whether we do the matter right or not.

(56) There are still some more proofs, which we have not brought up, that therefore "being" is taken for "meaning," but only that we indicated that there are several places, in which the words of the being must not be taken essentially. As: "I am the true vine", there "am" and "vine" are not taken essentially, but: I am like it. "I am the door" can be taken as much: I am like a door or a gate. But if you want to open the tropum in the grapevine or door, take for the grapevine the cloth, ground and fructification, the words of Christ will be thus: I am the right cloth and power, in which all things have power 2c. "I am the door", that is, the true entrance 2c.

1) So put by us instead of: "hear beat", according to Gen. 14, 17.- "erdarret" -- makes wither.

2) i.e. wooden.

Luther lacks childishness when he argues: He is a true right grapevine 2c., and is here no interpretation (as he holtzelg 1) speaks). For although there is no interpretation, there is nevertheless the taking away [metaphora] or being the same, so that the words of the essence may not be taken essentially, but for "being the same". This is also not to be omitted, that Luther counts [Oecolampadius'] interpretation of the words, and mine allways for two different errors, as C. 3. and C. 4. and but C. 4. he speaks thus: 2) "First of all, it is certain that Zwingel and Oecolampad are united in understanding." So I hope, be proven, that this word "is" and others, which are called senses and beings, are taken meaningfully in many places in the Scriptures; but I have only indicated the old places.

Here Luther raises two objections; one is that we are the most confused inference-makers he has ever seen; and the other is that we are more unreported than the children, so if we conclude that "is" is taken for "signifies" in one place in Scripture, it is also taken that way here. And even if we find that "is" is taken for "signifies," we must first prove and make certain that it must be taken in the words "this is my body. The other objection is that it is a devilish thing for us to say that these words cannot be understood in this way because they do not rhyme.

(58) To the first, let us give this answer: That we have shown by all our writings in every way that our opinion is not at all that in these words we want to interpret "is" as "means," that "is" in some place is taken for "means," but since faith and Scripture are against it, that it is taken naturally, these words may not have the meaning. For, as we have said before enough, the Scriptures must be held up against one another, and that which is regarded as repugnant to one another must be unanimously understood by the light of faith and Scripture. If this is done, it is found that even these words may not have the meaning that they present at first sight. And we do not speak at all of the impossibility 3) or clumsiness of the purely human understanding, but rather of the

but from the clear understanding of faith; therefore we have also always spoken with bright words: absurdum esse hunc sensum, etiam fideli intellectui; that is, it does not want to rhyme or fit even to the faithful understanding. That is why you, dear Luther, use so many useless words, when you so often reproach us, as if we alone had said, "It does not rhyme"; and we have always said that it is contrary to faith and the Scriptures, therefore it does not rhyme. Now if the first reproach hangs in the other, I will save it until we answer the other.

59) And say here first, that we have never argued a particulari ad universale; 5) but ye have put it to us all ways, not only without shame, but also without all reason. For who has ever said among us, "is" is taken for "means" in one place, so is it taken so in all places? But you have thus spoken upon us, though lyingly, and thus screwed: 6) Behold, they make such concluding speeches, "is" is taken for "signifies" something in one place, so it must be taken for "signifies" everywhere; so the word of the heavenly Father, this "is" my beloved Son, must mean: this signifies my Son; with other many examples. 7) As you, dear Luther, also do without measure in this book, truly, not without great suspicion, yet manly knows that we have not concluded so foolishly.

60 But now you realize well from where we are forced to this interpretation. But again you conclude, because you ever want to protect all words in which "is" is written, that it is essential that this word says; but this may not be, as enough is heard; for John is not Elijah 2c. But this follows well from the Scriptures, that where a word is taken in a strange sense 8) in one place, and the same word in another place must also have a strange sense; that one may be interpreted by another, even like the other, so that the occasion of faith and unanimity of Scripture may be indicated.

Example: This word "stone" is used in many ways in Scripture; some for material stones; some for hard people, as Ezek. 11 and 36; sth. for the excellent and noble, Klagl. 4; sth. for Christ alone,

1) holdselig (?). (Walch.) Should perhaps read "hutzelig"? Hutzel is a dried apple or pear. That the word contains a rebuke of Luther's mode of expression is clear. Carlstadt calls Luther and his followers "Hutzelprediger". Cf. No. 5 in this volume, Col. 258, § 148.

2) No. 20, R 46, 47.

3) Ungebe perhaps: incapacity? - Unskillful - inconsistency.

4) So put by us instead of: "half".

5) i.e. from the particular to the general.

6) For these statements of Zwingli, compare No. 20, § 47- § 57.

7) d. i. gespieen.

8) Marginal gloss: How to consider the other senses.

1 Pet 2. Which place I now take from the first three. And if I want to interpret the place of Peter, which is Christ alone, I am lacking. Why? The opportunity of faith is not right for this. But if I find one, since stone also means Christ alone, then one becomes clear through the other, and both are equal to each other. As it is written in the 117th [in Hebrew the 118th] Psalm: "The stone, which the builders rejected (understand by the doctrine of men, as the piety did), became a chief stone in the corner"; that teaches us Christ himself, Matth. 21, to be spoken of him. Now if we take these words, which are of one mind, together, and consider the occasion or similitude of faith, they all three become clear through one another, and therefore no one disputes that where stone is written it means Christ. Now consider the occasion and similarity of the two sayings, "This is the transgression" and "This is the body of Christ."

Another example: "water" is also taken in many other ways neither for the material water in the Scriptures. Nor do any see to the meaning of John 3: "Unless one be born again of water and the Holy Spirit," neither that since water is also taken for the grace of God, or the heavenly enlightenment, as Ezek. 36, Jn. 4, 1 Jn. 5, and many other such things. But now the baptizers, that is, those who give too much credit to baptism in the flesh, dispute this and say: John 3 is about water and does not belong to it, because it is about the bodily water of baptism. If we now compare the Scriptures, we find Matth. 3: "He will baptize you in the Holy Spirit and fire. If now "water" is to read John 3 of the bodily water of baptism, then here also fire must be understood of the bodily fire; and do the Indians right (which is not) that they let themselves be drawn with the fire; which also comes from the error that they did not understand what John meant by the fire. Now the place of fire chases us to the place of water, and forces us to make water as well understood differently than fire. 1) Thus we see that water is often taken for the illumination and indulgence of God's grace. And if we consider the words of Christ John 3 correctly, we find that Christ speaks to us through water and wind, so that we must be born again, so that he can make us understand through the bodily 2) spiritual elements that the grace of God is not only in the water but also in the wind.

1) Marginal gloss: So the Scripture compels with open sense, not with the prasmisso.

2) "bodily" put by us instead of: "läblichen".

God or the heavenly knowledge, which alone refreshes the soul, no one accepts, neither to whom the Spirit gives, that he may be sure of the graces 2c. As 3) John, Ep. 1, Cap. 5, says: "There are three that make manifest: the Spirit, the water, and the blood, and the three are one", or with each other.

From this we may learn, dear Luther, that from one place to another it is right to go, and both of their minds are kept in mind, and he who is most conformable to the faith and unity of Scripture is to be chosen. And therefore it is not necessary to say, "This" is called this in the place, yes, it is called this everywhere; as is now indicated by the water and the stone. And he who does not hold this, errs much in the Scriptures. I will also show that this word "a fleshly heart" is not taken to mean anything good in Scripture, neither in Ezek. 2 and 36: "I will take out of your flesh a heart of stone, and will give you a heart of flesh." How do we do it here, since we have no place in which a heart of flesh can be taken for good? Behold, the heart of flesh alone must be measured out by a sincere believing mind, and be taken for good. So it is here also: Although we have no place in which "is" is taken for "means," of which we have no need; but from all Scripture, (the) faith, and the words themselves, it is found that these words, "This is my body, which is given for you," may not be taken essentially; so we have enough of the pointing light of faith, of other Scripture that resists, and of the words themselves.

64) To the other counter accusation, when Luther claims that we denied the bodily corpse of Christ here because it does not rhyme with reason, we give this answer, as we have heard: that we have always said that it does not exist for the believing mind, but rather is contrary to faith and Scripture. If God wills, we will bring this to light here, and speak of faith first, and then of the opposition of Scripture.

(65) To eat the body of Christ in the flesh resists faith. Cause: As man does not live by bread alone, but by every word that comes from God's mouth; so also the soul may not eat anything or make anything sure, neither God's word. But this makes no one secure, neither whom God has drawn with his Spirit (now it must not be written, it is all

3) So set by us instead: Alsdann.

4) i. e. nowhere.

Believers in the pieces well recognized). But whom God's word makes sure, he now has faith, and that is, God's word lived. Now comes the error. If now I want to introduce under the name of faith and say: God's word teaches to believe that which it does not teach, then I miss nothing less, neither those [who] have sold man's teachings for God's teachings, because as soon as I attribute to God's word that it does not hold, then I have overlooked the commandment of Deut. 4 and 12.

Therefore, in order to believe the Word of God, we must have a proper understanding, or else we would believe, even think, that we do not know. Romans 10: "How will they believe him whom they have not heard? how will they hear without a teacher? So it must be that the teacher does not teach otherwise, neither does he know the word of God; or he teaches the doctrine of men, and is numbered among those of whom Paul says in Titus 1: "There are many unskilful men, vain talkers, deceivers of the mind, mostly of the circumcision, whose mouths must be stopped; for they pervert whole sinners, and teach things that ought not to be taught, for the sake of shameful gain." Here we see that Paul indicates that one must have teachers, but we see that the teachers are missing because of the temptation of profit or other temptations of wisdom. Now if those who are taught are not to be presumptuous, 1) they must have so much light as to see which is of God and which is of men. For Christ says, "The sheep know the voice of the shepherd, and go after him: but they go not after a stranger, but flee from him: for they know not the voice of strangers." So there must be a great light in the minds of the hearing sheep, if they are to judge the word of the teacher; as Paul also says in 1 Corinthians 14. The light, however, is nothing other than faith. As Isaiah says, "Unless ye believe, ye shall not understand." Thus it is sufficiently explained that neither the teacher should do more to God's word, neither should he keep it, nor the learner understand more; or else they do not go by faith and spirit, but by their temptations.

67. example: In Hebrews at the eleventh chapter it says: "By faith we understand that the world was made by God's word. Here is enough understood and believed, when I realize that the world is made by God, and believe that. Item, Gen. 1. says: "God has further spoken: There shall be lights in the firmament of the and divide the day and the night. But it is enough that I realize and believe that the sun and moon were created by God. If now I would go to God's word and say, "I will also make the sun and the moon with the word of God, which he himself has spoken; for his word is almighty, he is able to do it," 2c., and say, "Let there be lights in the firmament of heaven," 2c., then let 2) see how much I would like to make the sun and the moon. I should probably want to make light, and would darkness. Why? God has nowhere commanded us to make the sun and the moon, although he has spoken the life-giving word, "Let there be lights," and the lights have been made; yet he has nowhere recommended or promised us that, if we speak the words, there will also be nothing 3). And therefore these are words of a simple history; and are not words, wherein we are commanded to do any thing; or wherein it is promised us, if we speak them, that we also shall make heaven and earth, or sun and moon. And it is equally wrong to speak God's words, 4) which it does not hold, as to withdraw from Him what it is able to do.

68. example in the New Testament. Christ said, "Go ye, preach the gospel," which is a significant word. Again, he made water into wine. If I then shall say the words, The water hath Jesus made into wine; and think that it shall be made wine, the words are able, it is also possible for God: then let no wine be given me, but water, and let me myself be made wine. And Christ saith, When ye are presented, seek not what ye shall speak: for it shall be given you in that hour what ye shall speak. Is a promising word. Now if I would fall from this on a word of command, and say, I will not work, I will not love my neighbor, I will not feed, I will not water the poor 2c. Cause, God has said, he will well instruct what I should say, so he will also well move me to work and other good things; he may well, he has promised 2c., so I have ever erred unchristianly; so I must ever keep difference in faith among the words that are not of one kind. In the words that indicate a true story to me, it is enough to believe that [it] happened that way; and I should by no means believe that I was commanded or promised that I should or might also do that way. In the

1) i.e. injured, contaminated.

2) In the old edition: let.

3) i.e. something.

4) i.e., to impose, to burden.

5) "not" is missing here in the old edition.

In the words of the commandment it is enough to believe that God has spoken it, and that we should do it, and that we know that it is right, if God has commanded it. In the words of the promise, however, we must believe that the promise is from God, that it is good and just, and that it will certainly be fulfilled, as it reads; of which I have written much more against D. Jacob Struß, now only show a brief sample.

69 If you now, dear Luther, take the words: "Take, eat, this is my corpse!" (I do not now want to overestimate you with those: "who is given up for you," which you hold so worthless that you do not speak even one kind word to them throughout the whole book), you see first that the two words "take, eat" are meaning words. Secondly, "This is my body," are words of history or action, and may as little make the body of Christ with your faith or speech, as you may make light, because he said, "Let there be light. And yet this has a better form, "Let there be light"; for this calls to light, but here it is not spoken, "Let my body be made" or "in bread." And if he had spoken in the same way, he would not have promised 1) that when we speak that, the body of Christ would be there. For if God also calls us to offer the other cheeks, we do not do it for that reason. Why? Because he never promised us that we would be so perfect that we would do it. But if we suffer thirst 2) because of righteousness, the kingdom of heaven will be ours; there is a promise about. So we have not yet found that we are 3) promised to make the body of Christ in bread, or of bread; let alone that we are promised that when we speak the words, he will be there; as little as we are promised that we shall make light, and fish, and fowl, and yet God also made them with his word, that is, power.

(70) Hitherto I hope not that any man can say that in the words of the Lord there is neither meaning nor promise, from which we may reasonably believe that the body of Christ is here eaten or made. "Take, eat" are words of good cheer, but they mean no more than they do. "Take" and "eat" may not be taken to mean make the body of Christ. "This is my corpse" are only words of indication and history, when like Christ would have given his body. Nowhere does it say that we make him, or that he is promised to us. So now follow 4) the words: "who is given for you", let us omit for the sake of clarity; for above enough is said of them, that they are strong enough to sustain the whole mind, which we assume. And let us turn to the words: "do this in remembrance of me," and see where the two little words "do this" reach.

The pope with his doings has always taught that these two words: "do this", mean and point to the body of Christ, to the meaning: "do this", that is, make the body of Christ with the words 2c., but this is wrong for two reasons. The first is, that Christ did not signify or signify before to make his body, as is heard; from which it follows, that even the words "do this" may not be sufficient for "make my body," or else the words would come to such a loose sense: Do that which I first commanded you; and if one saw behind him, he would have commanded nothing at all but, "Take, eat"; so we shall ever command nothing else but to eat, and not to make the body of Christ, nor have any word of promise saying that he will come to it by the power of these words, or by God's doing. But you see, dear Luther, that the lack of the promise does not allow us to believe that the body of Christ is there, and so, as you say, 5) we also want to overcome unanimously in the words, even though we have no other Scripture against or beside them.

The other reason is the holy Word of God. The other reason is the holy word of God, which leads us the finger where we should point with the words "do this" 6). 1 Cor. 11 says: "Do this in remembrance of me. For as often as ye shall eat the bread, and drink the drink, ye shall glorify the death of the Lord," or proclaim, "till he come." Lift up thy finger, dear Luther, and see whither "this" reacheth, and whither "thou" doest; and till not unbelieving, but believing. You know well that Paul wants to express here and make clear what these words are capable of: "Do this in remembrance of me!" If thou sayest, "No," then look only at the causa/xxx, enim, that is, at the little word "for"; then thou seest well that the words that follow, "for as often as ye have

4) i.e. the words which now follow, "who is given up for you", we want 2c.

5) Perhaps: "as you suspected"? because Luther did not want to use any other words than the words of institution against his opponents.

6) Marginal gloss: This is the essential reason for understanding the words: Do this.

1) i.e. nowhere.

2) d. i. Pursuit.

3) ienen - any; "ienen" put by us instead of: "those".

eat the bread" 2c. so that the foregoing may be remembered; so that cause and clarity may be given as to why 1) the memory is, and what it is.

Now lift up your finger (do not be angry that I am teaching you so childishly; we must become as children, or else remain out of heaven) and put it on the words: "For as often as you eat the bread and drink the drink. Well, you got it on? Dear, what does the little word "the" in the words mean? Does it mean upon the body of Christ, to bring or make [him] therefore? or does it mean to eat the bread and drink the drink? Can you not deny that it means eating and drinking the bread and drink, when the words publicly read: eia, then only see in God's name that this word "do this" does not extend to "eat my corpse", but to: eat the festive and obligatory bread and drink in remembrance of me. See also, dear Luther, that we learn from Paul's words, in which he points with the little word "this" to the whole feast or to the noble signs, that also in the words: "this is my body" this little word "this" does not point to the bodily body of Christ, but to the feast, which is called the body of Christ; just as we call the birth of Christ and the ascension, but Christ stands and does not ascend; but the feast and remembrance is thus called of that which once happened; or it points to the noble symbols, festive and obligatory signs of wine and bread, that these indicate his body, which was given up for us. For Paul calls it so here, as it is most precious. For it must ever be most precious, since he wants to explain the words: "Do this in remembrance of me", what they are able to do. But there he says, "For as often as ye shall eat the bread," and not, "As often as ye shall eat the body of Christ," 2c.

74 Now it is about the words: "In memory of me". There you say, dear Luther, together with your crowd, that one eats the corpse of Christ here in remembrance of his corpse; but this may not be, as is now well understood from Paul. For he interprets the words "in remembrance of me" with those, "you will praise the death of the Lord," or proclaim, "until he comes." From this we can see that in this festive meal the prize is not "to eat the body of Christ," which should be the noblest thing to do when one eats it in the flesh; but it is primarily indicated here that we should thus celebrate the memorial of the Lord with praising and proclaiming, that is, giving thanks for the death of the Lord. And saith not Paul, As often as ye commit this memorial, so effect the body of the Lord; but, "as often as ye shall eat the bread, and drink the drink, proclaim the death of the Lord." Now there thou seest publicly [that] the proclaiming, that is, the thanksgiving, is the noble thing that is acted upon. The words "until he shall come" are not necessary to be acted upon; they are indicated beforehand enough that they extend to the future of the last judgment.

(75) So you, dear Luther, have not proven with tandmeers: first, that we are not to impose God's words 2) that do not contain them; for that is just as good as being pious, as not hearing God's word at all. It must also be that he who wants to draw from God's word, which it may not suffer, puts his word in the place of God's word, as he who represents his own invented word for God's word; for each is the word of man.

76) Then it is proved to you that these words, "Take, eat, this is my body; do this in remembrance of me," are not words of some promise, but only words of commandment, or words of explanation, and words of narration. And if we look at them actually with those: "who is given for you," and with those: "As often as you eat the bread and drink the drink, you shall proclaim the death of the Lord," 2c., then we see actually that the dry [words] "this is my body" may not have the meaning that you are hoping for at all. And therefore hear that it is contrary to faith that the flesh and blood of Christ are pretended to be eaten here; for God's word does not contain it, nor does it promise anything about it, which is why human, even believing, conscience will never calm down, God granting what is promised to it with precious words: the highly praised tender Corpus Christi will be eaten 2c.; if God's word does not have this, then it is contrary and unpleasant to faith.

And therefore, dear Luther, consider your words, how well they stand, since you thus cry out: "We have God's word, which neither devil nor hell, heretic nor heretic can take from us; there they stand! 2c. Of course we have them, who will take them from you? God's word is almighty, and brings with it that which it pretends. Who will take it away? We have still hard a faith. "And as the words are spoken, the body of Christ is there." Now you are missing. Now we say to it: Dear, so speak: let there be a light! For God has not spoken this word less than that. Say: Yes, he did not say that. Rather, say to the dead: Arise! or to the blind: "See, and make him see; this is what God has commanded. Do this, dear Luther,

2) i.e. impose.

1) this button; for you also have God's promise for the words, which you do not have here at all, Marci 16. And when you will speak: I am not commanded to make light, or heaven and earth; but here I am commanded to eat the body of Christ; thou hast already answered from the word of Paul, that "Do this in remembrance of me" is sufficient: "as often as ye shall eat the bread, and drink the drink, ye shall" 2c. So much of the resistance of faith, which comes from the lack of being able to believe, [that] being in God's word it does not contain.

Now let us prove that it is contrary to the summa of the nature and manner of the Christian faith. "No man cometh unto Christ, except the Father draw him: he therefore that hath heard and learned of the Father cometh unto him. Whosoever therefore trusteth in him (for this is coming unto him) hath everlasting life," yea, is a son of God: "For unto them that receive him hath he given to become the children of God." Now if trust in Him is the summa of salvation, faith does not inquire after bodily food, for what does it serve for conscience? "GOD is a spirit, and those who wish to worship Him must worship Him in spirit and [in] truth." So whoever wants to serve Him should serve Him by faith, not with bodily eating of His flesh. "It is the Spirit that quickeneth," so it must be the Spirit alone that secures our spirit to life. For that we may be sure "that we are sons of God, God has sent His Son's Spirit into our hearts, in whom Spirit we cry out to Him, Father!" It is by the Spirit that we are made sure that we are children of God, which God has put into our hearts; and it is not because we eat His flesh and blood bodily. Christ says, "If I am lifted up from the earth (that is, taken to the cross), I will draw all men to myself." If then faith looks to the death of Christ, and not to the bodily eating, to which nothing is promised, faith does not look to this, but is repulsed by everything that is given to it, because it does not have God's word.

79. Christ has satisfied all things in heaven and earth with the shedding of his blood, not with the eating of his body and blood bodily; for his flesh is only food for the soul, provided it is crucified, John 6: "The food that I will give you is my flesh, for the life of the world," understand killed, not eaten. "The grain, if it die (saith he), it yieldeth much fruit." Killed he is our life, not eaten.

1) d. i. first.

"With his own blood he entered into the holy place and gained eternal salvation," Heb. 9. "For that he died to sin was done once," Rom. 6:10. "He became a curse for us, for it is written, Cursed is everyone who hangs on the tree: Cursed be every one that hangeth on the wood," Gal. 3. Thus he ever put to death the curse that belongs to sin, to which all the testimonies of the New Testament extend. From this it follows, 2) that believing conscience does not find remission of sin in bodily eating, as you, dear Luther, teach from yourself. So also the benefit that you indicate is nothing at all in the bodily meal, since you say that sins are forgiven with it; and faith alone points us to his death, not to the bodily meal and forgiveness of sins.

80. Hebr. 9. Paul says: "Without the shedding of blood there is no remission. Now if the blood of Christ is not shed here, neither is remission of sin made in the bodily drinking of His blood. It is shed only once, and offered up only once, and has put up with sin, shed and offered up alone; so it follows (de primo ad ultimum): if in the bodily eating and drinking of the body and blood of Christ sin is forgiven, that this eating is crucifying and offering up Christ again. 3) Unbutton the button, dear Luther; not with murmuring, as you speak, but show the lack, that it does not have reason in God's word.

81 Peter speaks epistle 1. cap. 2: "Christ bore our sin with his body on the cross," which I hope no Christian doubts. Now if the bodily eating takes away sin, then the bodily eating of his flesh must be a crucifixion of Christ and a sacrifice; for in this way the one sacrifice did not suffice. Resolve this also. In short, faith finds no remission of sin either in the shed blood of Christ. "So he must die, and so come into his glory," Luc. 24.

82. he who gives faith also increases it, Luc. 17: "Lord, increase our faith"; Rom. 5: "The love of God is poured out in our hearts through the Holy Spirit who has been given to us. [Here] you see the love of God being given through God's Spirit, not through bodily eating. Now faith and love are one kind and origin, yes, they are also one thing,

2) Marginal gloss: I. The bodily food does not forgive sin.

3) Marginal gloss: If the bodily meal accepts the "sin", it is a sacrifice: for sin is not accepted without sacrifice.

if you take faith to be the whole transaction of the human heart with God, as we do here. Item 1 John 4: "God is love, and he who abides in love abides in God, and God abides in him." All suffice 1) that thou mayest see, give faith, increase, or be firm in the indwelling Spirit alone; not in the bodily eaten corpse, as thou pretendest without God's word.

But the Comforter, the Holy Spirit, whom the Father will send in my name, he will teach you all things, and make you remember all things that I have said to you," John 14. Here you see, dear Luther, that the Holy Spirit is the Comforter, not the bodily food. For where have we ever been more disconsolate, neither when we thought we were eating the body of Christ? The Comforter, the Spirit, will teach us all things, and bring again to remembrance what we are taught of Christ. From this you see that it is your poem, where you promise that these words: "this is my body", bring the body of Christ with them, and make present that which we believed before alone, as you speak in the sermon Against the Saints 2). For that which we believe and hope here is not given to us bodily here. "We see here only through a mirror and through a blind man, but we shall see face to face. Here alone we prepare the lamps and torches to go to the wedding feast of the Lord, on which we shall eat him, that is, we shall eat him eternally and have joy. Here [that] which we hope for is never given to us in any other way, neither with rest of conscience; which rest is nothing else, neither firm faith; which faith alone is of the drawing and enlightening God, who sends his Spirit into our hearts, through whom we see, to be sure of that which God has promised us. This is the purpose of Heb, the 11th chapter. But the essential joy and delight, which is separate from all sorrow and anxiety, 3) which is written in Romans 8, will only be there. For this reason 4) you are badly lost; for the bodily food does not bring the presence of eternal joy, nor does it bring the joy and security of the conscience that is of faith, as heard before.

84. Rom. 6. Paul thus says: "If we are implanted in the likeness of the death of Christ, then we will also be implanted in the original state." Do you see, dear Luther, that eating the body of Christ bodily does not plant us in the original state, as you teach without the Word of God, nor do you understand the Irish era correctly, but that we have died with Christ. Item, Rom. 8: "If therefore the Spirit that raised up Jesus dwelleth in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your deadly bodies by the Spirit that dwelleth in you." Here I know well what Paul means, namely: "If we have true faith, we also have the divine Spirit, who makes us alive, even though we are dead because of the deeds of our body: nor does it serve our purpose, since we want you to understand that everything that you add to the bodily food is added to the grace or Spirit of God alone by the word of God, so is also the state of the body. But other messages here. Paul says in Phil. 3: "Our dwelling is in heaven, from whence (notice the "from whence") we wait for the Lord Jesus Christ, who will change our vile body, that he may look like the corpse of his glory, by virtue of power, that he himself may subdue all things to him. You see, 6) with what our bodies are made alive again? With the eating of the body of Christ? No; but with the power of Christ, whereby he may subdue all things unto him. Neither do our dead bodies rise from the hour of our death on the third day, like Christ, but remain dead and rotten until the last day. How then are they kept alive by bodily food? Will not Abraham's body also rise? Where Hai he ate the body of Christ bodily? See, what about your poem?

(85) So now, after the brevity that is also contrary to the nature of faith and nature, you have to believe that here the flesh and blood of Christ are eaten. For in short, trusting in Christ brings eternal blessedness; that is God's word. Eating Christ in the flesh takes away sin; increases faith; makes it essential that we believe; fixes the body for the original state, is Luther's word, and may make no conscience sure; for the Spirit of God, who gives faith into our hearts, yes, who is present in our hearts when we believe, as first heard from Romans 8, knows the voice of man well before his voice. But that there be many of them that are true believers, and yet believe that here flesh and blood are made...

and therefore may not err, 1) if faith be just 2) is not; for there is still a lack of many things in faith, first of all of knowledge, as Paul says in 1 Corinthians 13: "We know but in part, yea, we prophets 3) also in part." But what is "in part" is not perfect; and here Paul does not speak of the knowledge of this world, as against that world, as Luther made a gloss; but "in part" means imperfectly, 4) but as one increases daily. Even the early Christians, who had the first fruits of the Spirit, often lacked knowledge. God gives us credit for this, so that the height of revelation does not elevate us too much. But essentially, all our good and rightly done 5) faith stands alone in the things that God's word indicates to us; for if we are right sheep of God, we accept no other voice than that of our Shepherd.

You also see, my dear Luther, how unreasonably you have accused me 6) of saying that no one has ever believed that flesh and blood are eaten here. I myself have never believed it all my life, because I have shown a difference between opinionem et fidem, that is, between imagining and believing. Believing comes only from human appearance and error, but faith comes only from God. We all believed that flesh and blood would be eaten here; this is of human origin, he taught us this out of his lack of understanding; we gave him faith. Do you see now that this faith is only a delusion? For we have left ourselves to the word of man, who has not understood the word of God. Therefore we are also deceived with the delusion, as you are doing today. You let yourself be deceived by your delusion, and you put cowardly leaves in front of it, which grew in paradise, Genesis 3, that is, they are in God's words, but they do not serve that purpose. Yes, God is almighty, his flesh is a holy thing, 2c., is all true; nor does it prove that the corpse of Christ is neither eaten, nor eaten bring the fruits that you seal. And all this is but a delusion. For if the hungry soul wants to feed itself rightly with God's word, it will find here nothing. Another cause I have indicated we learn that it is only a delusion.

We have always fled from this sacrament as often as we have thought of it. And it is not a piece of faith, if one wakes up about it in God's word, 7) that one does not desire to find the truth ever clearer and clearer in it. All of you are still called today by the words: "This is my body"; that one should not seek how the body of Christ is eaten here. 8) Why? Now it was proper for the most holy Mary to ask: "How will it be, because I do not recognize a man? Does God's word have anything in him that cannot be seen without suspicion? No, no. You speak in this way, because out of ignorance you impose a meaning on God's words, 9) which they do not have, and are afraid that if they were actually seen, they would invent your error and iniquity, and therefore you flee behind the word of Paul: "One should not know more, neither belongs to know," and the same word is spoken to you. You write subtle things, yes, real ravings: how Christ is bodily in heaven, and is eaten here with our mouths; and you want to show this with subtlety. Our doctrine is conformed to simple faith and scripture, and yours is the presumption of which Paul testifies.

(88) And now you have the one cause that compelled us not to understand these words, "This is my body," according to the first appearance of the form, namely, faith, which is neither of the heart nor of the doctrine, that is, neither directed by God's Spirit nor by the letter elsewhere, neither on trust in Jesus Christ, true Son of God, which is the whole summa, and perfection of faith. As Paul says in Romans 10: "This is the word (that is, the summa or ground in Hebrew) of faith, which we preach, that if thou shalt with thy mouth confess the Lord Jesus, and be assured in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved." Note here lately that by the original states the whole sum of the life, suffering, death and original states of Jesus Christ 10) is understood.

The other cause is the reproach or resistance of the Scriptures. As enough is indicated, that no scripture should be freely and without sufficient discretion of the opposing scripture are laid down. The first [scripture] is the words themselves, "This is my body which is given for you." For we may not stand together to eat the body of Christ here, and eat it as it is given up for us; and no sealing of words helps. The words are dry and light: "This is my body"; for these are still drier and lighter: "Who is given up for you." But here ye may say much, "Yea, it is not necessary to understand so grossly as to eat him as he is hanged on the cross: ye will make beef of it, and 1) of desolate words without number." Response. I understand that it is now called "desolate"; but if, on the other hand, it is said, "It is not the human custom (for only among anthropophagi, that is, people-eaters) for men to eat one another; much less shall we eat the Son of God: so you may boast and extol how good it is to eat the body of Christ, and what a comfort it is to the soul. And draw all things, if they speak of spiritual meat only in the Scriptures, to bodily meat; thus hear the simple, who are not quick to choose between the meat of the Spirit and the meat of the flesh. And if our doctrine, which is not ours but God's word, extends to this, that one must not seek whether the body of Christ is eaten in the flesh, let alone whether it is eaten as beef, then you come and say: we wanted to make beef out of it; and your error gives place to such desolate words and thoughts. Now you say it is not desolate; and as soon as we also insist on the words, "Who is given for you," then we are desolate 2c. But in short: If it is true that the words are barren, as has been sufficiently indicated, then these are barren for you; if you can find a tropum here in the words: "who is given up for you", 2) which has never been indicated, nor may it be; then let it also remain in the previous words "this is my body".

90. the other scripture is the words of Paul 1 Cor. 11. about the words of Christ: "Do this in remembrance of me! For as often as ye eat the bread, and drink the drink, proclaim or glorify the death of the Lord." In which we see that this little word "this" does not extend to eating flesh and blood, but to the significant and obligatory signs, wine and bread, which are in the supper when he himself speaks, and we have only indicated enough above. After that, the little word "this" here in Paul's words refers to the signs of the supper; so it is already established that it also refers to them in the words "this is my body", or to the whole feast, in the sense: "These signs," or "the feast," "signifies," or "is a memorial of my body."

91. the third scripture is, "the spirit is he that quickeneth; the flesh is not profitable at all," understand, to eat; of which shall come after, according to the length.

The fourth: "For the time being you will see the Son of Man sitting with the righteousness of God and coming with great power.

The fifth: "The Lord Jesus, after he had spoken with them, was received up into heaven, and sitteth with the righteous of God. Of which also shall come afterward, Joh. 16.

The sixth: "I came forth from the Father, and am come into the world; again I leave the world, and go unto the Father."

95. the seventh, John 17: "For now I will not be in the world, but they are in the world" 2c.

(96) I mean, we have enough of the seven testimonies, although we have to refute a perjury. These places, yes, and others more, which are so publicly written, have been the other cause and resistance, which has prevented us from understanding the words "this is my body" according to your sense, and we have looked at the Scriptures everywhere, whether they do not often interpret something else with such a form as the words have. Which you reckon to us as a falsehood, that we have invented a meaning, and accordingly searched in the Scriptures, in order to shield our poem; which we have not done, have also read before; yes, even before you, in Hilario, that such is a falsehood; but we have judged the opposing places equally well, as well as those, because they are nothing less than God's word. And if we look at them from all the grounds of Christian faith, they urge us to believe the Scriptures, 3) not our thought or thought, but that we believe the words as much as those. And it is a work of faith to have diligence to see and understand the Scriptures well, so that the unanimity that is in them, but often does not seem to us because of ignorance, may be well known to us.

97. and after all this, God has sent us the epistle Honii 4) of which you know well [that] it has not brought us into understanding of the matter, as the dear brethren who brought it to us know well, for they had special joy when they heard our sense in the hands; but has given us entrance, to the simple, the words

1) to the right. And though we find many such sayings and words in Scripture, where "is" is taken for "signifies," or the sign is called by the name of which it is the sign, yet there is no place nor example in Scripture that gives us the same 2) understanding of the words of Christ, neither which are spoken in a like feast, having a like form. And on this we also want to prove, by similar occasion and likeness, that we have seen and heard Christ. 3)

First, he says, Luc. 22: "I have desired with great eagerness to eat this paschal lamb with you" 2c. From this we see that he ate the old paschal lamb with them in the last⁴⁾ and memorial meal, also for an eternal laying and last. From this it follows that, since the old feast or memorial was a figure of the new, and He laid down the old and instituted the new, He also used the same words, and spoke the same opinion and form. And this we do not say from an empty harbor; even if it were spoken without any ground of Scripture, nevertheless the analogy, that is, the uniformity of the thing and uniformity of the words, would lead us to understand "this is my body" by the words "this is the transgression."

But Paul, who in 1 Cor. 6. publicly alludes to the Lamb, which signifies Christ, and the unleavened bread, which indicates a Christian life, gives us to understand brightly that we should run to them with the words "this is my body": "this is the passover", that is, the overtaking, since he thus speaks: "Empty out the old lever, 5) that you may be a new dough or natzung, as you are the unleavened bread (but see here in the midst a tropum: We are not unleavened bread; but the unleavened bread signifies that we are to live innocently), "for our passover", that is, overtaking, 6) "Christ, is slain for us." Examine the words actually, dear Luther, so you see by all Pauli's suit, 7) whether we have you to the words of the lamb.

or of the apostles; they are allowed little interpretation.

100 Now follows there: "Therefore let us celebrate the festive" or wedding "supper; not in the old lever (that is, not in impudent unchaste pagan life, against which Paul there contends, and 1 Peter 4 also stands), nor in the lever of wickedness and mischievousness, but with the unsearchable bread of wholeness and truth. Here we see only by Paul's words that we understand the trade of our supper and thanksgiving, in contrast to the supper and thanksgiving of the Old Testament, 8) to be reasonable.

And so [I have] strongly proven to you, dear Luther, that neither faith nor Scripture allows us to have the understanding that you have; and that, in turn, yours is inadequate to the truth, and therefore comes either from denseness and gluttony of the flesh, or from self-correct 9) ignorance.

102) That you want to argue with lapps, 10) that Sarah is as well a virgin as Mary, and Pilate as well an apostle as Peter; as if we thus argue: "is" is taken for "means" in the words of Christ, for it is taken 2c. as well as the cow's doublet; 11) for where does the word "apostle" stand with Pilate in Scripture? But let us see if apostle means anything else, neither a messenger of Christ, nor a reeve in Jerusalem or Syria. Also show where the word virgin is found in Sarah, after she gave birth to Isaac; so let us see if virgin means something else, neither a pure maid. If this is not so, why do you give such examples? For we do not say, "is" is here taken for "means," because "means" is often found in Scripture; but WE show that "is" is taken for "means" in other places also. But you do not indicate that the word virgin is used for Sarah in childbirth, just as it is used for Mary. If YOU now shield so blindly, 12) I am completely persuaded that you are writing this book only to a people who have no other judgment nor attention than what YOU say, do not ask it further, and who do not see our books; as you are honest Xellen 13) because of this and because they do not let our books be read, and then overcome, yes, where your adversaries may not come. Does the truth, then, run behind the stove? I think it may run to the bare flesh. And would come to light, John 3.

103] Accordingly, [you] also throw a gusher, but scold with the truth; you would also not have been allowed the poem with the word meum, my. [I mean, let the whole book be an example; for greater enthusiasm has since Marcion's time, to confuse the two natures in Christ, never come on [the] track, neither thou ledest in this book. Do [you] yet think yourself to have raved so formally, that now you have done it too much good. Thou hast rewarded as good of thyself, 1) that thou shouldst not be silenced or acquired, neither with thyself. But if thou hast done too well, I know no other reward, neither that God give thee the kingdom of heaven.

You also ask Oecolampadium as a huric with the words: Where there, my beautiful love? 2) that I wonder from which old Thaide or Phryne 3) you have learned the chaste little word. Haecce est viri, nedum theologorum omnium suo iudicio principis, gravitas? Sunt pleraque tua, non salibus sed scurrilibus diceris respersa, at istud, eum nobis refert, qui digito scalpit caput uno [in German: Is this the seriousness of a man, let alone one who considers himself the most distinguished of all theologians? . Most of your things are not mixed with witty but with farcical sayings, but this shows you as one who scratches his head with one finger]. But this word suits you very well, neither Oecolampadio. You will speak for and for what you want, but will not find in him; that no pious scolds, is a righteous.

(105) Therefore, you have long been using a great deal of Alfenzian words, but with cleverer speech, as if we were asking out of impudence: what is the use of physical food? if we ask that you base your tandems on God's word. Since we know well that you do not like it, we want to attack you peacefully and amicably. So, you come in: 4) "I wanted to do just such a spearing and coking (don't know what a menester 5) is) against it." "I want to say about God: What is the use of him being a man?" and others.

Pieces more you bring, and with it you coke out and out through the whole book. Notice, then, that we have everywhere what it is good for us poor sinners that God is man. And whichever part of you or others is shown to be able to do this or that, we will believe it when we hear the Scriptures about it. There is no need where there is Scripture, but where there is none, we cannot be satisfied. But you must make such a miserable noise to your ignorant ones, to whom you write, as if we did not care at all about all things that have reasons in the Word of God, but tempered only with our reason.

106. and when you therefore begin to speak of the article: "He sits with the righteousness of God, Father Almighty"; but you accuse us of imagining the sitting of God, that he sits in a choir cap 6) 2c. Thank you for forgiving us of childish harmless thoughts! I thought you would have brought one from the ganea 7) or from the Huppen 8) Butten; but it has come to a choir cap, of which we have never seen one for so long that we have forgotten its form; they are still in use with you, that makes them presentable to you. You will find many who think that you still have a monk's cap on; and they are surprised that you do not have one of these in this example 9) , since the whole book is unflattered by it. Your lying poetry must also strike you a little. The image of Isaiah 6 has not yet slipped our minds: "I saw the Lord sitting on an elevated chair, and the whole house was filled with his majesty, and that which was under him filled the temple. Seraphim stood on it, each of which had six wings: with two wings they covered his face, and with two his feet, and with two they flew"; nor which Ezekiel saw, Cap. 1., and which are depicted or appeared in Apocalypsi and elsewhere, that we may not be allowed to your Hunz-, yes, Chorkappe (would have mier mißgeredet), GOD have praise! Now take it home again, and remember it to yourself.

107. But after that you put us as if we force the righteous hand [of God] into one place, which we do not do at all. For we recognize God's power to be everywhere; God's essence to be the essence of all things; God's presence to preserve and to be for all things. 10) Recognize also the Word Arati, which Paul, Acts 17, indicates: "We are of his generation; we live in him, we move or stir in him" 2c. well. We [know also well that where Christ is, that God is there; and where God is, that also Christ (yes, after the Godhead; there you give the simple one over the eye) is there. But we can see that you are either an evil theologian, if you cannot speak differently 1) of the two natures in Christ JEsu, of the divine and human, according to his own words; or if thou canst, but deceive the simple with the mixture, that thou spreadest out and makest broad the human [nature] after the divine, and compasseth in the divine after the circumscription or delay of the human; then art thou a greater deceiver and denier of Christ than Marcion ever was. I do not want to persuade you too much, but what I say must be superfluous with the true living word of God; but I would rather let it be an ignorance, neither make it a mischievousness. And then nothing else follows, neither that you have boasted lavishly: yes, your teaching must stand all. But if thou wilt persist, and say for and for, that where the Godhead is, there also is the humanity of Jesus Christ essentially and bodily: then we will either bring thee, with God, to deny the whole Scripture of the New Testament, or to fall into the heresy of Marcion; this we actually admit to thee. But we hope better; namely, that you will recognize yourself, and renounce that which you have done out of the heat of contention, and have spoken so clumsily of the humanity of Jesus Christ; for from your teaching it would follow that Christ would be put to death; and such may not follow from our teaching, which speaks with bright distinction of natures.

For (will now give two examples), if this word of Christ John 3: "No one comes to heaven, except he who came down from heaven, the Son of Man, who is in heaven," is to be understood as meaning that Christ would be in heaven bodily after humanity, since he speaks this as you teach: then it must correctly follow that Marcion was right) that he did not have a real body, but only a fictitious one. It follows, then, that he was unpainful; for how could the corpse suffer, which in the bosom of the Father, to the righteousness of the Father, would be a delight and joy to all angels? Where then would be the painful Words: "I thirst!" "My father, my father, how have you forsaken me!"? Shouldn't all this be a loud poem? Or what would Mary have given birth to? What miracle would it be that she would have given birth without human help, and without violation of her virginity, one who would not have had a human corpse, but one who would have been with God in all places, yes, in heaven and hell?

109] Item: Again, the word John 14: "Philip, who sees me, sees also the Father," 2c., 2) the Father must have the face and formation of a man; for Christ not only has the image of a man, but was truly a man; from this it follows, secondly, that the Father also was essentially a man, just as Christ also took on a human nature according to the personal quality; and thirdly, that as the Father is from eternity and into eternity, so also the humanity of Christ must have been from eternity.

And where then would be: "The Word became man"? Joh. Cap. 1. Where is: "But when the fulness of the time was come, God sent his Son, which was of a woman, which was under the law" 2c., Gal. 4? How could he have been of a woman, if he was from eternity (according to your saying), 3) even according to human nature? How could the eternal God be under the law, if the law was not yet? Yes, you will talk with your bunch: 4) The humanity of Christ has been present with GOD from eternity; for all things are present to Him from eternity; or something of this kind, so that you blind the simple ones, whom you now want to make highly educated, and pretend subtle things to them, like the body of Christ was also essential in heaven, when he was in Mary's body, or like we eat him now, but who is sitting in the righteousness of God; and whoever does not want to understand it, you quickly say that he is a foolish donkey's head.

111 Soon, when one wants to compare the Scriptures and see how they agree with each other, you cry out that one should not be wise, but believe the words (which are not understood) simple-mindedly; and there is so much spit and alfalfa, that I am surprised that anyone (except for the

The priest) is so poor and lowly in mind that he does not grasp where woe be unto thee; for he that hath good reason may not of the reproach 1). It is true that the humanity of Jesus Christ has been with God from eternity, yes, by decree and knowledge, taking upon itself the Son of God, but in its own being it has not been until it was conceived and begotten by the Holy Spirit in the eternally pure body of Mary; just as the world and man have been in the knowledge and decree of God from eternity, yet have not been essential to themselves until they are created.

Therefore, dear Luther, or if it is too much for you to learn from us, notice how we teach the simple clearly from God's Word about the two natures in Christ Jesus. And where we teach wrongly, describe us openly.

Of the two natures in Christo and their counterchange (de alloesibus).

The Almighty God, who sent His Son into this world to take on Himself the whole true human, yet sinless nature, has joined the two natures, human and divine, so that each retains its own characteristic and works and suffers according to its own nature. This is what John 2 Cap. 1 teaches us: "And the Word (that is, He who is the eternal Word and Wisdom, spoken of from the beginning) became flesh (that is, man) and lived among us: but we have seen His glory, the glory of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth," or faithfulness. And Paul Phil. 2: "Let not every man seek his own profit among you, but every man his own: and let that be minded among you, which is in Christ JEsu. Who, being in the "form" or likeness "of GOD, neither committing iniquity or robbery, esteeming himself equal with GOD; having emptied himself, and taking upon him the form of a servant, became like unto men, and in walk" or likeness "was found to be a man; having humbled himself, was subject unto death, even the death of the cross." Behold, thou simple one, thus hast thou that he who according to the Godhead is like unto the Father, is also truly man, and was so, that for this cause he suffered death.

114. the two natures are in Christ, so actually that God also retains for them both their nature and characteristic, so that [it] can be seen in the works and bodies of each publicly emfinds. And this is the miracle that God works before our eyes, according to the prophet's legend, Psalm 117 [Hebrew 118]. According to the divine one he has all things in his power, Matth. 28. and Joh. 13. According to the human one he is under the emperor, Luc. 2. According to the divine one he knows all things, Joh. 17. [16.]: "Now we know that you know all things." According to the human he speaks, Marc. 13: "But of the day, time, or hour, no one knows, not the angels in heaven, nor the Son, but the Father alone." After the divine one he performs miraculous signs, John 5: "The works that I do testify that the Father has sent me." Item John 10: "The works that I do in the name (that is, in the power: hebraismus est, nomen pro auctore).

of my Father, which bear witness of me." There: "If you will not believe me, believe the works. All this is to make him understand that the works and miracles he does are of divine power. But according to the human nature, he says John 5: "I can do nothing of myself." According to the divine nature he teaches the words of the one life, Joh. 6. According to the human nature he speaks, Joh. 7: "My teaching is not mine, but His who sent me." And Joh. 5: "If I give an account of myself, my account is not true." According to the divine nature he is with the Father in heaven from eternity to eternity unchallenged and immortal, Joh. 3. According to the human nature he thirsts, hungers, fears, is scourged, put on the cross, dies. And are the two natures, both essential and actual in him, only one Christ JEsus, true God and Mary's Son, born from eternity, with his heavenly Father, without a mother; and in time from the bodily mother, without a bodily father.

The godly teachers have sought examples and parables of these two natures in him. Many of the Greeks drew a red-hot sword 3) there, as also Damascenus; for the same, when it strikes, also burns with it; thus in Christ Jesus also every nature's quality and effect was actually seen; which example you, dear Luther, recognize, that it was taken from them amicably; recognize it, that it was not stolen; and you have used it for an opinion, for which it was not used by the ancients, nor does it actually serve that purpose. Namely, that the bread is also bread and the body of Christ. Here you had to see that in the glowing sword there were two effects.

3) Marginal gloss: k'errum Huiäurn non intelliZunt pro Zlaäio aeoi.

1) i.e. chatting.

burn and hew, and then you would have to indicate the same two effects in the bread that you speak, including the 1) corpse of Christ, with God's word. You indicate many effects, but all without God's word, which are also so that they resist God's word. But this comparison fits well: the glowing 2) means the divine power in Christ; the cutting 2) the human nature.

116. Others have given man as an example of the two natures; as he is composed of body and soul, two disgusting substances, and yet is one man, so God and man are One Christ, that is, Christ is true God and man, and yet the two natures are only One Christ, that is, One Person of the Son of God and Savior of men, and are thus agreed that the Godhead is not turned into mankind, nor mankind into Godhead, but both natures remain completely; just as in man the corpse always remains a corpse, and the soul a soul, not mixed or confused; but the humanity is accepted in unity of the person of the Son of God, just as our corpse, joined to the soul, is one man.

117 Thus Athanasius speaks of it in the Symbola, but it is all learned in the words of Christ: "My soul is sorrowful unto death." Indicates that he had a soul that retained its own nature; for if his Godhead had been a soul to him instead of the soul, as some heretics have wanted to talk about, how could the Godhead have grieved? But if the soul had been turned into the Godhead, how could the soul have mourned? But the soul has kept its own nature and essence (de essentia animae loquor, non de existentia; ne et Neoterici possint offendi), and therefore he says: "I have power to put away my soul from me, and to take it again to myself", Joh. 10. And are therefore not two, but God and man are One Christ.

After all this, when we have learned the unity of two natures in Christ through Scripture and example, we should now also learn from God's Word how to speak of the whole Christ, or of the two natures in Him. Know, therefore, that the figure called alloeosis (may be fairly rendered counterchange) is used innumerable by Christ himself; and is the figure, so far as it serves, an interchange, or

The two natures, which are in one person, as one calls the one and understands the other, or calls that, which they both are, and yet only the one understands.

119. example from the human being. When we speak: Man is nothing but dung, and becomes nothing but dung. Here man, who is called body and soul, is taken for the body alone; he becomes dung and is already dung, for the soul does not become dung, but is an end-sleodis, 3) which lives forever. Item, when one says: Man is like the angels; by the word man alone one understands the soul. Item, with the Hebrews "soul" is often taken for a living body of the cattle, as Gen. 2.

120 Thus, in the Gospel, Christ, who is one God and man, is often taken for the One Nature alone. As when he says, Luc. 24: "Was not Christ therefore to suffer, and so to enter into his glory?" Here Christ is taken for the human nature alone, which might suffer and die, but not the divine. In Gal. 2 Paul says: "Now I no longer live, but Christ lives in me." Here Christ reaches more to the divine nature, because according to it he is in all creatures, is also according to it the life.

121 Secondly, any nature is often taken for itself. As, Matth. 26: "And the Son of Man is betrayed," or given, "that he may be crucified. And Matthew 20: "And the Son of Man is given to the priests and scribes" 2c. Here the Son of Man is actually taken for the human nature, for the same might be given and killed, but the divine by no means not. The divine [nature] in Him is also taken for Himself without a counterchange, as John 1: "And God was the Word!" Here "Word" is taken for the living Son of God, and not for Christ, who was God and man; for John describes Him there from the divine nature. Item, 1 John 1: "We proclaim unto you eternal life, which was with the Father, and hath appeared unto us." Here the word "eternal life" is taken for the living Son of God, who was with the Father before the Incarnation, and thus appeared to us in human nature, as in a harness.

Thirdly, each nature is taken for the other; the divine for the human, and the human for the divine, all through the

1) "The" put by us instead of "the"; for the meaning will be: You should indicate such two effects in the bread, of which you say it is the body of Christ.

2) Glowing --- the glowing; hewing --- the hewing.

3) According to Aristotle, entelechia is a fifth element, from which the soul is said to have originated, the constant activity, striving power, as a form of the human soul. The spelling: endelechia is incorrect.

The opposite, that he who is true God is also true man, and again that he who is true man is also true God; not that therefore the divine nature is the human, nor again that the human is the divine; and nothing less will the natures be confused, nor our ears injured, if we hear such an opposite.

Example John 1: "The Word became man" or: "God became man" is to be understood correctly by the reciprocal, thus: Since God may no longer become anything at all, or else He would be imperfect; then this word may not be understood according to the first appearance, but must have the meaning: Man has become God; thus, that which is said of the Godhead, that it has become man, must be understood of mankind by substitution: Man has become God. Now again, as each nature is turned into the other, as has been heard before, this word: Man has become God, is not to be understood in such a way that human nature is turned into divine nature, but each remains in its own natural essence. As Athanasius also says in the Symbolo: "But Christ is One, not that the divinity should be turned into humanity, but that humanity should be accepted as God." So we well notice that these words: man 1) has become GOD. Again (per metalepsim²), ab adoptionibus transsumta; qui enim cooptatur, filius fit) no longer want neither, man is adopted to the unity of the person of the Son of GOD. And now we come again to the first, that this word: God became man, or: The Word (that is, the divine wisdom, the Son of God) became man, cannot mean anything else, neither, God's Son has taken human nature.

Do you see, dear Luther, how the most profound words concerning the eternal Godhead and true humanity of Jesus Christ must be sent through figures and tropes into the right sense, which is inviolable to faith? Why then will you not allow the tropes, or figurative speeches? Well, argue once: verbum caro factum est, "the Word became man"; the words are dry, it must be: God became man. Thus, ever who was God [before] must now be man. The water has become wine; so without doubt, that was before water, was now man.

1) In the old edition: "The Father", which seems impossible to us (even with Zwingli's metalepsis).

2) Metalepsis is a trope, as the following stands for the preceding.

Being, now wine, and not water; so also he would have to be man now, who was before God, and in addition no longer be God. Yes, if one should rage as you do.

But, devout Christian, do not let yourself be seduced by such folly. 3) They are fighters of words. They are word fighters, whose arrogance is easily broken, if one gets to the bottom of truth, and looks at the right meaning, and keeps the art of figurative speeches and tropes well. As here, I think, are probably more theurer words: "The Word became man," nor "Eat, this is my body"; nor must they be understood by figurative explanation alone, or else we would get into the greatest heresies that have ever been. And do not therefore the sayings hurt us: God became man; or: Man became God; but we must not understand them at first sight, but add the figures of the sayings as a measure, and thus understand them: God became man; God took human nature; man became God (nam et hic sermo saepe apud veteres theologos invenitur), human nature was assumed by God.

But before I leave this place, God became man, I must do one more thing with you, dear Luther. With your lack of understanding you lead yourself to the point that you cannot speak according to the theology of Christ as he himself used it, that you want to prove by force that the body of Christ is everywhere, as well as his divinity; and therefore you do violence to all the sayings that you bring in, which will come afterward. But here I ask thee thus: Is Christ's body everywhere, because he is made anew infinite; or because he is changed into the divine nature, which is infinite, immeasurable, and incomprehensible? For you must deny one of the two, since everything that exists must either be made anew, or be made of another. Only God can make from scratch without matter; the shoemaker can also make from matter. If Christ mankind is made anew infinitely; Dear! then say, if two infinite things may be? For, if two may be, the first must not have been infinite, or else, it might not have permitted the following; for that which is full before may not permit any more, and that which fills all things may not permit another, which also fills all things, for they are full before.

3) In the old edition: "Täuberey. That we have resolved this word correctly is evident from the preceding "Toben", then also from the marginal gloss to § 106 of this writing, where "Taubucht" stood for "Tobsucht".

From this it follows that not more than one thing can be infinite, immeasurable; that is the one Godhead. It also follows that the same infinite good must be eternal; for who would have given it the beginning? If there were another, then it would have to be the immeasurable good and the beginning of all things, and would not be what follows or what is made; but 1) from this it follows that everything that is made may not be infinite, that is, unmeasured, incomprehensible, infinitum, 2). Therefore infinite, incomprehensible, unmeasured, as also the theologi say, intrinsecus modus divinitatis, is the right inner quality of the Godhead. From this it follows that only One can be infinite good, and that is the only God. It also follows that Christ mankind may not be made infinite anew, for there must be only One infinite, which must also be from eternity to eternity.

But if you say, Now Christ is God Himself, why should He not be everywhere? as you do, but you are deceiving the simple. 3) God's right hand is everywhere; Christ is at the right hand of God: so also is the body of Christ everywhere. See how beautifully you close! 4) Who has taught thee so beautifully to discern between the two natures of Christ? that thou wilt, with so false a semblance, in the sight of the simple, introduce into the human nature that which is also of the divine, yea, of the divine alone? When you say: God's right hand, power, majesty and authority are everywhere, you are right, even though you think that we foolish heads have never known this. Ah! who is so childish in the holy scriptures that does not know this? Are these not the first beginnings, so one (τὸ θεῖον, numen) wants to learn to know God? Dear! examine our Commentary before you, and see whether we knew it or not. But it is one of your pieces. You have written the book only for the sake of the foolishness, otherwise you would have made it in Latin, in which language we used to have eight or even more writings (so that it would be inviolable). You would have to dazzle them, your foolish ones, along with the popes; just as the tile people, who can't quite stand the name-calling, submit to the village church consecrations and markets, their insignificant antics do enough for the simple-minded.

We are returning to the first thing. You speak rightly, God's right hand is everywhere. But when you say that Christ is at the right hand of God, you speak rightly; for he is at the right hand according to divine and human nature, but not uniformly. For according to divine nature he is at the right hand from eternity to eternity, so that he is everywhere where God is, for he is God himself, and is not only at the right hand by nature, but is the right hand itself. As well as the theologians from the right hand of God, well and rightly, make the Son of God in many places of Scripture per allegoriam. But mankind is not at the right hand of God, because it is not the divine nature, it is also not the right hand itself.

(130) Now behold how you so subtly deceive the simple! If you say, "Christ is at the right hand of God," you do not make a distinction, 6) as to how he is at the right hand according to divine nature and how he is at the right hand according to human nature; but you draw your conclusion on humanity alone, and place on it that in the saying, "Christ is at the right hand," it may be understood to refer to the Godhead alone. For if thou sayest, Is not Christ at the right hand of God? I will say: Yes, he is there; but he is not there equally to both natures; for to the divine half he is there, as the equal, eternal, unstruck God, who is everywhere, sustains all things, is and gives life to all things; but according to humanity he is there, as with the recently assumed nature, which may not be from eternity; or else there would be two infinita, that is, two natures, which would be uncaptured, but that may not be, because they are not three divine ones, of which it is unity to be everywhere.

(131) If then you must understand the inner capacity of the speech "Christ is at the right hand of God," why do you refer in the resolution to mankind alone, but which in the previous speech is understood only of the Godhead? For "Christ is thus at the right hand, that he may be everywhere" must be understood of the divine nature alone. Or what art teaches thee to speak in the conclusion: So is the body of Christ everywhere? If Christ understands the two natures, you should not have said thus: So is Christ everywhere, and not: So is mankind or corpse everywhere. Do you see how you are not ashamed to make false shillogismos? That's where you get it from, you can make jokes, but not subtly, and that's why [you] show off at the village church consecration, beseflest 7) those who listen. Here-if you would tell me about the noble question: Whether Christ was made infinite anew? Yes, he is infinite; as you also do, but more untruthfully than any theologian has ever done: so you speak falsely, and should judge in the words that I ask only on human nature, if I even call Christ, and speak: Is Christ made infinite? For it is not necessary to ask about the Godhead, since we all know that he is incomprehensible, immeasurable, infinite and unbegotten from eternity to eternity. Nevertheless, it must be shown to you, otherwise you would think that they are all roses, on which you tread, and could walk in lusts.

Now let us return to our question. If now it turns out that Christ mankind may not be made infinita, that is, infinite or immeasurable, and you say that it is immeasurable: then it would have to be that it would be transformed into the infinite Godhead; but that may not be. To one that God is an immutable good, therefore it may not be turned into other things, nor other things into it. 4 Mos. cap. 23: "God is not like man, that he should lie; nor like the son of man, that he should be changed." Malach. 3: "I am the LORD, which am not changed." And if the human nature be changed into the divine, [would] ever be change and innovation. On the other hand, it may not be; for if the humanity of JEsu Christ [had been] turned into the divine nature, he would not have suffered, for the divine nature may not suffer, Apost. 2 Therefore it stubbornly remains with the old right theology, that the two natures are not mixed in Christ, so that the divine becomes the human, or again the human the divine, but that each nature remains in its essence and nature, and yet both are only One Christ, Son of God and Son of Mary. So now your error falls away, since you teach anew that the humanity of Jesus Christ or his corpse is everywhere, like the divinity.

133) Now you have an answer to your words, 1) Luther: "It is our faith, as Scripture teaches us, that our Lord Jesus Christ is an essential, natural, true God, and that the Godhead dwells in him completely bodily, as St. Paul says in Col. 2, so that apart from Christ there is no God or Godhead"; 2) this is what your words are. But with these you assume three dishonest, false things: the first, that you

You speak in the same way, jumping from one nature in Christ to the other, like a monkey that jumps into the kensserlein and onto the pole, as it pleases; as if one should not notice which of the divine nature and which of the human nature is to be understood. And you do not need the counterchange, like Christ, who, while he calls one nature and wants the other to be understood, does not want to say anything about the human nature that is only divine, nor about the divine nature that is only human; 3) as bright will come later. The other is, that thou wilt by words comprehend and end the Godhead according to mankind, 4) when thou sayest, Outside of Christ there is badly no God nor Godhead; for by words thou speakest rightly, when thou wilt by Christ alone understand the divine nature per heterosim or alloeosim, that is, by the counterchange. For Christ Himself, true God, can be nothing at all outside of Himself, nor can anything be outside of His God; but you want to be understood by Alfanx as if the Godhead according to its nature were contained in Christ, that is, in His humanity. From this then the third error may follow, namely, that you want to extend the humanity of Christ, 5) in which the Godhead is whole, so that it is as wide and infinite as the Godhead.

And so you do two very dishonorable, falsifying, harmful things of the whole holy scripture, that for the sake of your quarrel you want to circumscribe the divine nature with the humanity of Jesus Christ, and say: Outside of Christ there is neither God nor Godhead; yet you secretly want to understand His humanity through Christ; and God, even outside of the humanity of Christ, is in all creatures and was so before Christ became man. And secondly, you hope, when you have thus comprehended and aimed the Godhead in the humanity of Christ, that after this, according to the infinity of the Godhead, you will drive out and extend the humanity, so that it will be the same everywhere.

Dear, don't you know what it means to swarm, to swarm, to swarm? This is what I have to do with you, that you learn to speak without measure of the two natures in Christ; for if you can do it right, and lead such a raving, then not only is the devil, as you speak to us, but also the she-devil is with you. But, as reported before, I would rather make it an ignorance for you.

But be wise, and let yourself be taught, and know the error of your ways.

Now we return again to the mosses, or alternate speeches. First we heard how we must understand the word: "The Word", or God's Son, "became man. Now he speaks John 5: "I may do nothing of myself." Here "I" and "of myself" do not apply to both natures in Christ, but only to the human nature; to which he says that it does nothing at all for itself, nor can it do anything, but "what the Father is called" (here the Father is also taken for the Godhead by the counterchange), that he does. Behold, so much Christ's mouth itself extracts from his humanity; and thou, dear Luther, goest to it, and puttest it in all rule, power, to be, to be able, and to do, which after all is of the Godhead alone?

137 John 7 says: "My doctrine is not mine. How could his teaching not be his? It was his, as the Son of God; not his, as man's. The Jews regarded him as a mere man, and therefore rejected his teaching; so he says: his teaching is not his; understand, it would not be his humanity. Behold, he hath taken away the power of his mankind, and here the doctrine; and thou givest it all to them, against his own word.

John 12: "If I am lifted up from the earth, I will draw all men to myself. Here "if I be lifted up" is spoken of human nature alone, for he alone may die according to it. And "I will draw all men unto me" is understood of the Godhead alone, for according to it he draws the hearts into knowledge and gives them faith. So "I" stands in both places, as if it were to be understood of both natures, but each extends to the one nature by the counterchange; and it does not hurt us that he says, "If I am exalted," as if the Godhead were crucified, but we see in all his words from the beginning which extends to the divine nature and which to the human nature.

139. John 3 says: "No one comes to heaven except the one who came from heaven, the Son of Man, who is in heaven. And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, so must the Son of man be lifted up," that is, crucified 2c. Here we have the Son of Man: in either 1) place for the two natures in Christ,

1) "zwürent" - twice; "twederem" - neither.

but in one for the divine, in the other for the human. When he says, "Without the Son of man, who is in heaven," the Son of man is taken for the divine nature in him, for he was not then in heaven bodily after the human. But when he says, "So must the Son of man be exalted," the Son of man alone is taken for the human nature. Which, dear Luther, if you do not realize, you will fall into two great [openly] bearish errors, through which you, not we, would forcibly introduce the Marcionian heresy, if it were left to you.

For one thing, you say: 2) Now, according to the divine nature, he may neither ascend nor descend; therefore, this place will be understood by his humanity. And in doing so, you are describing Oecolampadium, whom you, nor all those who act against him, are not half like in Christian discipline and doctrine; and you are worthy of the highest help, because you do not understand the ethopoeia 3) of Christ's words, and you rage in front of the ignorant in such a harmful way that not enough can be said.

Therefore notice, you pious simpleton: It is a kind of speech, called ἠθοποιία, ethopoeia, that is, common morality poetry: and is used when one imputes a morality to someone, which he does not have by nature; but the same morality is common among those, before whom one presents the same morality poetry, for the sake of understanding. And there is a great deal of this in the Scriptures, for in them we impute customs to God that are customary and known to us, but are not so customary with him, but give us some understanding of his clarity, majesty, or action.

142. example. We have indicated before how the prophets have seen visions and appearances of God sitting in heaven, as Luther suspected us of Mr. Tillman's 4) chorus cap, which is a morality poem, for otherwise neither God nor His chair has never been seen by anyone 2c. Joh. 1.

143 Another. In the first book of Kings, at 22, a custom that kings and lords have of sending and acting in the counsel of messengers is attributed to God, as he counseled with his angels to disturb Ahab; but God has no need of the counsel of angels, but all things are eternally present to his knowledge, all things are obedient to his power and ability.

2) Compare No. 20, U122 and 123.

3) 'U-Son-otta, depiction of customs and character.

4) Till Eulenspiegel (?).

Still such pre-paintings of the sealing of the customs benefit our small mind.

144 Another. In Genesis, in the first chapter, God devises to create man with such words: "Let us make man in our likeness and image", but God does not need long deliberation nor consideration; nor does he devise in the Scriptures, as it were, a great bountiful good Lord.

So also this is a moral poetry, since he says: "The Son of Man came from heaven", for: The Son of God came from heaven; and John 16: "I came forth from the Father, and am come into the world" 2c. Not to press the words to the effect that the Son of God has left the Father, or has diminished Himself; for He is the eternal God, who must be everywhere, and cannot be diminished; but that, speaking after our manner, He has made His action clear and well known to us. And again thus: "He came from heaven", and: "I came forth from the Father", spoken according to human manners, for: He took on Himself human nature on earth 2c.

146 Which moral seal Paul needs even more crudely from Christ, Phil. 2: "He poured Himself out", or emptied Himself. How can God empty himself? But he imputed to him the manners of pious kings and lords who put their majesty aside and come to the aid of the needy. When the great Alexander departed from the fire in a great frost, and put an old honest man of war in his place, that was emptying himself. So here "empty" is taken for "graciously come to the aid" of the poor meager race of men; for He may not ours.

147 Behold, how it shall befall you by and by, that ye know not the figures and the tropes, and then with such ignorance ye preach, and deceive the simple.

148) For the other, you say immediately this word) Luther: "So that" (by the words, the Son of Man, who is in heaven) "he shows that his body is in heaven and on earth at the same time, yes, already ready at all ends. So you want to show that his body was here on earth and also in heaven; so he is also everywhere.

I ask you this: What was the condition of Christ's body here on earth when he spoke these words? Did he not suffer thirst? Yes. John, chapter 4. Tell me, my dear, whether he also thirsted, hungered, and was glad in heaven? 2c. And since he feared death, did he also fear it in heaven?

1) No. 20, § 122.

and when he wept over Jerusalem on earth, did he also weep in heaven? You cry out: "Enthusiast, enthusiast! It is not answered for, as soon as thou art lost, that thou canst not answer, that thou wilt do it all with the reproach of the swarms; for if that were so, then would a scapegoat 2) now have one foot in the bucket, and overcome thee and all the swarms with all the Scriptures. Answer: whether the body of Christ is in heaven as it is here? Are you silent? Stop! Add this also: Was not the body born of Mary of flesh, bone, veins, skin, marrow, nerves, nails, hair, teeth? 2c. I mean: Yes. So tell, dear Luther, whether he would be the same in heaven? If he was, who gave him food up there, or who trimmed his nails and hair? And only when he was crucified. Who crucified him in the heavens? And when he rose from the dead with his body clarified, did he also rise from the dead? And when he went with the disciples to Emmaus and interpreted the Scriptures. Tell me, did he also go to Emmaus and teach the two disciples?

150 Here, I know, you will say: O you shameful mockers! O you miserable mocking devil! And our intention is not at all to mock, but only to make you understand your error. Sayest thou: As he is in heaven, he has no need of the things that require bodily need, or that are wrought in the flesh. I answer, I know this well, now after the primal state and the ascension. But I am talking about the state when his body was not yet explained here 3) before death. You will have to say that you are also talking about the same; for you use the words: "The Son of Man, who is in heaven," to mean that he was also bodily in heaven before all explanation.

151) Do you say: Yes, just then he was in heaven, and had none of the defects or troubles 4) up there; then I cry out to you: Resist, resist! Luther, resist! Marcion wants you in the garden. For if his corpse in heaven has been unleavened, then he has also been unleavened here; and then Marcion is right: he has had a dense 5) unleavened corpse, Responde. Or

If you want to say: The corpse, which was sufferable here, but not above, it must have had two corpses. For, in short, his corpse, which was only one, must have had only one kind. 1) If in heaven he is unpleasant, as you will undoubtedly speak, then he must also be unpleasant here; then welcome to God, Marcion and Marcionin! But if he is suffering here, as we say from God's word (hope you also), he must also be suffering in heaven. Or thirdly, [he must have] two bodies; one on earth, suffering, and the other in heaven, not suffering. Tell us, then, whether Mary also gave birth to the one above, or how he came to be here? What does it matter that we are impotent enthusiasts?

I have had to point out so many inconsistencies to you, dear Luther, which come from your misunderstanding, so that you can see where one comes to when he only wants to act against the evil enthusiasts with a polite little lie. Into which you would certainly not fall if you could walk in the Scriptures according to the custom of all scholars who have ever been. For even the papal doctors have never fallen into the grave error of putting Christ's body bodily up into heaven, since he had not yet risen from the dead and ascended to heaven; But they called this kind of speech, where one is called nature and the other is understood, communicationem idiomatum, that is, the communion of attributes, since that which is proper to one nature is also imparted to the other, which we have called, according to rhetoric, the antitype of natures. As here "Son of man" is taken for the divine nature in him, and has the sense: No one comes to heaven without him who came down from heaven; that is: without him who on earth took human nature to himself; that is, he whom one esteems a son of man alone (ut sit mimesis quoque in alloeoisi [d. i. so that also in the alloeoisis is a figurative expression]), but who is also a Son of God, who is in heaven above, and has never left him according to the divine nature. So understand this place Augustine, who speaks thus: He was here of the corpse or flesh half, and was in heaven according to the Godhead, yes, half of the Godhead everywhere, and Cyrillus, who speaks with many words equally of the two natures, as we have shown before also from God's word, and Chrysostom, and all who have ever diligently looked at the contrast of both natures.

153 John 14 says: "The Father is more" or greater "neither I." Here "I" is referred to the human nature alone; according to this he is inferior, and according to the divine equal to the Father. Athanasius in verse 2) of the Faith: "He is equal to the Father according to the divinity; and inferior to the Father according to the humanity." I only indicate that Luther learns to know himself, that he speaks of the two natures in Christ in a new way, 3) against all fathers, even papal teachers, contrary to God's Word's ability; that is where the quarrel brings him. He may also learn here that he is mistaken, if he gives Christ's humanity equal authority with the Father; for according to that he is neither the Father, although we know that God and man are One Christ, and the speeches do not hurt us: "Christ is rich, 4) Christ is equal with the Father"; for they are divine and true, but only half of the divine nature; neither do they injure us because the two natures are joined together with the highest unity in Christ, and with the highest wonder each retains its quality and nature.

154. John 10 says: "That you may believe that the Father is in me, and I in the Father. Here "in me" and "I" refer only to the divine nature in Him, according to which He is in the Father according to His inner being, and the Father in Him from eternity. Not that Christ's humanity is excluded from the Godhead, but that it is One Christ with and with Him; but by that Christ is in the Father according to the Godhead, and the Father in Him, the humanity is One Christ with the Godhead, thus that His Godhead is the essential thing by which His humanity has come to the Father.

155. Joh. 12. he says: "Father, deliver me from the hour". Here "me" is taken to mean human nature alone, for according to divine nature he was not allowed a redeemer. This indicates the weakness of human nature, which would not have been able to speak truly, even if it had been essential in heaven; or else, if he himself had been like him above and here, he would have had to be fearful there, as he was here, or else there would have had to have been two corpses. All this is not only heretical, but also foolish, as it is shown above.

Matth. 26. He says: "You will have the poor with you everywhere, but you will not have me everywhere. Here "you will not have me everywhere" refers only to human nature. Here you will no doubt cry out once:

2) i. Confession.

3) Marginal gloss: Luther's teaching is in the case against Christ and all who have ever taught right.

4) reichsnet - governed (?).

So you say that it should be understood in human terms alone, but not in this way; you must force it to be understood in this way. Well then, if you do not have peace because of friendly teaching, we also want to force you. Tell me, may God not be in one place? 1) I mean, no. I mean, no; but it is his inward attribute to be everywhere. Why then does Christ say, "we shall not have him everywhere"? If he is not God, we have good reason to believe that we shall not have him everywhere; but if he is true and undoubted God, it is not possible that he should not be with us everywhere. But set against this his true word, "Me ye shall not have universally"; and tell me, whether thou wilt understand the word to mean the whole one Christ, or the Godhead alone, or mankind alone? If you want to apply it half to the one Christ of both natures, then you are taking it from us according to divine and human nature. Who then will establish your faith, and feed your corpse to the original state, 2c. which you attribute to bodily food? But wilt thou understand it in the divine, that we shall not have it? we enthusiasts 2) leave thee by no means; for we have his word of promise, saying, Perceive, I will be with you unto the end of the world.

157 So you are now, I hope, forced that these words extend to human nature, that we will not have them with us in the flesh all the time. But I doubt, you will say like Faber, Egg 3) and the miracle animals: one should understand the words now thus: You will not see me everywhere; I will be with you everywhere, but you will not see me. Answer: You want to put glasses on Oecolampadio, but you don't need them; but you need them very much, because you don't see that it says "have", not "see". You think it says, "You will not see me all the time"; so it says, "You will not have me all the time." Yes, we understand by "have" "see." Thank you, dear Luther! So I hear, the words no longer have to be dry, nor do they mean that their nature is? If you do not want to be forced, then he will force you who forced that [possessed] one to run in the caves and tear all things. Luc. 8.

158. in the 16th chapter of John he says: "I tell you the truth, it is useful for you that I go away (understand to the one who sent him), because if I would not go away, the Comforter will not come to you; but if I go away, I will send him." Here it cannot be good that he should leave us after the Godhead, or that he should go away from us; therefore the word, "It is profitable for you that I should go away," must be understood as referring only to the humanity of Christ. On the other hand, the Comforter would not be sent if he remained bodily. 4) So it must be that he is not here in the flesh, nor eaten, since we feel the divine consolation in our hearts; for the Spirit would not have come if he had remained in the flesh. But you see that the consolation comes from the spirit, not from bodily eating, indeed, the spirit does not come, because the corpse is bodily present. Dear Luther, remind yourself of this word: "If I do not go, the Comforter will not come," and boast of your faith accordingly, if you wish.

159. There he says: "Again I leave the world and go to the Father. He does not say, 'Again I remain in the world, but invisibly;'" but "I leave the world. Which is a word of the one who goes and leaves behind him; and may not be sufficient, neither to some mankind.

In the 24th chapter of St. Matthew, he says: "If anyone should say to you, 'Behold, here is the Christ,' or, 'It is not so,' you must not believe it. For false Christs and false prophets shall arise, and shall shew great signs and wonders; so that, if it were possible, they shall deceive even the elect. Take heed, I say unto you." Here you speak: Christ does not speak here of the sects and the masters of the sects. Answer: Yes, you seek escape, you also give God's word the understanding it does not have by nature. Although I do not reproach [that] the sectarian error may also be denied here; but not that [such] is the noble sense. For the noble meaning is: it will come to such a misery for the Jewish people that they would like to have Christ only one day, as Luc. 17 is clearly understood; but he may not become theirs. Then 5) Some will be prophets of Christ, but where Christ is shown to them in the inner chamber, or in the field and wilderness, they shall not believe, nor go out. "For as the lightning ariseth from the going forth even unto the coming down, so shall the future of the Son of man be." Do you see that he speaks of the future See also that before this he speaks of himself, saying that where he is shown, let no man go, and there are false prophets who will show him here or there. Go now, take this rod, and measure thyself, whether thou be a false prophet or not, if thou show him not only bodily in the bread, but also admit that the body eaten bodily lie; 1) which is now proved manifold to be the work of the Spirit alone.

161. to this belongs that he speaks Matth. 26: "But I say to you: For the time being you will see the Son of Man seated with the righteous of God's power." (See here, dear Luther, that we are not allowed to have many foreign teachers who taught us the righteous hand of God to be His power; so Christ Himself gives us here an exposition of the righteous of the power of God; as if He said: "The righteous", understand "the power of God"). Behold, behold, dear Luther, where he is! Do [you] know where the word "forhin" reaches? Without doubt to the time that is after his death and ascension until the end of the world. Seek him bodily elsewhere, and show him not elsewhere, or else thou shalt come in the number of false prophets. Consider now how well it may behoove thee to say, Christ hath given himself bodily to be eaten in this sacrament, that we may know where to find him. Dear, why do you show him, since he does not show himself, and since he has shown himself, you say nothing about it? I can almost guess that his word is no more pleasing to you than it was yesterday. Dear, let us recognize (that is, see) that he is above! I do not believe that he deceives us: he himself showed us where he was, and Stephen also saw him there. For when you say, "He was not allowed to lift up his eyes, but he saw him in his mind," you are speaking out of a forgetfulness of Scripture: for it is written in the 7th chapter of the Acts of the Apostles, "But Stephen, full of the Holy Ghost, looked diligently up into heaven." We also know well what he saw in his heart before he appeared to him; nor did he see with his bodily eyes the vision that God opened to comfort him. Therefore I urge you to leave him up there, and show him there, when he has shown himself.

162. John [in the] 17th chapter he speaks thus: "For the time being I will not be in the world; 2) but they (understand, the disciples) are in the world." But here you see clearly that he does not say, "I will be with you invisibly for the time being, but still bodily;

but: "I will be no more in the world for the time being". How can he speak more theologically, and how can it be understood differently, neither from his corpse? If we had no other word, neither this some, would you, dear Luther, oppose it? What castle can [thou] give him? Do you not see that he rejects his humanity, that he will not be here, in that he speaks above of [the] disciples, "but they are in the world." Now they were indeed bodily in it; so he must not be bodily in it nor according to human nature, because it is antithesis.

Soon after that he says: "Father, when I was with them, I kept them in your name" 2c. "But now I come to you" 2c. Dear Luther, when have you heard enough proclamations from Christ's own mouth alone? Or do you want to reject all of them with cross? If you see that neither faith nor Scripture can suffer that he is here in the flesh, let alone that one would want to eat him only if he were here? Yea, [thou] speakest much, how we ought to esteem it so delicious, that he hath given himself to us for meat. Yes, if we had to eat human flesh in the custom, as is said of Scythians and Anthropophagi (people eaters). Therefore also we are not Capernaïtes, if we will not eat him, but disciples of Christ, who said, 3) "We believe that thou art the Son of the living God." But you are like them, because you want to understand his words, which are only significant, carnally, as they counsel.

164 One more customer, and we will add up the total. Apost. 1: "As the disciples watched him diligently going up to heaven, behold, there stood by them two men clothed in white, which said also unto them: Ye Galilean men, what stand ye gazing into heaven? JEsus, which is received of you into heaven, 4) so shall he come, even as 5) ye have seen him go into heaven. "2c. Do you see that he is received from them into heaven? He is from them; he is received. Now the Godhead cannot comprehend or grasp heaven or earth, but if Christ is conceived in heaven, as also Marc. 16. says, then his humanity alone must be the comprehended one, for the Godhead cannot be comprehended. Do you also see that he will return visibly, as he went up? Do you say: But he cometh into bread, which is not spoken of here, but these words are for the future at the last day. It is true;

He says only about the future on the last day: but if we have no other future of his body, you will not bring us there with any word of God, because you have none (but if you had, we would already be brought there), that we believe that he is 1) bodily, neither up in heaven, until he comes as visibly as the disciples have seen him go up. For, in short, your seal is from the coming of God, not God's promise; for you have no promise at all, of which enough is said above.

Now add up all the sums. Christ says: "Let him do nothing of himself; let not his doctrine be his doctrine; if he be lifted up from the earth, that is, be put to death; let the Father be greater than he; let him pray the Father, Deliver me out of this hour; ye shall not have me for ever; it is profitable for you that I should depart; again, I will leave the world, and go to the Father; if any man shall say unto you, Here is Christ, or there is he; ye shall not believe it: If any man shall say unto you, Here is Christ, or there; believe it not: but now therefore ye shall see the Son of man sitting in the righteousness of the power of God; for the time being I am not in the world." He speaks all these words to his humanity. From these it is evident to everyone that it is not possible, because of his word, that his humanity should always be bodily present in the world, for he has rejected it; nor does he go against his word.

It follows, then, that your conclusion that Christ's body is everywhere is not only untrue but also unchristian, for that must ever be unchristian which publicly disputes the word and teaching of Christ. So then you say: Christ's body is everywhere, even and coextensive and equal with the Godhead; and Christ says, "I leave the world," and, "Hereafter I will not be in the world," and other words, first counted, 2) which must apply to mankind alone (for the Godhead is everywhere): then your word in short is 3) false, and will never receive that the mankind of Jesus Christ is more than in one place. And even if I also devil here, and say: Against this neither devil nor hell is able! In spite of enthusiasts! Blast the hypocrites! 2c., the truth is not greater because of it; and your error has brought nothing clearer to light, neither with counted proofs of proper reasoning from God's word and proclamations of God's own mouth.

167 And therefore the humanity of Christ is not everywhere, where the righteous hand of God is. But Christ is everywhere where the righteous hand of God is, not according to both natures, but only according to the divine. It does not yet hurt us to say that Christ is everywhere where God is; and when you say that outside of Christ there is no God, nor any divinity. Although we understand it by the contrast of the two natures only according to the divine, and not according to the human. And now we want to prove this even more clearly to you.

168) When the angel said to the women, who were looking for him on the 4) stands, "He is risen and is not here", I ask you, whether the righteous hand of God was there, when the angel was and the women? 5) You cannot say no: or else, this, media, 6) the righteous hand of God is everywhere, would not be true; God does not want that! But if it was there, and Christ was not there, which must be enough for his humanity alone, then it is insurmountable that Christ is not bodily everywhere, since the righteous hand of God is. Behold, we present thee with so many strong knobs, and thou shalt not undo any of them. Nor wilt thou be turned aside.

He says Marc. 13: "But of the day (understand, of the last judgment) or hour no one knows, not the angels in heaven, not the Son, but only the Father. See here, first, how the word "Son," which is, after all, a proper name of the divine person, is taken by the antitype for the pure humanity, for his divinity knows all things. On the other hand, see that Christ here, with one word, of foreknowledge, completely cuts off from his humanity everything that belongs to the divinity alone. For if he does not know, according to mankind, when the last day is, he is not all according to mankind, where the Godhead is; for the Godhead has the last day present. And if his humanity did not know it, it was not equal to the Godhead in knowledge, much less in being everywhere.

Here, devout Christian, do not let the cries of the people lead you to think that we want to destroy the humanity of Christ; not at all; but we proclaim by knowing faith that the living Son of God, true God and man, conceived and born of the pure handmaid Mary without sin, are only One Christ. And that the two natures in him are of such a quality that each of their properties

3) d. i. shortly. - "dennen" --- from then/ to, set by us instead of -, those.

The divine remains eternally equal to itself in all power, knowledge and holiness; likewise also the human. While the corpse was dead, it retained its dead nature; since it rose from the dead and was explained, 1) it retains the nature of the explained corpses into eternity, as you also recognize, dear Luther. 2) Now the declared corpses retain the re-designation or re-writing, according to the kind and quality of the person. Now, if his humanity before being declared is a finitely circumscribed person, it also remains so. But we carry out this doctrine so diligently from God's Word solely so that you may see, devout Christian, that the humanity of Jesus Christ may not be infinite; and that this may not be more actually established, neither with Christ's own Word. We also agree with all believers that no one should shy away from the words of the other, if Christ Himself has used them. But let no one by quarreling appropriate the other's nature, which is of the one alone; for Christ actually distinguished them, though he often spoke of both in common, which was of the one alone; as has now been sufficiently shown.

Now learn, O simple one, how the humanity of Christ is finite and circumscribed to the righteousness of God, when the righteousness is by no means circumscribed or circumscribed. The humanity of Christ is a true creature, therefore it may not be infinite, as has been heard enough before; and in addition it is a model of our origins, 1 Cor. 15, so that where it has come to, we will also come to. For he saith John 12, "Where I am, there shall My servant be also." And John 14: "I will take you to myself, that ye may feast where I am." Now his Godhead is at all ends, but since our souls are not, nor corpses declared; for the creature would then be like the Creator. So it must be, that the aim, which is proper for us, understands only his humanity, that such a measure is drawn in, that our souls and corpses will also be there. For he also says John 14: "In my Father's house are many mansions." Which he would not have said, if the company of the Son of God had not been included, but there would be only one dwelling place for all, as God is. For this purpose Christ teaches us to pray: "Our Father, who art in the heavens!" It is not that God is not universal outside and inside the heavens, but that he is

This is to indicate the measure and form that God holds, in opening up the joys and pleasures that he shows to his own who are fenced in, but he is not fenced in. Therefore it is evident that, as God is universal, and yet the elect are with Him, and yet are not universal, so also the humanity of Christ is not universal; and the humanity of Christ is nevertheless in unity of person, as we shall not be. Just as the queen alone is a consort and queen to the king, and the other virgins have joy with her, but are not queens. The queen herself is in the king's majesty, but she does not have the king's power and majesty. So-it is also about the queen, 4) the humanity of Christ, as is sung in the 44th [45th] Psalm. For Paul speaks 1 Cor.

13: "We shall see him face to face." And John Epist. 1. cap. 3: "We shall see him as he is." But if we are not infinite nor universal, how shall we see him who is universal as he is? So it must be that he who is universal 5) gives himself so abundantly to those who are not universal that they lack nothing at all. When Peter desired nothing more, when he [Christ] was fashioned otherwise before them, but said, "Lord, here is a good place to dwell!" So it will be for every man, where God shows Himself in such a way, whether on earth or in heaven; and therefore the one who sees does not have to be everywhere, since God is, according to the essence.

Here belongs the example 6) of the soul, which is whole in all the body, the hand has enough of it, the head and feet: and yet is only One soul. So also the humanity of Christ is not all-embracing, like the Godhead; nor is it One Christ with the Son of God, essentially having, possessing and eating the Godhead, as a sent creature, yet in unity with the Son of God: so we do not eat it, for he is the natural Son, we alone are cooptati, adopted children.

But that you also misuse the saying of Christ (7) John 4: "Philip, who sees me, sees also the Father," is good for a child to see and to answer for: for if this word were to apply to mankind, then the Father would have to have a human form, kind and nature. So it reads not on mankind, but on the divine power; and Christ wants to say, "Whoever sees (that is, recognizes) the miraculous works that I do, recognizes the Father; for he says immediately afterwards, "If you do not believe that I am in the Father, and the Father in me (hic potuisses ex personali proprietate non hallucinari [that is, here you could not have spoken from the personal quality]), believe it for the sake of the works." Behold, as He willed nothing else, neither to show that He is like God, yea, according to the One nature, with the Father, which they may well know by the works.

4) "Queen" put by us instead: Queens.

174 Thus, dear Luther, all your enthusiasm is conceived in the fog, since you first wanted to fence God in with the humanity of Christ, with the saying of Paul, Col. 2: "The perfect Godhead dwells bodily in him"; since you also left "bodily" unexplained for the simple-minded, so that they might think that it is with the Godhead. "The perfect Godhead dwells bodily in him"; since you also left "bodily" unexplained for the simple, so that they might think that the Godhead is enclosed with the corpse; yet you must not say this publicly; so "bodily" essentially means that the Godhead was, and still is, essential, but not enclosed in Christ. Accordingly, you wanted to extend the same humanity of Christ to the immeasurable breadth of the Godhead, so that the righteous hand would be all-embracing, but you did not realize that his humanity is not all-embracing, like his Godhead. Or if we will be with him, according to his promise, we should be equal to all, as well as his humanity, where it would be all, because he says: xxxx [that is] "just where I am, there will also my servant be." And so you have done nothing but useless talk, so that you have given to understand that you cannot yet understand or write about Christ, who is of two natures, and about each one in particular according to its quality. For if [you] could not and would not do it, nor forbear, when others speak rightly of it, [you] would be a great ... But I will not call you so. You are a human being, and so am I. God forgive and enlighten us all!

(175) That thou therefore also refuse me to understand the words of Christ, John 3: "That which is born of the flesh is flesh," thus: if anything 1) is born of the flesh of Christ, eaten in the flesh, then nothing but flesh must be born; thou doest well to be unreasonable, as last 2) and arrogant thou hast set thyself. For thou turnest not back my reason, which is, that Christ hath here spoken one that is, common sense. This is invented with the other part of his-in his speech, when he says: "And that which is born of the Spirit is spirit. How do you think that these words do not mean anything else, that what is born of the spirit is spirit? Do you want to deny it? Now, contrary to all truth, you also make the humanity of Christ to be spirit, because he was conceived of the spirit; 3) however nonsensical and Marcionic; for you should have considered that he, Christ, was conceived of the spirit alone, and was nourished and bodily born in the virgin corpse; and came into this world as a true bodily man, not as a spirit, and walked. And such birth and conception befit the one who was sent by God into the flesh (so that he might receive from the flesh the condemnation of the flesh, Rom. 8.), that he might be conceived by the spirit and born of the immaculate body of Mary. So let him not be a spirit, if the true human nature was in him, which is not a spirit at all, or else you are the true Marcion.

176. I have had to indicate this, so that the poor sheep led astray by you may see with what peas you are walking. And stand firm, "that which is born of the Spirit is Spirit." Christ is not born of the spirit alone; if you make "to be born" mean to conceive, then he is not only spirit, but God and man together. But if this is so, then the other part, "that which is born of flesh is flesh," must also remain rigidly upright in the manner of a common sense: that [the] flesh, if it beget, begetteth nothing but flesh. And that thou bringest before thy village church, if I eat buns, I should also give birth to buns. Of this [yet] Christ nor we speak, but of birth of the spirit and flesh. And that is why your Badryberian spittle should not have been used at all; if the counter-accusations had been resolved with it, Egg 4) would have done it long ago. When Christ will tell us what will be born of buns, we also want to learn. But the mind is still unconquered by all flesh; for even Christ, in that case, does not take out his flesh, but speaks in the common: flesh gives birth to flesh, and spirit gives birth to spirit.

From the word, "The flesh is not useful at all."

177 After such a long time of loose talk, you, dear Luther, come to the place: "The flesh is not useful at all"; and you keep yourself so informal with it.

and impious, that I regret to say. I would rather you had covered up the mischief, for you commit three quite dishonest acts. The first, that thou speakest against thyself without recantation. The other, that you falsify the words. (Behold, this grieves us so much that you cannot believe it enough; for it does not indicate to us a justifier, which we have never provided for you; but you are in God's hand). The third, that thou prescribeest false rules how "flesh" should be taken in Scripture. Now I will briefly state these things and hasten to the end.

That you speak against yourself is indicated by the sermon 1) you preached on the words: "My flesh is the true food" 2c. in which you speak these words.

Luther: "For thus he himself says afterwards: The flesh is not useful. And again: My flesh gives life. How do we separate these things? The spirit separates it. Christ wants the bodily eating of the flesh to be of no use, but to believe that the flesh is the Son of God, come from heaven for my sake, and his blood shed for me" 2c. Likewise you also understand this place; as is indicated to me in the postill, Sunday Septuagesimä about the epistle. 2) Behold, dear Luther, these are your own words, in which you publicly recognize the right meaning, that the flesh is of no use at all to eat. And you do wonders 3) in the book, how much it, eaten in the flesh, brings. Benefit bring; scream: It is a holy meat, which makes holy even by touching alone, how much more eaten? Fix it with the sick woman, 4) who touched the hem of her garment and got well. And it is of no account with thee that Christ saith, Thy faith hath made thee whole, and saith not, My flesh or my hem hath made thee whole. Neither seest thou that they which defiled him in Caiphas' house with strokes of the cheek were not made holy, nor Judas that kissed him; nor art thou ashamed to pretend such dishonest false things. We know well how holy he is, how much good he has done us poor people; but we know that he has not given himself bodily to us to eat; so that his flesh is not profitable to eat, as also thou hast confessed.

180. that thou also shalt cry: Should he be born, scourged, crucified, and not be useful when eaten? are you like the priests who also cry out: Should this or that not be useful to me? Then we could give them a good answer: Every thing is useful as much as God's word indicates usefulness, and we taught that what God's word could do would be upright, what it could not do should not be given. But now you have turned the page, and do not doubt that your own conference is sufficiently stunted in this. So turn back, and learn that you can and have taught before, that such cries are not able to do anything; for they have no divine promise. For if they should be able to do anything, I would give the body of Christ to him that hath the tan in his mouth to eat; for thou sayest that he is eaten with the mouth bodily; and wouldst cry out, Should he that is so holy not receive the tan? and let it be seen whether it goeth or not. So to the lame, the blind, the leprous 2c. Do you say: Yes, bodily health is not promised. It is right. Then say: Where is spiritual health promised? It is promised to a lesser extent, as it is shown above that all healing and comfort of the soul comes to our hearts from the spirit alone, and not from bodily food. For this we may indicate more similar things for the sake of bodily health, if here one eats the body of Christ bodily, as you, Paul says: "For this reason there are many sick among you.

181 Thus you speak against yourself, and lead yourself into loose impotent teachings, which we do not allow any. We do not allow any priest. You should justly put down the previous ones in the new writings, or answer for them; but it is not proper for him to speak: I have erred! who before so arrogantly pretended that everything he taught must be just; just as if it must be so for him, even though he taught without God's word; and now proves himself, if he would teach another, one should think that he had fallen from the faith. Behold, that thou trustest thyself so well, that thou shalt yet fall from it; but we shall abide in error.

182 Similarly, you have questioned the meaning of Paul's words, 1 Cor. Cap. 10: "The drink of thanksgiving, that we may give thanks; is not this the church of the blood of Christ?" Well and rightly preached and written some years ago, when [you] wrote in the sermon of the brotherhoods and sacrament 5). And in the other part, against the Carolstad, you immediately write that Contradiction; as in exegesis 1) is well given to you to understand, along with other things that you teach against yourself. Is this a right spirit, to teach against oneself, and not to recognize the wrong part, nor to have erred?

Secondly, you falsify God's word when you take the article [that is] "THAT" from the flesh, just as the Marcionites and Arrians have scraped something out of the Scriptures, which was contradiction. Notice, you simple-minded one, what I mean. The Greek language has the custom that we Germans have of putting an article in front of every word where it is to be clarified, as: Das, der, die, dem, den, eins, ein, einer, eine 2c., as: Marci 6: "Isn't he the carpenter?" Here the trailing "the" is a superior article, and may be used as much, as: The carpenter, who was known to all the people of the craft half well. And the speech is much different, neither if one would say: Is he not a carpenter? because if the Greek wanted to say so, he would say: Is he not a carpenter? without the article "the". These short superior articles (loquor enim de praepositivis articulis tantum [i.e., for I am speaking only of superior articles]) have so much force with the Greeks that they are capable of more in many places, neither the subzunctivi, that is, neither those placed in subsequent speech, as: which, which, which, which, which re.

184. example. Joh. Cap. 1: "In the beginning was the word, and the word was with God. Here the following little word "that", only an article, is able as much as: the same word, of which is first said: "THAT was with God." Now all Greek teachers have said much about this, especially Cyril, Chrysostom, and in our times Erasmus. The quality of the language is also able to do it. Since Luther should have interpreted from the words: σαρξ οὐχ ὠφελει οὐδεν "the flesh is not at all useful", he left out the little word "THE"; so that it did not point to the certain flesh, of which Christ spoke before and still speaks of. And Luther says, "Flesh is not useful at all." [But the superior article "THAT" is able to do as much as if the words themselves were there: The very flesh of which it is first said. This I will make clear not only with the understandings of the Greek language, but with the self-words of Christ to one, and in addition with other places in Scripture. We will deal with the following first.

185 John 1: "In him was life, and the life was the light of men. 2) Here the little word "that" means as much as if he said: "The very life, of which it was first said that was in him, was the light of men. So there it says: "And the Word became man". 3) Here "that" can be interpreted as much as: The very Word, of whom so much was said before, became man.

Now see here, you learned preachers who praise this Lutheran book! If Luther is to do the article to them 4) in the discourse: "The flesh is of no use at all"; and say: "Flesh is not useful", and is to count for nothing that it is attached to the previous discourse: then Marcion will also no longer read: "The Word has become man"; but: "Word has become man"; and will say: John is not speaking here of the word, which was spoken of before, but of a common word of God, which made a man. And what you dare to say against this does not help, because in both places the preceding speech is thus appended to the succeeding speech; and the succeeding speech is preserved with the article, so that in one it is just as proper to do the article to them as in the other, that is, by no means without great falsification.

Item, Luther in his translation of the New Testament thus interpreted: "The flesh is not useful"; and now he speaks: "Flesh is not useful"; so that it may serve that Christ has spoken the mind, meaning and nature of the flesh. See, dear Luther, how you stand here! as an open criminal and falsifier of Scripture, which you cannot deny before any creature Yes, how do we stand, who have exalted you without measure, and experience this in you? But we cannot agree with God's judgment, but we want to ask Him that He, by His causeless mercy, will help you up again, who have fallen so badly through strife, and forgive us 5) and humble us so that we do not fall in such a way that we subject ourselves to anything without God's word to protect us.

188) Secondly, it is evident from the very words which Christ spoke before and after, that He also pointed to His own flesh with the words, "The flesh is not useful. [So before the words, when the disciples murmured, it is written, "When therefore Jesus perceived that his disciples murmured of it." Dear, of what did they murmur? Against the mind of the spirit and flesh, or against the bodily food?

After that Jesus says: "Are you angry with this? Dear, where does this "this" point to? Does it annoy you that he had spoken of the chip 1) and the nature of the flesh and the spirit? Now he had not said anything about that. So they are angry that they thought he had spoken of his flesh, eating bodily; from which it follows that Christ speaks for and of his flesh, when he takes their speech from them and answers them.

190. thirdly, he says, "When ye therefore shall see the Son of man going up, then was he before." Dearly beloved, what rhymes this word with the carnal and spiritual? Therefore he will say to them, "I teach you to trust in me as the true Son of God, who will give my body for you, that is, eat my flesh; so you will not believe that I am the Son of God, and will grumble as if I had spoken too harshly or roughly; but when you see me go up to heaven, you will see that I am God, and that you did not have to eat me.

191. fourthly, he speaks a word that takes away all the mist that is before our eyes, saying, "The Spirit is that maketh alive." Behold, this is brief and good: that which makes us alive is the one Spirit. In this word all that you attribute to bodily food falls away. For bad: "The Spirit quickeneth." And if we love Christ, we rejoice that he goeth up to the Father, Joh. 14. Behold how he cuts off from us all the joy which thou promiseest us in the bodily meal, saying, 2) "If we loved him, we should rejoice that he goeth from us to the Father." So again it follows that those who want to have him here in the flesh do not love [him]. Do you see now where your seal stands? You want to give him to people to eat in the flesh, and you promise much sweetness if they eat him. Who has ever eaten his child because he loved him? Much less will we desire to eat the Son of God if we love him. But where one teaches untruth, one must bring such flowers as if it were true. Although all things that God does are proper, he has not ordained them, and therefore they are unseemly to him and to us. 3) The spirit alone makes alive; and the very flesh, of which you first murmured much, is not at all useful, [and] indeed to eat bodily, to which they thought they had spoken it.

192. After the words he says: "The words that I have spoken to you are spirit and life. Which words are spirit and life? Those: "My body is the true food"? Now he no longer speaks of the former opinion according to your mind; but has lifted up another from the nature of the flesh. Therefore it is evident from these words that he still remains in the former opinion of speaking of the gospel; from this it follows that with the word: "The flesh is not useful," he also answers to the opinion of the erring 4) ones.

193. sixth, he says, "But there are some among you who do not believe. For he knew from the beginning which believed not." Dear, where does this go? To understand that carnal mind is of no use at all? Then he would have spoken like this: There are some who understand nothing at all; for they all undoubtedly believed that the way of the flesh is not useful but harmful, even from the prophets. But from this it follows that here no new opinion is put on the way, but he teaches for and for the gospel; and if those do not understand the figurative words, he gives them an answer to their misunderstanding, and does not raise another.

194 To the seventh Peter says: "Lord, to whom would we go? you have the words of eternal life; this we believe and know, that you are Christ, the Son of the living God." Here Peter should have spoken: We understand you well that the carnal way is harmful. If not, it is clear that Christ remains for and for in the teaching of the Gospel and answering for their misunderstanding. And thus it becomes clear that the words "the flesh is not useful" have the meaning: the very flesh of which the hearers murmured is not useful to eat at all; and that you, dear Luther, so unjustly and dishonestly cut off the little word "dqs", because it does not serve you.

The third dishonest thing that you do 5) is that you prescribe the wrong rule: Where spirit and flesh are opposed to each other, flesh is called the old Adam, not Christ flesh. Short answer: So also spirit there is not called Christ spirit; or else they are not opposed to each other. 6) Therefore note, dear Luther: I freely indulge you, that where spirit and flesh are opposed to one another in Scripture, but which include our spirit and flesh, that there-even flesh is taken for the old Adam; but there spirit must not be taken for the spirit, which is God, but for our spirit, which has some enlightenment from God, as it is written in Galatians 5: "The spirit seeth against the flesh, and the flesh against the spirit." Here flesh is taken for the sense and nature of the flesh, and spirit for the sense and nature of the spirit, even of man; although the same spirit is touched or enlightened by God's spirit, of which way it also says in Romans 8. And Paul has the meaning: The human spirit, which now recognizes God as being drawn by God, eternally contends with the flesh, as Rom. 7. Now, I hope, you understand the connotation, that is, the inclusion: where flesh stands against spirit, and the fleshly kind means, that also again spirit, which stands in opposition, means our spirit, but which is enlightened by God, as well, as flesh means our fleshly kind.

196. Then I ask you, what is the meaning of the spirit in the word: "It is the spirit that gives life"? Does it mean God's spirit, or man's spirit, which is enlightened with God? If you cannot deny that it means God's Spirit (for no matter how holy man is made by God, the human spirit cannot make him alive), then the spirit there must be called God's Spirit. If this is so, Christ does not speak of our flesh, but of his own spirit and flesh next to each other; or else it would not be antithesis. As he does not add the word "my" to the word spirit, and yet his spirit alone is understood; so also in the word "flesh" his flesh is understood, without adding the word "my," and has the meaning: I make alive according to the spirit; the flesh is not useful, indeed, eaten, to make alive. Against this, dear Luther, do not speak a word, or we will show you that you have never understood the eighth chapter of Romans.

197 Hear the message now. John 1: "The Word became flesh. Doesn't "Word" here mean "Son of God"? Isn't he a spirit? so the meaning should become: The Word became an old Adam, according to your rule. How do you treat the word 1 Peter 3: "Christ was killed in the flesh and made alive in the spirit"? Does "killed in the flesh" also mean that he was dead in the old sinful Adam? How then can he say, "Who will punish me for sin? Item, 1 John 5: "There are three things that make manifest, the Spirit, the water, and the blood; and the three are together," or find one. Is blood also taken here for the fleshly temptation?

Now it is a judgment of flesh and blood, Matt. 16: "Flesh and blood has not opened it for you"; item, 1 Tim. 3: "God has appeared in the flesh, has been justified in the Spirit. But here they are opposed to each other. Now, according to your rule, is "flesh" to be taken here for the sinfulness of the flesh? Where do we come to with your foolishness? When wilt thou see what it is, "They teach doctrines of men and commandments"? Now thou, as thou art contrary to thyself, as thou breakest and counterfeitest the scriptures, and as thou teachest false precepts. And remainest stiffnecked: the flesh is not at all profitable to eat. And didst thou burst thy head with it.

Accordingly, when you want to draw the teachers to your mind, 1) you commit nothing less dishonest; but I will let the same Oecolampadium answer, and show here a small sample, how you forge. When you indicate Augustinum ad Januarium, in the 118th epistle, you use the dishonest one, that you have not taken the words (which stand at the beginning and give well to note, that he alone calls the signs the body of Christ and blood by the after-naming, and does not consider that they are the things, but alone signify) [omitted]. And these are his words: "First of all, know that the most excellent thing in our business is that our Lord Jesus Christ has put us under a gentle yoke and light burden, as He Himself speaks in the Gospel; and for this reason He has bound together the company of the new people with a few sacraments, which are also to be kept ring 2) and in meaning 3) excellent; as 4) in baptism with the name of the Trinity is sanctified the church of His body and blood." See, devout Christian, the words of Augustine in fact, and you will see how it was in his time about the sacraments, and how he so publicly indicates that they only mean, but signify excellent things, namely, the great deed that God has forfeited in this world through His Son, and the unification of the Church, that is, of His people.

200) Accordingly, you falsify: for when you indicate from Augustine, 5) how with the ancients this sacrament is called a sacrifice, from the sacrifice that only happened once, 6) so that it is the post-nuptial, of which we say, you omit that he says the corpse of Christ, so also that it is called the sacrifice.

which is but a sacrament; and not otherwise the body of Christ, than as we call the primordial states of Christ, which is but a likeness or signification of the primordial states which have been. How may you do this? Indicate the one thing from Augustine, and omit the thing that stands just before, after, and beside it? Is this honest, since it all belongs to the matter?

Item 201: You bring yourself to this point by not understanding Augustine to call the sacramental signs the body and blood of Christ, 1) saying that Christ's body and blood are received bodily in the mouth, like other visible bodily food. So say to your erroneous opinion: If the body of Christ is everywhere, how will it be received into the mouth of man? If the mouth receives it at all, it is not universal; for the mouth is not universal. If it receives it in part, it is not Christ in body, soul, and blood, as he was born, died, and is in heaven. Behold, whither thou goest!

You torture Tertullianum, the dearest, half of both languages, of all Latin theologians, so miserably, because you want to reverse that he calls this sacrament a figure of the body of Christ, that you say: FIGURA is taken there mathematice. Do not see that it is taken per imagine, simulacro, aut repraesentatione (that is, for an illusion, similitude, or representation); which way Lucretius, Catullus, Juvenalis, and Ovidius also take it.

It is also evident from your writing that you have wasted little time in Tertulliano; but you would have seen for what he uses this word FIGURA, namely for a meaning; for he, lib. I. contra Marcionem, thus speaks: He also has not swallowed the bread, 2) so that he means his corpse. You see that he takes figure for a meaning and sign or unformation. Nevertheless, you say in your book: 3) it is truly the meaning of Tertullian; just as if Tertullianus was so well understood and known to you that one would believe you.

204 You treat Irenaeus in the same way; you do not see that he speaks only by allegories, in which he nevertheless touches the Marcionites. And speaks on such sense as also Tertullianus: that Christ had true human nature in him; for he suffered death in it, and redeemed us, and left us a thanksgiving of the same redemption. In which thanksgiving we are given-that our corpses will also be resurrected when he is resurrected. And all his teachings extend only to the inner eating, which he speaks of as the eating of the body and blood of Christ, as also Christ himself, John 6, which would take more time to explain in German, neither is it here; nor is it so important, even if they are not with us. For God is more than His apostles, John 13, let alone the teachers, even though they are truly with us; but it will be better to explain in Latin than in German, so that the simple will not be troubled with unnecessary things.

205) That you warn the pious of Strasbourg and Basel against the sacramentalists, you do him justice; for one should beware of mobs. 4) But insofar as you make their faithful teachers and preachers suspicious, as if they were stirring up, you are doing more dishonestly than is proper for any pious person, for only male nutalame 5) has learned whether they are rotten or not.

206. 6) [You] dishonor the pious, well-learned man, neither to him nor to yourself; yet do [you] right to him after the manner in which you are now proceeding. Christ teaches that one should give good for evil: so also 7) the Antichrist teaches to give evil for good; this you do faithfully; for you unkindly thank users for diligent work, had in your books. And he has not done anything unkind or dishonorable to you or to Pomeranus; for it has been the custom and freedom of all interpreters from time immemorial [ab omni saeculo] for your sake, where they have violated something in a teacher or book, they have added their warning to it. Since now user (wanted, he would have spared it, and the more I hear your writings, the more I wanted it; had warned him also, but it was too late) turned your books into Latin language, and found however, which was not according to the truth; should he not indicate such? In advance, if he has done so with such modesty that one can see which is yours, or which is his. Pomeranus half, he has given him the choice to increase and decrease in his book, yes, to make according to his sense. So now you rage without need. Behold, which act more Christian?

Here you also learn, devout Christian, what anger and rage are. Throughout Luther's book, I have thought: Oh God, where did you find

1) "that he name" put by us instead of: "name".

2) i.e. spurned.

3) Marginal gloss: Is in Luther's ^Buche, im Bogen N [No. 20, §§ 227. 232.)

4) i.e. to guard, to take care of.

5) "nutalame" stands for: "nun talame" (compare Col. 1128, § 1), i.e. now already.

6) A game with Butzer's name. Use - clean.

7) mitding - against (?).

you, or Oecolampadius, boasted of holiness or suffering? Finally, Luther himself indicates that users of Strasbourg praised us in special letters that he sent to him for the sake of peace and unity; yet we did not have any knowledge of this, nor do we know it today, because we have only heard so much. Behold, it cometh to pass, that we lay upon innocent people things which they have not done, 1) If we hate them, and see them. 2)

And as this whole book is nothing else, neither an open disgrace and darkening of the undefiled evangelical truth and light, which, as I hope to God, is now strongly brought to light, we must not answer for all your intemperate scolding. Our innocence answers for it in part, in part it bears it patiently. And these are the errors that you turn in this book:

I. The body of Christ is, as it were, 3) of the divine nature, everywhere.

II Let Christ show Himself to us in this Sacrament, that we may know where to find Him.

III Christ's body, eaten in the flesh, put up with sin.

IV. Let Christ's flesh be an entirely spiritual flesh.

V. Christ flesh, eaten in the flesh, preserve our bodies for the primal state.

1) Marginal gloss: So blinded and perverted the hatred. 2) pursue (?).

3) i.e. "as if" he had divine nature.

VI Christ body, bodily eaten, give or increase faith. Is everything spoken by you Against God's word.

Therefore, my humble request to you, dear Luther, is that you do not rage in the matter as you have done so far; but if you are Christ's, then we are also his. Now it does not behoove us to act against each other, neither with the word of God. Therefore do the same with Christian discipline, [which] we also want to do; for we should not ever fight against God, nor shield our error with false trang 4) of God's word. God grant you the truth and your knowledge; and that you remain Luther, not become - "67-/) 5) Luther! But if you ever want to disobey, we carpenters will first cut good chips. The truth conquers. Amen!

God, praise be to you, who make us victorious in Christ and make the smell of your knowledge known to everyone through us. 2 Cor. 2.

the notes to the first book of Moses, which are brought together by Leo and Megander, somewhere "ein grobes Gebilde" is written for: "ein feines Gebilde" - will probably be a marginal gloss of Zwingli to this play with Luther's name. In the old edition these words are at the end of the writing without a mark.

24 Ulrich Zwingli's response to Luther's confession of the Lord's Supper.

Started July 1, completed end of August 1528.

Before the pious Christian princes Johansen, Duke of Saxony, and Philippe, Landgrave of Hesse, Huldreich Zwingli, a simple preacher of the Gospel of Christ, has received grace and peace from God through Jesus Christ, His only begotten Son, our Lord and Savior!

1) Therefore, I will first of all indicate the reason why I, writing to Your Grace, do not hold the titles: "Highborn, Sublime" 2c. Namely, that it seems to me that there are many who are "highborn" according to the world and the respect of the flesh, but, measured against God and righteousness, are very far away here; and transparency, which is also inherent in the stained-glass windows, 6) has only in new times been applied to the princes by the flatterers.

6) Luther commemorates this hopeful letter in his Tischreden, Cap. Walch, St. Louis Edition, Vol. XXII, 676.

*) This writing appeared in German in 1528, but was later translated into Latin by Rudolph Gualther and added to Zwingli's Werke, Iom. II, p. 416, inserted. Zwingli also included in his answer the answer of Johann Oecolampad to the confession of Mart. Luther's confession of the Lord's Supper". At the end of the letter is

(2) But of the pious Christian princes [find] so little that God's judgment justly decrees that few bear the title; but rather take pleasure in the obscure shininess that is said of them, neither that they would be clear [clar], that is, highly renowned of faithfulness and piety. But so herewith one commonly where you are recognized, praised as pious, God-fearing men and princes 1) of the Gospel of Christ, I have no doubt that you will receive no displeasure because, according to the custom of the apostles, I call you "pious" and "Christians" for "Highborn" and "Illustrious"; for when the apostles called the Christians, they did not want to understand anything else, neither "pious", by the word.

3) You pious princes know well what Spanes holds, the night feast of Christ's heaps, between the excellent man Martin Luther and us, in which so many books and letters were written, until it finally came to the point that also the book, called "Martin Luther's Confession", had to come out; which, with what breeding or fugues, yes, with truth and Christian spirit, it is written, we command God and all believers. Now without God's order, without which our hair does not turn black or gray, the book is not brought to the world. So he also wants to do good with it, which is why we have become quite comforting [fiducialiter] and bold about the Scriptures; so that we see publicly not only by the words that he has no reason to save himself, if he subjects himself to reproach, snorting and scolding 2); but also by the senses and powers of the Scriptures (for he brings forth many such impotent senses, and also wants to rely on the fact that, if he were so, all knowledge of God would be obscured) all Scriptures would be put in doubt, and he would have to throw himself back in all his teaching; But we lead our testimony against him, which will surely be incumbent upon him and will be victorious, for his book is like a scattered, discordant heap, where one group wants to go out here, the other there, which thereby emits much shouting and dread.

4 You will see, pious princes, if God wills it! that when the day is bright, how Luther, with the book, not only contradicted his before opened books, but against himself in the book. Therefore, I cannot pay any attention to it other than that it is like someone who leases some money or stuff in the night (as in and must search for it again without a light; for just as he reaches around and gropes where he would like to find something, so Luther reaches around for what he would like to find that would help him. And soon he has forgotten himself, and sets that which he denied before, or denies that which he set before; not only does he make his very first doctrine suspicious, but also gives the popes cause to reproach it most highly, if he is called in the present matter (in which, however, he is forced by divinity and humanity to deal) to go only over the books which he wrote in four or five years. For who will not say: If one remains five years, he will also be suspicious of the books he has written in the next five years? Which we verily care for 3) neither all dishonor and reproach, done unto us. Not that one should not recant if he errs; but that it is a laborious. It is a pity that he comes to this out of quarreling, that he will not let the things he has taught before fall, nor give way; though no one may overthrow them, where they are founded in God's word.

(5) Therefore, pious princes, we are compelled by reason to order and form our Scriptures to you, knowing well to what ridicule this may be measured to us; for we note well in Luther's writing that our Scriptures are not read in your lands, if he puts upon us that which we have not taught; and in turn denies that which we have truly taught; so that the truth may suffer great harm. The apostle Paul teaches that one should prove all things and accept what is right [1 Thess. 5, 21]: so Luther denies that our doctrine (which is not ours, but God's, as will be found out here and on the last day) is not read, but maligned before it is heard.

(6) Now it hath been found from everlasting, not only among the faithful, but also among the Gentiles, that they which knew the truth, and were faithful in it, suffered not that their spirits should be changed.

1) i.e., headmaster.

2) i.e. to snap at.

3) i.e. worse (rvorss). In § 220 of this writing it is written "wirß".

4) So put by us instead of: "the right".

Why then, pious princes, should we let your pious people, who are dear to us with all our hearts, as those who cheerfully accept God's word, yes, who are One People and One Church with us, our and we their members in One Body, proceed in error? How could we ever more justify this against God, that for the sake of Luther's not peeling us so inhumanly, we would give way to him in the matter of truth? provided we know that we may overcome him with all understanding, if they consider the matter with an open heart and faith. Why should we let the dirt [insult] turn away from us, since everyone can speak: You prove yourselves right, Luther speaks otherwise; yet we see daily that (if Luther's opinion is read in cities and places alone, and our writings are not tolerated) the truth that stands with us nevertheless increases? and again, since his books are accepted with great pomp and splendor, ahead of the papists, and read freely without any prohibition, nevertheless the truth does not weaken, 2) but increases, neither before? so we see that Christian peace and unity become much greater, since the truth in the article may be freely sought and accepted without danger, neither since it is resisted? Christ, our Saviour, directs us to such pre-fighting, as he says: "He who trusts in me, from him shall flow living rivers." [John 7:38?]

(7) It matters not what the adversary says; we must see that we do not put down truth with falsehood. It shall be eternally enough for us, if we please him among whom we are enrolled; he knows us well, he also knows our conscience well, whether it fights for our name's sake or for his, against a truly not childish hero: for if we traveled for honor's sake, we would have to fight in other articles, neither in that, since we now do not fall the papists, but also have to have Luther and all, who have been taught nowhere else, neither in his books, as opponents. Who, after all, can extinguish the light of truth? or shall we put the light under the measure? Let all our adversaries be so fresh, and let our writings walk beside theirs, and see to it that their doctrine is the first to be accepted by all who understand the law! Or are we so weak in faith that we think, even if our doctrine were false, that God would therefore accept his own?

1) d. i. light.

2) weakens - becomes weak.

Or, if it is just, that one may reject it? It is not such an unjust, incomprehensible judge on earth, if one were to tell him of two parties, one of which sought no advantage at all, nor suppressed the writings of its opponents, but the other did so; he would at least put the advantageous party at fault.

We, pious princes, do not want to act against Luther as he did against us, but have now freely forgiven him before God all fancy words, 3) lying, cursing, condemning and banishing, and have not burdened him with any convicio, scolding and reviling; he shall have the same freely before; even though he does not consider us to be Christians alone, but also not human beings. But here no one can say, if we are compelled to speak: Luther does us violence, he speaks the untruth, he speaks against himself, he falsifies the Scriptures, or himself; that we blaspheme him with such words, if we bring this to light publicly; for without such words no one can carry out a cause against his adversary. Such a good invective in loco, as I say: Luther does the same as the weak fencers; if they are overcome, they say: the adversary cannot; or, the conquered one seeks a quarrel, 4) and the like, we also hope that no one will blame us; for there is a great difference between jocos, risus et maledicta, between invective and reviling. Therefore, we do not want to make fun of them, we are serious. But let us temper infernal, angry, quarrelsome, inhuman words, and thus cheerfully and kindly carry out the bargain with God.

9. Since Luther has written in such a mixed way, and has put it together neatly for us in previous writings, he has divided it according to his meaning, and has, however, added something erroneous in all places, we want to answer first about his book, how great it is, in the shortest way; and then, what is not sufficiently explained in the refutation of his errors, in the other part we will explain and strengthen; and lastly, what he has poured out wrongfully in his faith, we will indicate brightly; all from God's word, for his honor alone, and good to his neighbor.

(10) But if you, pious princes, cannot be expected to read this scripture to the end for the sake of the great business with which you are burdened: Is it not our humble request that you will

3) i.e. words of shame.

4) Marginal gloss: lasso rixa Huasritur.

Let them be read by unquestioned, impartial, God-fearing scholars and advise them to 1) record and send to us everything they think they do not have reason to know from God's Word; we will always give good information. And is also much weger, 2) the things are discussed and endured among the scholars, neither with unkind open writing. In the hope that the almighty God will hear our knocks and pleas and make all of us, who desire nothing more earnestly than to have peace with one another in truth (as far as we all speak), united; for as far as we face the truth in these articles, so far will we be able to speak the truth in truth: For as far as we look the truth right in the face in these articles, then all quarrels are over, half because of outward things, and the papacy is only more panned 3) and corrupted.

11) That Ecolampadius' writing and mine are printed together is due to brevity and convenience; no one should take it otherwise.

May the living true God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit, preserve you, pious princes, together with your lands, and grant the common Christianity the unity of His Spirit! Amen.

Dear reader, know that both of us missed business because Ecolampadius only started writing [on] the day of St. John the Baptist, and I on the first day of the month of July 4); nevertheless, in addition to the administration of our daily texts 5) and sermons, we had to hurry to the autumn fair in Frankfurt, which is why the numbers are not actually recorded everywhere; but scholars will see what is written. Given on the first day of July at Zurich 2c.

The book is called Confession and is the answer of Huldreich Zwinglius.

When now Luther renounced for the first, 6) he did not want to write anything more, so that Satan would not become even more foolish: is it unequal, since he defies long afterwards, why he should not call the devil his enemy, as thick 7) he wanted? Here he wants to spare, there he wants to rush. But not so! but where we see that the untruth grows,

We are to stand up against them always undaunted, according to the saying of Paul, 2 Cor. 4: "We are afflicted, but not imprisoned; sorrowful, but not desolate; thirsty, but not forsaken nor falling away; cast down, but not destroyed." But it seems from these words that he would be in the right place with joy; which joy we want to leave him so faithfully that we do not want to give him a word for further strife; for he does not want to let himself be led astray in the open errors that he introduces here.

2. that he had said 8) before: No master heretic can be converted, is answerable enough. We are not heretics, but stand on the insurmountable rock of Christ. Whoever allows himself to be led astray 9) by them goes astray and becomes a heretic by persisting.

(3) Since he asks, "What kind of supper is this, which has no certain text or word? 2c., 10) he often asks such a question and makes such an impression, as if we were to present him with another text, which we have never accepted. Yes, we consider it an abomination that someone should dare to put his word instead of God's word. But our work is to speak from the right sense, not to make other words. So it was also proper for Luther to speak of the sense and understanding of the words: "You are a rock, and on the rock I will build my church," against the pope; but not to completely dislocate the words in their order, form and essence. Therefore, it would be spared to grimace so often in this piece, as if we were going to innovate the words. If you look at our actions, you can see whether we have changed the words or not. Even our churches, when they hear the words read aloud, will not understand the opinion that Luther and the Pope hold; but will hear that the bread is a signification of the body of Christ, who was given in death for us. Yes, if other words were made of it, they would be hurt. But they know whom they trust; not man, not food, but the one God who has their heart in his hands; and they have him 11) in present consolation and assurance of conscience, which is not brought into man by any bodily food or exercise; but he gives himself after his free will, as abundantly as he pleases, into the hearts of men. 1 Cor. 12.

4) "But we (says 1) Luther) have a certain text, and are not divided about it. Luther is complaining to the King of England that he calls clear that which is not clear in the minds of the faithful. So it is true: only men know what this word "that", what "is", what "my", what "body" means. But that bread is the body of Christ is never clear; for even Luther says that one must not let reason loose here. Without doubt that reason may not understand it. How then can the text be clear? But if it points us to faith, it cannot prove that God has ever recommended to us that we should believe that this bread is his corpse, or that his corpse is in the bread, or that it is with the bread, or that it is eaten with the bread. And if this is nowhere recommended to our faith, why does Luther point us to faith? are we also guilty of believing what God has not recommended? If he himself recognizes against the king of England that it is not an article of faith, as the king of England speaks of it, then it is also not an article of faith, as he speaks of it.

005 And when he saith, Christ hath commanded us to do this in remembrance: now let all his words be obeyed, and believed. Answer: These words are called eating bread and drink in remembrance, not making his body or eating in remembrance of his body, which shall come abundantly afterward. But if we ever hear our faith, he believes all the words of God alike, so that he recognizes each one as true as the other. And if two words of the first standing are contrary to each other, faith guards that one should not therefore think God false; 2) and says: "All men are false, but only God is true. Therefore the fault is in you, not in God's word; in your mind, not in the divine intention. And if faith then remembers rightly with the fear of God, God gives the light of His Spirit, which teaches that either the word must have a different meaning than we had intended. And thus it is found that the words are not contrary to each other, but unanimous.

6) So then, in addition to the words, this is my body, faith also considers these: "The flesh is of no use at all"; "For the time being I will no longer

I will leave the world and go to the Father"; "You will not have me forever"; "If we have known Christ according to the flesh, we no longer know him according to the flesh"; "This is my body, which is given up for you"; and others like these: so he finds that they cannot stand with one another. For thus he also sees that the words, "This is my body," may not have the sense which is also contrary to faith. For having promised before that "he shall be no more in the world," which must be understood of his corpse alone, may never suffer that the words "this is my corpse" be understood according to the sound of the letter. For therefore we have no promise, but insurmountable resistance of God's own word. How can they be understandable or clear to the sense of our opponents? What is it that one cries out so much: The words are clear; since not only is not clarity, but God's words are an insufferable sense?

We do not disagree about the words, but they are more disagreeable, [1] The Popes (who would have gladly dug themselves out of the book, if they had not been so quickly restrained, and they themselves wanted to think that the inhuman scolding would not be followed) say: the bread is changed into the substance of the corpse of Christ. [Luther says: Bread is essentially bread and essentially the body of Christ with each other, and calls it a carnal bread (would that we had such a word!), which is quite against the Popes. He also says that the body of Christ is eaten with the bread. [3] The fourteen Swabian pastors say: he is in the bread, or under the bread; to which Luther contradicts so publicly, he never taught "in the bread", he probably let him like their opinion. 5)

(8) Although I do not want to tell you, Christian reader, in any way that Luther taught it, but in a little sermon that did not go out four or five years ago, but within three years. Now consider the opinions next to each other: no longer bread, but bread changed into corpse; still bread and corpse with each other, yes, one flesh-bread; bread and corpse with each other, corpse under the bread, corpse in the bread; whether there are not three opinions here, 6) which Luther himself counts as three? He does not hold with the popes; so he does not hold with the [Swabian] priests; for they do not hold that the bread of the corpse is the same as the bread of the body.

1) Marginal gloss: Is fin Luther's Confession, in the bow u at the 4th panel. fNo. 21, § 13. End.)

2) Marginal gloss: With what harnesses one becomes recognizable in God's word.

3) d. i. nothing.

4) d. i. more discordant.

5) For this statement by Zwingli, compare No. 21, §§ 11 and 12.

6) Side note: Luther's crowd is not of one mind.

Christ's name, but in the bread. And has a special opinion, as first reported.

9) These three opinions are also not to be made one with any words nor Schweytzen 1). The popes leave no bread there; Luther leaves bread there; Luther makes the bread itself the corpse of Christ, and still remains bread; the priests also leave bread, but not that it is the corpse of Christ essential, but the corpse of Christ is eaten under or inside. I reckon, well like the pillule 2) in an egg. Let the man come forth who can say that these opinions may be agreed upon some way! Where do you fine grommets fall here? 3) Luther truly does not hold it with them.

(10) But he puts it to us that we are not one, since no understanding has ever been born that can say that our words do not have one meaning. For that Ecolampadius speaks: This is a meaning of my corpse, following Tertulliano; and I: This means my corpse, repeating Ambrosio; cannot give more than one sense: This means my corpse; and: This is a meaning of my corpse. Who is the one who understands two things here?

But we want to hear Luther himself from both of us! who speaks in the capital E at the first tablet thus: 4)

Luther. "Where Ecolampad makes signs, Zwingli makes interpretations, and is one opinion without other words" 2c. So it goes, if one deals with God's word out of quarrel, and it goes right for us; for this is nothing else at all, but to seek the honor of man, not God, nor the truth.

How well is it now, in the beginning of the book, to make such a long and broad one, as we are in disagreement? (for he speaks of me, I do not leave Ecolampadius' speech, but deny it; which he cannot indicate with one letter) and at the end himself recognize that we are of one opinion? And this describes him not only in this place, but so often that we (if God wills!) want to reverse all his errors from his own words without need. But the fact that Carlstadt's opinion of] the words acted differently stands with ours does not indicate disagreement; Carlstadt himself is also not in dispute about the words. But the opinion is unanimous. In substance and essence, it is nothing but bread and wine; in sacrament, it is glorious bread, a honest bread, which is to be eaten with cultivation and remembrance of conscience. But they [Luther and his followers] are not one even in the present, as has been heard before.

Luther has evil 5) for good, that we teach how a dina may be taught with various meanings, words and parables, as if it did not serve the cause. But behold, godly princes, if this serve not, if he reproach us, that we are divided into many opinions; but we say no every way. For other words and other words do not need to be proven to be a conflict of opinion; it is ever necessary that we indicate where an opinion is spoken of and described with various words.

He teaches how not to use different words in the night meal, but outside of it. Do we teach differently? Or where have we ever meant by one word that the words should be changed? Why does he put it on us? It is a fact that our books are not read in Saxony; he may freely say what he wants to us; we hope that our books will not answer for it.

15) "Zwingli and Ecolampad (he says) 7) have never made it certain with one letter that 'is' is so much as 'interprets', or 'body' so much as 'body sign'." Read our writings! Yes, pious princes, we again humbly request, for the sake of God and truth, that you recommend to your scholars to read our previous writings diligently: then men will see whether our meaning has been made certain or not.

However, we want to give a short introduction here. We prove by opposing scripture that the words may not be understood as they naturally read. There is no doubt that their opinion is broken. According to this, there is no thing either in heaven or on earth, if it may not be in the place where it is shown, but is shown in another thing, it must be signified by that other thing alone. So, the elect mother of God and all the elect may not come down, Luke 16, until the last day. Now if Mary is shown at Cloret, 8) Einsiedlen, Nach, Oettingen, since she may not be essential: then her sign, meaning or image alone is shown, and not Mary or the elect. So now Luther shows the body of Christ in the bread or at the bread, which may no longer be on earth, except for the judgment, which is not yet here; so it follows that everything that is called his body is not his body, but means him alone.

(17) For this reason his defiling of our minds is valid as much as it may be, since he says: 1) "If our minds were right, we would not only deprive our adversaries of their minds, but we would also prove ours. To which words I am completely offended, so that I think that he writes what he wants, but his conscience sees that their sense is overturned. But be that as it may; would it be useful, 2) if we alone had reversed their reasons? But this is not alone; but we have fortified our minds thereby with grave proofs of the Scriptures.

18 But his speech serves strongly against himself. For he then teaches how "to break" in the words of Christ may be taken for offering and breaking forth, "to be poured out" for pouring out, and says, after much shaking and trying, that he does not want to indicate anything certain in it; although he, forgetting himself in three leaves, builds on it, as will come afterward. How, that he does not teach the sense certainly? or, if he is uncertain, that he teaches it? Accordingly, he thinks he has stated the matter correctly when he says: he knows that the body of Christ is there, but he does not know how? Yes, in previous books he 3) wickedly says: he lets him take care of it, how it is there. Why does Luther not teach this clearly? Or is the spirit false, which does not teach this; how is it about his? although we have fastened our doctrine without deception. To this all theologians have always said: We may well know what God is not, as that he is not a plant, stone 4) or animal; but what he is, we may not know. genus est, non essentialis distinctio, sive differentia, qua species constituitur et cognoscitur Why then is he angry with us, that not we, but he himself does variously?

19) When he therefore begins to go to the matter, 5) he relents that John is not Elijah; but denies that we have ever proved that "is" may be taken for "means." For

It is a rule that one should not easily step away from the old interpretations and accept new ones: "unless the text and the understanding compel, or are proven from other places of Scripture. 6) Although Luther sets many rules in this book that overthrow his own presuppositions, as will come later, we gladly leave them to him, because we have kept them intact in all parts. We accept new interpretations alone, because the text and the understanding compel us; not our understanding, or the dead letter, but the understanding which we feel in true faith, which also the spirit that makes alive teaches. We accept new interpretations alone, since other places of the Scripture force us to it. As also in this trade insurmountable words force us to understand "This is my body" not according to the first appearance of human reason.

20) But that he confesses that John is not Elijah, this is right in conflict with the rule which he subsequently sets [in the arc] o 7) in the 4th tablet with the words: Luther: 8) "For this is a certain rule in all languages: Where the little word 'is' is used in a speech, one certainly speaks of the essence of the same thing, and not of its interpretation."

How does Luther keep his rule when he confesses that John is not Elijah? Is this taught with earnestness and truth? Yes, he says, John is not Elijah, but he is like Elijah. This is also what we say, that "is" in Scripture is not taken all essential. Which we show by the words: Elias meant John; or: John "means", that is, is like Elias. As when we call a counterfactual a meaning 2c. However, we see for once that Luther's rule, placed in the [bow] o, may not stand, and he separates himself, if he confesses that John is not Elijah.

22) But there he uses 9) a nice little trick, where he teaches how the words are changed, so that the same words become many words. And he takes the innocent Horatium to his aid, and speaks thus: Luther: 10) "From this it is seen that one word becomes two or four words, when it gets another new interpretation over its common interpretation. As 'flower' is another word when it is called Christ; and another when it is called the natural rose.

and the like; item another if it is called a golden, silver, or wooden rose."

23. Watch here for God's sake, pious princes, where it comes to us poor people, if we do not want to be overcome! Who has thus spoken: One word becomes four words? It is true that they have said this: One word may be called four; but that the word should become more than one is not so.

Example 24. I want to take Luther's "rose" right away. Rose means actually, essentially and naturally the flower, which is recognized to us all. If I then also call a wooden or paper rose a rose, Luther says that it has become a different word. Here I would like to ask him to spell the new word for me; then it would undoubtedly be, even from his own mouth, just the previous word: "rose. Why does he then speak, of which words are many? Oh God, so that he can argue how the formed rose is a true rose, and yet the natural rose is also a true rose. So also here, if the bread is called the body of Christ, he may say: It is the right corpse of Christ, and the natural corpse of Christ is also the right corpse. For if he did not want this, it did not serve his new seal, nor did he make so many words of it.

(25) But how well it is, we will show with childish examples. When the children in our country flake 1) or doll, the pennies are florins to them; the pails are bread to them, and the water in the little barrel is wine to them. Here also the sensible take it after them, and say: This is their bread, wine and gold. So lead the children over Luther's purse, take away his florins, and put their florins in his place (so that he does not have so many of them to talk the Carlstadt out of; 2) that is a well-salted insult, pious princes, not disgrace), and if he complains about it, say: The pennies are real florins, because it is written in your rule: 3) "where 'is' stands in a speech, one certainly speaks of the essence of the same thing.

(26) It is also written in your other rule that the word is a new word, and you want to make with the word also the thing that is called the word. Yes, you say that the wooden rose is also an essential rose, because it has the name rose.

1) i.e. to play godfather.
2) This refers to the gold florin that Luther gave to Carlstadt at Jena as a sign that he would allow him to write against him.

has come. Eia! so also the penny is a real guilder. So one would also like to give them [the playing children] bread to eat and their wine to drink.

(27) But all mockery aside, this is the matter in this transaction: Every word is but one word, as also the logicians speak of univocis, aequivocis, and denominativis, and are called but many things; which many things may not make, that therefore the one word be many words. Thus one speaks; and not that one word becomes many words, but that [it] remains one word, and yet many things are named with the same one word. And if Luther indicates the lovely HORATIUM, as he speaks of innovation, I will say with leave that he does not understand horatium; for the word that is used differently does not become new; but it is used anew, and remains the old word. 4) And thus Horatius gives χα^Λ* ὑπα, λαγην [i.e. according to the ver.

changel the word that [which] is of the custom alone 2c. As, if I called Luther Cato (ut esset tertius Cato), I would not call him a new name, but the old one; I would not make a new word, but to a new man I would give the old name, which would be more suitable to me than the sow's fur.

But in this there are so many differences, why one word or name is given to many things, that it would be too long to talk about it here. But Luther speaks of it neatly, just like that physician who could not do more than one recapitulation, and speaks [in his book, in the arc] d in the eighth tablet: 5) Luther: "And so henceforth the Scripture is full of such speech, and is called tropus or metaphora in the Grammatica, when one gives two different things the same name, for the sake that there is a likeness in both."

29 Behold, is this not artificially spoken? It is all tropi metaphorae to him. Now it is no wonder that the feast-day preacher in Caesarea, who carries the silver dagger tied on his buttocks, says: he is now fully informed by Luther's book that there must be flesh and blood; or else we are Nestorians.

But we want to hear Luther further. Luther just there: "And then the same name according to the letter is one word, but potestate ac significatione plura, according to the power, custom, interpretation two words, an old and a new one, as Horatius says, and the children know well.

5) No. 21, § 31.

(31) First of all, consider the one word; for he may not speak one word, but must do so, lest he mistake "one word" and make it seem as if it were a new word. Therefore let me understand that he first says that the one name is one word according to the letter, but according to the ability, use and interpretation it is two words. Then he should say, "But according to ability, need, and interpretation, it is able, or needed, and interprets two things;" then he comes with such words, "One word becomes two or four words," since he should say, "One word is used variously and yet remains only one word (quorum nomen est idem), but means, or interprets, many things that are not one (res autem diversae).

32) On the explanation (note, you pious princes!) we speak thus: John is Elias. Here "is" is not taken essentially, because John is not Elias, as also Luther recognizes. So also the rule becomes false, since he says: "is" means the "essence"; for here it does not mean the essence, but only the likeness, as Luther himself recognizes: John is like Elijah. If one says, "He is a right dog," one does not mean anything else, neither that he is as selfish and unfaithful as a dog. So by all the examples he drives out with many words.

Christ is a right vine. Here Luther says: 1) "Zwingel does not look at the word vera; Christ is the right vine. For no language nor reason suffers it to be said that Christ signifies the right vine." But we well see that Luther can well disguise the word vera, or "right," into an unright place; for since he should thus say, Christ truly or rightly signifies a vine, or according to his language, Christ is like a true or right vine; he does not rightly reverse the [i.e., confusion], and say, Christ signifies a right vine; therefore, that in his language it does not read. But there is little in this; we argue with the two proclamations: John is Elijah, and Christ is a true vine, not exactly that "is" must mean "means," but that "is" must not be taken essentially; but that here Luther wants to have both and not have them, as is indicated enough.

34: "The seed is God's word, the field is the world, the reapers are the angels" 2c. Here Luther speaks: "Acker is the world", and must not speak: The field is the world; for he sees that, so "is" should be taken essentially, the kem

Have I no doubt, he will have to say: ager significat mundum, the field indicates the world. world. For there is not a metaphora, actually to speak, in interpreting. Well, before that, in the presentation of the likeness, I let [a metaphoram] be taken from the sowing, to mean the word of God; but after that, in the presentation, Christ will not say that the word of God is like a seed, for he had already spoken of such an opinion in the presentation, but the disciples had not understood it; therefore he puts to them what he meant by the words: field, seed, reaper, and says: "The field is the world" for: The field means the world 2c., and is this an insurmountable place, since "is" is taken for "means"; God grant how ill Luther lies with word fever.

(35) Seven oxen and seven years are called one thing, saith Luther. But [times] he says: "heißen," hoc est, significant, and should prove that they would be one thing; for we have attracted the same clientele, that "fine" or "are" stands in it, and is taken for "means. But if Luther wants that where "is, are, his" and the like stand, [such word] should be taken essentially; so he would have to speak: Seven oxen are essentially seven years; 2) but he speaks: They are metaphorae. What metaphors? What likeness have seven dreamed ears to seven years? But not so, dear pious princes! do not be blinded by words! the seven ears mean seven years, and were alone appeared 3) by God, that they should mean; were essentially nothing at all, ne σχις δναρ, but a pure dream, And also Luther may not deny this place, that "essence" is not taken for "mean".

(36) That he now often speaks thus: it is not possible for us to prove from Scripture that "is" may be taken for "means"; has as much force and glimpses as other speeches more. As when he says: we have never yet brought forth Scripture, which forces that these words may not have his and the popes' understanding; and may put down none of those of all that we have brought forth, as will come. So here, too, if we had no other evidence, neither the two next indicated, [it] would be enough. For that he

And if he does not know this, as I am concerned, he would do there is no one who does not see that it is not so, then well in many things; if he knows it, why does he not he must see whether seven ears are seven years. And if deviate from the truth? Thus it is also irrefutable that for "the is, the is, the is" 2c. Accordingly, that they use Exodus 12, "This is passover!" is spoken as much as, the same words so commonly for "that means, that" "This signifies," or is a signification of the passage; 4) and means, that means", that it is a wonder that Luther does therefore let Luther point the little word "This" to the lamb, not see this from himself without indications; for it is not to the protection, to the shoeing, to the staff in the hands, good to walk in the Scriptures without such a decision. to the hurried eating, to the thanksgiving, all with one Jesaiä at the 9. chapter stands thus: "The HErr will from another; then he does him justice. The second is that he misuses them more mockingly and unwisely than the Sophists did before.

41. first he says: this word which is given for you, or which is given for you, look at the substance or essence, and not at an accidens, that is, not at the importance; as, to be seen is an importance 1) 2c. Here I ask him: whether the body of Christ, when he spoke the words, was undeemable 2) and invisible or not? He cannot deny that it was deadly and visible. Secondly, I ask him: whether the deadly body was given to the disciples of the same time, or the non-deadly one? Let him gladly admit that Christ's body was on the cross, and that he was resurrected as one body according to the substance, so that he could not complain. If he says that the deadly body has been given to them, it certainly follows that it has also been given to them in a sensitive and visible way, because it is not deadly in an insensitive and invisible way. But if the unkillable body is given to the disciples, it was then killable and unkillable together, which is contrary to each other; for the body of Christ became unkillable only after the primitive state.

42 John 7 says: "Jesus was not yet declared. 3) But I have to put a stop to this, so that Luther does not break out; John 13 says: "After Judas had gone away, Jesus said: Now the Son of Man has been declared. Here Luther would cry out: He has already been declared, therefore the corpse was undead. But we say no to this: for Christ there mentions as having happened that which has not yet happened, but was near to happen, of which more will come hereafter; which, however, the words following make clear, as he says: "God will declare him in himself, and will declare him soon. Dear sons, I am still with you for a little while" 2c. After that he says, John 17: "Father, the hour is here, declare your Son" 2c. And soon after: "And now, Father, declare me with the clarity that I had before the world was created by you" 2c. These sayings I have therefore set all, that wheresoever a man striketh from, he should always meet with armor.

(43) If anyone would say, "He speaks here of explaining, when the disciples have preached him in the world, and have named him, and have made him famous, and have made him clear," it is contrary to this, "God will explain him in himself.

That is, with him, with himself. From this it can be seen that he does not speak of preaching. But if any man should say, He speaketh of the Godhead, which he desires to be declared; it is not fitting, for he was declared according to that, as he saith there, before the creation of the world. From this it can be seen that he desires to be explained according to humanity, which was not yet explained, but was only explained through death. As Paul also says to the Hebrews in the other chapter: "We see Jesus, who was a little humbled among the angels, crowned with glory and clarity through the suffering of death. And Philippians, chapter 2: "Christ emptied Himself, taking the form of a servant, and becoming like men, being in all likeness a man. 4) He humbled himself; he was obedient unto death, and the death of the cross; and therefore God hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above every name" 2c. Luther should have looked at such statements, and not have let himself be taken in by the old 5) tidbits, then he would have seen that the corpse of Christ was not once 6) declared and deadly, God gives what he says of substance and 7) importance.

44) It does not help to say about the miraculous explanation that happened to the disciples Petro, John and Jacobean, because this explanation was not the explanation that he gave after the first rites 8) nor a lasting one, but happened more because of the disciples, to give them a gustum or Bitz [bite] of his and our future glory and joy. The same explanation has no contradictory scripture, but that Christ's body may be mortal or immortal in the sacrament does not leave his own word, as it follows.

45) Although it would not be necessary to continue to deal with Luther's philosophy, because it is not only childish, but also badly Christian, to leave it at that. 9) But that the weak, who do not count his word higher than God's word, do not think that he is speaking God's word here; so note, pious princes and all 10) Christians! Luther overlooks here ampliationem and restrictionem, that is, the time hanging and explaining, and that makes him wrong. The speech, according to

3) d. i. transfigured.

The following is the form of the ampliatio: It often happens that we speak of a thing that is no longer so, or that is not yet so, and yet is present in our understanding, whether it is no longer, or not yet. As when one says: Adam is as well a man as Christ. Now Adam is 1) not a man, but Christ is, for Adam's body and soul are not together; now man is of 2) body and soul. Let no one be mistaken here that the dead are called men! It is known that the body sleeps and the soul lives, and for the sake of life and nobility 3) the soul is called man, as all philosophers say. Still, if one says in a speech: Adam is a man, we understand that one wants to say of the being that he once was, but now is not; still, he is in our memory or understanding so that we can think that he was composed of body and soul, just like us. And while he was still alive, it was as true: Adam is a man, as now Luther is a man, although he is a great, great man. While Adam was still alive, it was proper to say: Adam is a deadly man. But now it is not proper; for though we speak thus, yet now we understand: Once, when he lived, he was deadly, as we are now; but now he is no longer deadly.

46. of the future. "I have commanded you to eat and drink at my table" 2c. Luc. 22. Here the disciples are ordered to be fellow measures 4) of Christ in the kingdom of God, and at the same time each of the disciples could rejoice that he was already a meal companion of Christ. But how was he a companion in heaven, who was scourged, beaten and beheaded daily? He was a fellow-measurer only in mind, spirit and faith, but not yet in the essential work and ingestion. Yes, it is not possible that he may be present, because man is in this time [Zeitkauf, saeculo]. "For man shall not see my face, neither shall he live," understand bodily, Exodus 33. Here we see that man is indeed presently a table-sitter of God, according to his substance and nature, but that he essentially sits at table with God in the Kingdom of Heaven, that is not at all. Now Luther would like to say: They are essential and substantial.

Table-sitters of God, and may well speak: This is Peter, who will become a meal partner of God in heaven; for the very Peter who is still alive will also sit at table with the body in its time. I would say: Thank you! But tell me, whether Peter (whom we write here in life) is now [yamjam] in heaven above, and have the heavenly joy or not? He will have to say: No. So also, if I show and say: This is Peter, the table-sitter of God, who is in heaven (for we speak for and only of Peter, who is still on earth), it follows that I speak falsely and wrongly.

(47) So also when Christ says, "This is my body, which is given up for you," it is necessary to leave the meaning of Christ's body: Who also is risen from the dead in substance and essence; nor does it follow that his body is already there, as it was after the resurrection; nor does it follow that Peter, who is here, is above, though he will come up in his own time, body and soul, and have joy with God. And therefore the word is: To be given up for you is to die for you. That "to die", therefore [that] it is an importance of his accidens, which attaches to the substance at one time, and not at another; for ever Christ may not die after the manner of the body declared, Rom. 6. "After Christ is risen from the dead, he dieth no more": so the word "die" bears with him, that (since he was deadly when he spake this, and spake not in time to come, [or else the disciples would not have eaten him, as mine], but in time present: "This is my corpse, which is spent for you"; 6) and being deadly does not befit the future declaration), 7) - that the deadly [mortality] must be attached to the corpse, so that they must have eaten the deadly corpse, and we still today; and if he were deadly, he would also be sensitive, not only with seeing, but [also] with grasping, hearing 2c.

This becomes even clearer if we also add the past time to the declared corpse, thus: This is the corpse of Christ, which is given for you. It was probably appropriate to speak according to the original: This is the corpse of Christ, which is slain for you? for it may then no longer be slain, and what is then spoken in the present time must befit the same declared corpse, or it is not present, but

The only thing that is understood of the corpse is the way it was before. Thus, what is spoken of the body of Christ presently, because it is still deadly, which does not befit the body that is declared, must also be understood according to the manner of the deadly; and what is spoken of him presently, because of the body that is declared, but because it is still deadly, must not be the body that is declared presently, but must be considered in the mind alone.

Now it comes into a summa. As I understand [the words] "Adam is a man" in no other way, than that Adam, when he was here on earth, was a man, and is no longer a deadly Adam, so I understand, when Paul says: "Christ does not die for the time being"; that the words are true only according to the original state, and not before, because he died. And again, "This is the body which is given for you," must be understood of the body alone, which was deadly, and because it was deadly; for the risen body is not deadly for us. Now if the deadly body of Christ had been given to the disciples to eat at the time when it was still deadly and could not be declared, it would also have been given to us to eat; and if we ate it in this way, it would not yet have been declared. Such a pretty thing comes from Luther's Zürlimürli [parrot language].

50 But if the mangy sophists (so that their humps are also itched) want to say: Hoc est corpus meum, quod est vel erit clarificatum, that is: this is my corpse, which is already clarified "is", or is clarified "will", here the substance and essence remains, and may nevertheless be understood by the corpse, which takes on the importance of the clarification [transfiguration] only after time. Answer: Well, the little vixen comes before March, brings the bellow itself again. But if the restriction or explanation of the declared corpse does not stand here, but the explanation of the deadly one, which rightly disputes the explanation: Dear! then say, do you want to be pious about your art, whether you do not have to amplify: This is the deadly corpse, which is declared or will be declared? Must say yes. But now he was not declared, you also say yes, and was presently deadly? But [times] Yes: so the disciples must have eaten the deadly corpse, and not the declared one.

(51) Secondly, you know well that the one part of the amplification, that is, the hanging in time, does not have to be true at one time, but only understood. As: "Adam is a man," let [me] not be mistaken that the Sophists say: Adam fuit horno (for they do not know themselves, Where the amplification belongs in the Rhetorica) one must therefore put to right: Adam is now a man, or: has been a man. Here it must not be asked; for that, according to the present, "Adam is a man," is false; but in the mind, "that he has been a man at some time, and is not now," is the other part, and is true. So here I ask on the bare words, and will also venture with Luther, "this is my corpse." Is this, as it is shown here, the declared corpse? If he says, "Yes," I ask, "Was it presently declared or was it declared afterwards? If it was declared at the present time, then it was undead, for it was not declared until after death; it may not die even if it is declared, and all the preceding declarations from God's word must be over. If it was only declared afterwards, then the disciples ate it only dings [conditionally] or on Borg declared, and we eat it baar declared; so we eat it ever not immediately with the disciples; But if they should have eaten him declared, present or future, and he was not declared present, it follows that the declaration was only in the understanding, not present; so the deadly presentness was the other part of the amplification; and if they ate the deadly body of Christ, one follows the other: If it is eaten deadly, it is also eaten sensitive 2c.

(52) That Luther says: 1) "The Jews also ought to be round about, as they were in Christ's death": he is almost justified in this; for from this one sees how piously and honestly he acts, when he speaks of things that are outside the substantial body of Christ, which no sophist, so evil 2) has ever been, has ever attached to the substance, as their own attributes. For to be deadly is such a quality that there is no man in this time who is not deadly; and though it is an importance, yet it is not an importance as to be wise, to be foolish, to be white, to be black 2c., and yet these are in and of the substance itself; but an importance, as being reasonable; as we have been taught in the Isagoge Porphyrii: de differentiis essentialibus, speciem constituentibus; imo in antiquis exemplaribus arbores vidimus, in quibus animal priore divisione secabatur in animal mortale et immortale; secunda dein, animal mortale dividebatur in rationale et irrationale. Sub immortalibus ergo continebantur homines ex mortuis aliquando resurrecturi; sub mortali, hi, qui adhuc in humanis agunt. [Of the essential differences, which distinguish the

2) eßtächt - ass-like (?).

Indeed, in ancient specimens we have seen trees (in the manner of a family tree) in which, by the first division, a living being was divided into a mortal being and an immortal one; then, by the second division, the mortal being was divided into a rational and an unreasonable one. To the immortal (being) were now counted those who will one day rise from the dead; to the mortal those who still live in this world].

53) And to be dead is not a coincidence, but such a peculiar thing, that the man before the departure from this time may be as little dead, as little he may not be a man. And again, if he is declared after the last day, it is impossible for him to be dead, as it is impossible for him not to be; but the appearance 1) of the Jews who were around the cross does not serve this purpose, because they are not of the body of Christ, so that they are also not an importance belonging to the substance. 2) Now if the body of Christ was mortal at the time of the supper, the disciples would have had to eat it mortally, as Luther also suggests; or if the disciples had eaten it declared, which may not be, for it was not yet declared in the supper, as has been heard: then it must have been mortal and declared at one time, and must have died before it died; for declaration certainly comes only after death. If he was now declared in the night meal, then he had been dead before his death. These and other nonsensical Marcionian ravings all come from the fact that one wants to fight against God's simple word with man's reason.

(54) If Luther no longer speaks, because we are mad enthusiasts, devil spirits 2c., and can do nothing at all; but he is everything, and also wants to teach us Peter in Spain 3), they think it must be so, and therefore do not allow themselves to be paid, 4) but forbid them to read the books of his opponents. On the other hand, 5) he half-bribes them of their scholars; for if he hangs the horse, they are put on their butts, that they may not say "kauw" 6) against open error. For I have no doubt that there are still some in Saxony who see that we do not argue a substantia ad accidens, but they are not allowed to say so.

Thanks are still due to the honorable authorities of my lords in Zurich (although we do not stand well together, there is human weakness), who do not hold us all in town and region otherwise than that we must give each one an account of our faith and doctrine; yes, I alone am represented twenty times, but in those more to the Anabaptists than to others; and if God's honor has triumphed always, praise be to Him!

55 Now let us speak of restriction, that is, purification. Purification is a word that distinguishes one thing from all other things. As when I say, "Bring me the skirt that is first bleached 7). Here "which is first bled" is a purification before all other skirts. Luther speaks of this on the other tablet, 8) and makes the words "my body" a purification, which may not be suffered according to the Logica, and calls it explanation, and "which is given for you" is a purification in all Logics.

So also here is the explanation, "who is given for you", that is, is killed, which takes the name of the declared corpse. And call the deadly and explanation accidentia, important things, although they are essential and indispensable qualities, each in its own time; nor is the deadly introduced by us, but Christ himself had expressed it, and thus explained his words. And still remains the substance, eadem numero, One, but of a new form. Now if "he that is slain for you" be a restrictio or purification, that where he gave his body to be eaten, he would have given it, being slain; and yet he is not slain eaten, according to their saying; for if he were slain eaten, he would also be visibly eaten, and sensibly 2c.: so it follows that he is neither slain eaten, nor declared bodily eaten. For the word "who is slain for you" purifies, that the words "this is my body" alone must be understood of the body of Christ, when he was dead (for he speaks them when he was dead), where the words are to be understood according to the first appearance. For if I say, This is the hand that was burned 9) to me, will I ever say that [it] was burned, but is recovered. And if I say, This is the hand that was burned to me, I will ever say, It was burned to me, and is burned again. So, "This is my body, which is given for you," indicates that the body is deadly, and is given for us with death, not with death or death.

Explanation; because first he did not accomplish the work of salvation, but with dying.

57 Here the holy or pious man who wrote against me in Latin also has his foolish argument dissolved, since he says: I argue from the substance, essence, to the accidens, to the importance, and make a syllogism; as the students are taught to forgive false eloquence, 1) thus:

- 1) Everything you bought yesterday, you ate today;
- 2) Yesterday you bought raw [rouw] meat: 3) So today you ate meat raw.

So I am told he is acting against me: for truly I have never had time to read his book of one. Leo 2) has shown me on the walk this account; that only besiege, devout Christian. This account adds in the other speech that is not understood in the first; that is the word raw [rouw]; for in the first one understands that one speaks only of the substance of what is bought, God gives how it is boiled or roasted, but that it is eaten. In the other, however, one introduces an importance, the crudeness [Röuwe], which one does not provide for in the first; for where one provides for it, one would not have let it linger, but would have had to form the [former] thus for us: Everything that you bought yesterday, you ate today, just as it was when you bought it; for in this way no one would let up on it.

58 Now let us also set our syllogism or account, and see whether we also secretly conceal something in the first, about which we introduce an importance in the other:

- 1) Christ's body is given for us;
- 2) The bread is the body of Christ:
- 3) So also the bread is given for us.

But as "to be given for us" and "to be killed for us" are one thing in the matter, I will now make the other, which has one [that is just the same] form with the foregoing, but is clearer for us, and urges the adversaries to more ridicule:

- 1) Christ's body died for us;
- 2) The bread is the body of Christ:
- 3) So also the bread died for us.

59) Here I ask the Holy Father, 3) whether the first one is true? [He cannot deny it, for it is the first and foremost in the Christian faith,

1) i.e. to beware of 2c.

2) Leo Jude.

3) Here Zwingli addresses Luther with these words, as can be seen by comparing this paragraph with No. 21, § 44, and calls him a pope.

that Christ died for us. Therefore I ask him: where in the other is an importance introduced that did not appear in the first? For I do not want to introduce anything in the first one but Christ's body and death; so in the second one there is no accidens or importance at all, but bread and Christ's body. Where then do I argue a substantia ad accidens? I mean, we are half possessed with fools. And shall such fools 4) seduce a pious simple-minded people with vain lies. Who will tell the simple what syllogism demonstrativus is? What is major extremitas, minor and medium? and how in the holy man's other proposition an importance is introduced that is not introduced in our other? Then they stand and argue, 5) as we are buffaloes, they cannot understand it; so every trickster wants to be subtle, and understand well.

Summa, we do not argue a substantia ad accidens, but we freely say first of all: not simply "is this the corpse of Christ", but "is this the corpse of Christ who dies for us", and point in the first supper to the corpse of Christ who sat with the disciples. Must Luther himself say yes. So we ask Luther: whether the bread in the first supper is also the body of Christ? Without a doubt he cries out loud: Yes. So it follows that the bread must also be given for us in death. We ask further: Is the body of Christ, which sits with the disciples in the supper, bodily and sensibly given in death? But if you answer [times]: Yes. Further, is the bread (which was eaten in the supper after the words "this is my body" 2c.) the body of Christ sitting with the disciples? But [times] Luther says: Yes. Now it follows that the bread is the deadly sensitive body of Christ.

61. These syllogismos, or accounts, all our adversaries set up with rogues, heretics, knaves, fools, asses' heads, and such like thunder-axes; 6) but with a thorough saying, or even with substantial philosophy, they do not indicate where he is not right; for they say we argue a substantia ad accidens, which is not at all; but we recognize the unbetrayed words of JESUS CHRIST our SAVIOUR to be framed with such prudence: "this is my body, which is given for you", that we see that the words "given for you" are a purification, that he

4) i.e. fools.

6) "aufthun" here -resolve, cancel; otherwise in the meaning: to explain, to make gelmd.

Then speaketh he of his body as it was dead; and if the disciples did not eat it so, neither did they eat it declared; for he was not declared then, neither hath he two bodies; it follows that the thanksgiving with the bread signifieth or signifieth the body of Christ which is dead to us.

But Luther argues a substantia ad accidens, because he says: 1) "I point with my hand to heaven and say these words: There sits for the righteousness of God the body that was given for us. He must indeed sit there visibly, or there is nothing there at all" 2c. Behold, pious princes, whether here Luther does not deal in humbug? As he shows me into heaven, so he should tell me: This is the body of Christ; so he says to me: There is the body of Christ. Is not the ubi, the place, or where, an accidens? Why then does he put it in my place instead of the substance? But it is Brendli Murer's work; what they use in one place, they break open in another.

Here I ask you, pious princes and all Christians, that you forgive me for the sake of God, that I have brought so much gossip from the poor meager philosophy. It had to be, so that Luther and his servants would see that they are keeping their blind casts in vain. For the time being, I will train myself briefly in such things.

64. but this is sweet, because he speaks: 2) "When Jesus hid himself, John on the 8th Cap., and went out of the temple, I would say: There goes the body, which is given for us" 2c. And comes but with the ubi, and may not say, this is the body of Christ, for he may not show it with his finger, it is invisible. Nor does he want to show it, and he will be missing it as soon as he shows it in the bread. For this reason we do not speak here of the effects of Christ, but of our eating his body. But we have talked enough about the accidens.

That we know that the disciples of Christ ate his body in the night meal; 3) is not at all, is not invented even with a letter, God grant! how many words Luther sheds on it. For that we have spoken: If Christ had given his body in the night meal and made it with the words, "This is my body," he would not have given us authority to make his body. This does not let up that he gave it. As I do not slacken, that Luther is a child, if I therefore say: If Luther had wiped his noses on the Ermel, then he would be a child. But he says, I have let them be words of fact; therefore I have let them eat the body of Christ. Yes, of course I have let it be words of fact; but not of fact that Christ's body was eaten in the flesh, but that new thanksgiving was done, accomplished, and instituted; and it is all an open calumnia, intercourse.

(66) Luther calls it a "Büberei" (4) that we divide words into "Thätelworte" [verba] and "Heißelworte" [verba mandati]. I drop here that he understands my words badly, also gives them a strange form. Even if he does not reverse them for me, I should still be lucky that they are understood. I have called words of action, which comprehend a simple action; hot words or words of command, which command something. If I now say that the words, "Take, eat, this is my body," are words of action, and the words, "Do this in remembrance of me," are words of heat, is this wrong? If he says, "These words are near one another," I ask him, "How far are they from one another?" Luke, in the 10th chapter, says, "I mean that he who was kind to him was his neighbor. Then Jesus said, "You have decided rightly, go and do likewise. Are there not also words of action before, and hot words after?"

Luther does not like to be taught, but he is so often wrong in this matter that he is also wrong in other places; 5) for the words of Matthew, chapter 21: "Truly I say to you, if you have faith and do not doubt, you will not only do what happened to the fig tree, but if you say to the mountain, 'Lift yourself up and throw yourself into the sea,' it will happen: Lift yourself up and throw yourself into the sea, it will be done." Yes, Luther calls the words Heißelworte, 6) and does not see that they are words of promise. It is enough for us to see how a man's face is lost when he is in great terror, as Luther is standing here. He sees that their opinion is gone, and argues sicut desperati, like the esteemed. For when he says, "We should prove the words of the Bible with Scripture," he does not see that there is not one word without Scripture.

68 He may also not attack any, neither the certain: "Do this in remembrance of me!" because he cannot skip the same glimpfs half; and Lift it up, will make it into commanding and promising words with each other: Do it in memory of me! Make my body, and give thanks both together! If he proves that Christ's body was made with words, he proves that Christ also made it with words. And in the midst of this he contends against him, that Christ himself did not give his body bodily to be eaten; and may he not touch a hair of our head. Is not this petitio principii? idem probare per idem, ignotum per ignotum? that is said of the red pants! 1) We argue about the understanding of the words "this is my corpse," and thus indicate what the understanding of the words "do this in memory of me" is; which, from Paul's explanation [restrictione], teaches us that the words "this is my corpse" do not have the lack of understanding that our opponent shields. Thus Luther goes on, and wants to take from them the understanding that Paul gives them, with the understanding that he has never yet proved. As if someone said, "Why do you eat? He answered, "That I may live. Why do you live? That I eat. Why do you eat? That I live. Why do [you] live? That I eat 2c. So let one do this until [the] last day, and yet not want to be broken 2).

69) Luther 3) does not yet see that the words: "Lift yourself up and we will throw you into the sea" are an exuberant speech for such words: If you have faith, there is nothing so great that you will not do it. Luther thinks that this is speaking of throwing mountains back and forth; for when he looks at the tropos, he cannot let up on the tropos in this, but fears, as that child said: I will not a hurry [say], otherwise I would have to hurry b also; if he let tropos slacken in one place, in another also be forced. But it seems to me that Luther understood the word "command" in our previous scripture to mean "to promise," and we need it to mean "to promise," but there is not much to it.

70) Now when he speaks of words of action, which he calls "words of the word" (he likes to use "words of the word"), 5) he says: "And if Peter or Paul were to say, 'Your sins are forgiven you,'" he says.

As Christ said to Mary Magdalene, "Well then, this is a mere word; nevertheless, sins are forgiven" 2c. Behold, pious princes, how Luther is still in two great darknesses! One, that he does not see that the words: "Your sins are forgiven!" are promising words; for we call these promising words, which give lybrung (sic), security and instruction to the conscience with certain promise. But since here Christ makes safe, man cannot make safe; for he does not promise us that where we speak the words, sins will be forgiven. Therefore the words are words of action to us, but to Christ they are words of promise, that is, words of assurance and comfort.

The other darkness, so far from being serious that he does not see the word of John 20: "Whose sins ye shall forgive, they are forgiven them", that the words are not a power to forgive sin; for no creature can forgive sin, if sin alone is against God, Ps. 50 [51, 6]; but they are a recommendation to preach the gospel; and Marcus expresses the same opinion in other and clearer words: "Go, preach the gospel to every creature! He that believeth (that is, believes the gospel he hath heard) shall be healed.

[salvus] 2c. From which words (for they both write one opinion, which is also done and recommended for one time) we learn that the meaning of the words is: To whom you preach the gospel, which is the forgiven [gratuita] 7) remission of sin, ut remissio peccatorum sit periphrasis evangelii, their sins are remitted; understand, if the gospel is preached to their hearts; which, however, neither the apostle nor man may do, but the one Father, John. 6: "No man cometh unto me, but my Father hath drawn him." The apostle preaches into the ears, but God alone into the heart. "He is nothing at all who plants; and he nothing at all who waters; he alone who makes to grow is all." And if all the apostles were to say: Your sins are forgiven you! and the man himself is not assured in his heart without doubt by firm faith, he does not know that his sins are forgiven him until he has the spirit of God's Son, in which he cries out: O my Father! that is, recognizes that God is his Father, so faithfully and actually that he provides for him in all his life and concerns. Therefore, if Peter said, "Your sins are forgiven you," he would not say anything else, neither would he say, "Do you believe in the heavenly kingdom?

The Father, through the act of giving his Son for you, that he might be your Father; so your sins are forgiven you 2c. I have written about this in the first articles 1); I would also like Luther to have read them, as he does not want to be taught by us.

When he says: 2) "Christ calls us to speak these words," he does, as in all things, just as the person in Plauto: pactum non pactum; non pactum pactum est, speaks of the rich: that which is promised must not be promised; that which is not promised must be promised. Here he rages: "Christ has spoken the words. Where? Dear, show that! "Do this in remembrance of me!" Let Paul therefore hear what is to be done in memory of his body, that is, death, suffered for us in the body: praise and thanksgiving in the friendly and brotherly meal, as we drink with one another the bread of the church 3) and the drink of love. Although we have no way of knowing that the whole words of the Lord's commitment are not to be read, we ourselves should proclaim them in our churches.

(73) But this is why Luther wanted to say that the words of Christ were commanded to be spoken, so that he might color the foolish enthusiasm in some way, since they say, "The word brings it with it," but there is not a single letter in the whole Bible that God has promised us anything about certain words that are spoken. And as He wants us to speak the words, He does not give us a word, nor a proof, because "He would like to see who would say that they should not be spoken. 4)

(74) So he spake unto us in another place, 5) Saying, We hope that no man will gainsay it. But since we do not speak the same thing to beg to be believed, but when we have proved our mind with the evidence of the Scriptures, we speak accordingly as one speaks before a judge: We hope 2c. For the judge of our doctrine is the whole church.

75 Summa: The difference between Luther and us is in the place that we do not slacken that the words must be spoken at the evening meal so that they do something; for to do something is not to take the evening meal, but to come here with a believing heart 6) and give thanks. But that they are spoken, announced, or read aloud, as a statute, according to which one [will] do something, is read aloud; or as one read in the Old Testament to the paschal lamb, which, as it is written of in Genesis 12, as the Hebrews confess, and is also easily noted in the same place, so we forbear [that] the words should be read aloud. For even if Luther had an open word about reading, it does not follow that "speaking" or "reading" would make the body of Christ; it would be used of Christ in this way, and promised to us, that if we spoke the words as he did, we would also make his body as he did. The tweders 7) may never be invented.

(76) If he had said that we should make the sun and the moon, we would have done it"; he tells us that we are teaching rightly. But where did he tell us to make his flesh and blood? If Luther indicates this, then take the wreath. For what the words "Do this in remembrance of me" are able to do, Paul declares, and nowhere remembers the making. As it is said before and after.

77. "Moses," he says, 9) "did not bring the water from the rock by beating," we leave that; "but the power of God." "Thus," he continues, "his body is not because of our speaking or our words, but because of his hotness." Here Luther very finely (I don't know whether with malice or with deceit) skips over the whole promise, and areas he shows in. So it is written in Exodus 17: "Go before the people, and take with thee the ancients or counsellors of Israel; and the rod, that thou hast smitten the river with, take in thine hand, and go. (These are all commanding words.) And I will stand before thee there upon the rock; and if thou shalt smite the rock, water shall come out of it." (Behold, these are words of promise.) Now when Luther brings forth to the words, "Take, eat," 2c. also those: Here I will presently

And if ye shall say, This is my body; it shall be there, we shall see it without doubt 2c. But if this be not possible, it shall be with chicken's milk.

78 For the words "Do it in remembrance of me" (which we have eternally said) do not mean that we are to make the body of Christ; that [i.e., because], on the one hand, he himself did not give his body to be eaten, as is heard before and after; on the other hand, we are to make this thanksgiving with expressed words in remembrance of him, and not to make his body. Still so Luther in Mosi's words so freely omitted the promising words, I must ask him whether this was done with or without danger 1). If it is without danger, then look up, and do not teach another time, because he has well seen through the whole sum. If it is with danger, then he sins the highest sin, for which there is no need to ask, of which it says in Matt. 12 and John 5. For this is the sin in Holy Spirit certain daughter, falsify the recognized truth.

When he says: 2) "We must take the bread and bless it," he looks behind him and wants to be seen as having his hand on the fork; 3) that is why he makes crooked furrows in the field of God. "Blessing" is what the Pontiffs say; Luther borrows it from them, but Matthew, Lucas and Paul have ευχαρίστησαν, which is "to give thanks", or to praise God. Alone Marcus has which word however we have indicated before enough "danksagen" heißen, not "segnen", as the old women the Ungenamten 4) segnen, and the Pfaffen the patties. But "blessing" serves the purpose; it is supposed to be able to give power to a matter with the words, and to give Luther the ability to bring the body of Christ into the bread.

Soon after this he says: 5) We say that his body is there when we say: "This is my body. Here is, of the first, our one grace to Luther (let stand as he will, the difference of the words 2c., though he does not like it), 6) that he gives us the words report from God's word, when we say, "This is my body!" that [it] is the body of Christ; for we have never yet been told that Christ Himself gave His body bodily to be eaten: then it is not possible that the words "Thut's zu Gedommniß" ("Do it in remembrance") should be used.

my!" recommend us to bring the body of Christ with the words. 7) Luther should prove as the first that Christ had given his body bodily to eat, and therefore prove the conception 8). That is said enough here!

81) On the other hand, for God's sake, see with what ghost of words Luther walks! Here he says: If we say the words: "This is my corpse!" then his corpse is there, 9) and Christ does not say: There is my corpse; but: "This is my corpse" 2c. If this has not fallen from the substance to the accidens, I never see the Gugger 10). Yes, he says, because Christ does not say to us: This is my body! or: There make my body! but: This is my body. Then I ask him for God's sake to tell us, "Is the body of Christ in all the bread? Says he, Yea, but the words shall not be in the supper, nor in any thing, if it be before." Says he: No; but when the words are said, "This is," 2c. he is there, as he first spoke: so it ever follows that he who was not there before is there now; so he is only anew "come thither," which we take for become; though Luther supposes we look for him by the word "become," for he says, "We say, his body, which was made and became long ago," 2c. And will press him, [in] no way, with the word "become." But this we say that Luther himself does not stay with the word "is," since he immediately means to keep to it. For he denies that Christ is in the bread, as has been said.

82) Secondly, he says: 11) The bread is the body of Christ, and both are bread together. But here he says, there is the body of Christ. So I ask him, what 12) he shows us, if he says: there; does he point to the bread or to the supper? If he points to the bread, then he wants to say that the bread is not the corpse of Christ, if he makes "that" into "there"; then every "is" is therefore taken from the essence, that the bread is not the corpse. If he points to the supper with "there"? then it is as before; then the bread is not that to which the word "that" points, much less may the whole supper be that; for Luther himself strongly disputes the Valette drink, which was not the blood of Christ. But the laborious word-fighting, indeed real sorcery, must help the matter, otherwise it is completely over. 1) Keep in mind that Luther negated "in bread" before; here he negates "that" and makes "there" out of it; and afterwards he again makes "that" out of [the same], so that it is sufficient for bread.

Luther, however, tastes like the garlic and onions in Egypt, so he says: 2) "Therefore, those who eat this supper do not need to have faith" 2c. Thus the pope must speak, if he were to pretend that the body of Christ was eaten here in the flesh; and if Luther also wants it, he must also speak in this way against his previous writings, since he wrote against the pope: where there is no faith, the body of Christ is not eaten; only the body of Christ is eaten by the faithful, but the unbelievers eat only a condemnation for themselves, not the body of Christ. These are without danger the words that he needs, I am quite aware.

But be it as it may. Watch, pious princes! When Luther speaks against the difference between the words of truth and the words that are called, he says: there are some with which faith is bound, as in the miraculous signs 2c., and some with which faith is not bound, as the words in the supper. 3) Here I [first] ask Luther whether the believer should not believe all the words of God, rightly understood? if he says yes without doubt. How then can the servant be sent to the ministry of preaching if he does not have faith, or to bring the body of Christ? Yea, if he prove with the false prophets, and with them that did eat his body unworthily at Corintho, I say, Why speak of the error, that it may be with the minister, and faithfulness may not be with him? Is not this an open way of seduction? Shall I say: A prince must not be faithful, a councilor must not be wise, because there are many unfaithful princes and many unwise councilors? Shall one not speak thus: He who is not faithful to his people is not a prince; and: Whoever is not wise cannot be a councilor, and the like? Which prince is not faithful, he is a tyrant and not a prince; which is not wise, he is not a councilor, but a ruler? 4) Where I have found Luther not to have really understood the Scriptures, I have admitted to him that he has not understood the Scriptures.

still prefer it to the good of the consciences, but now I truly can't say it anymore.

(85) Secondly, I ask whether it is a miracle that Christ is eaten in the supper? There is no doubt that it is, for they perform not only one, but many miracles; and Luther must perform one, which neither can be nor will be in heaven or on earth, that is, that God is and does contrary to his own word; that is never possible. Now if the servant or magistrate did such a wonderful work here, how would it be for him to do it without faith? Now Luther himself says that faith is required in moving mountains; and Marci 16: "But to those who believe, these signs will follow" 2c. And it does not help here to drag in the one who did not follow Christ, and yet cast out devils; for privilegia paucorum non faciunt legem publicam, special exempted deeds do not make a law; but we are to remain with the common law of Christ: that where miraculous works of God are done by men, man must believe.

Thirdly, see, pious princes, how Luther's scripture stands here, where he says: faith is not bound up in preaching and supper. How does he prove it? He has not one scripture for this. But we have open Scripture against Luther's error. 1 Cor. 4: "This is especially 5) required of the servants of the household, that one be faithful." But why is one faithful to God his Lord? Without doubt, because he loves him and trusts in him. Thus the ministry of preaching requires faith. And whoever does not have it is not a servant of God, does not carry the word of God, but of the devil. So also in the supper: He who does not have faith would much sooner bring the devil there, neither the body of Christ. Yes, says Luther, that is described by God's power and word. Just as if casting out the devil, making the blind see, does not also insult with God's power and word. Rather, listen to the words of Peter, Apost. 3: "In the name of the Lord Jesus, arise and walk!" Did not the lame man stand up by the power of God? Did not Peter call the name of Jesus upon him?

Now, good princes, I will show you that Luther writes more dishonestly about things than the popes themselves. The popes have led a question: Whether the priest, when he speaks the words, this is my body 2c., must have will to "consecriren," "walk," or "bless," as Luther speaks, and have about this given this notice that: Yes. Et si quando non esset actualis intentio; that is: and if it were the case that one would not have a present will or intention for something, then there must still be a common habitual will; that is: that the priest has always been accustomed to put the will and mind there, he wants to walk in the body of Christ the bread 2c. Now whoever has ever had a will must ever believe that the words make this so. Behold in one proceeding, 1) what a butcher of conscience the mass is! See also how badly Luther falls when he writes that is not based on God's Word; namely, that faith is not required here! But this has pushed him to the point that we have indicated that no one can be sure whether the body of Christ is there or not. For if it should "come to pass" according to the words spoken, and the miraculous works require faith, and we ever know not whether the minister believes or not, neither would we know whether the body of Christ were there or not. Yes, this forced him to speak "with" the popes without Scripture, yes, against Scripture this final speech:

88.²⁾ Preaching the gospel and performing the supper does not require the faith of the servant. ³⁾ This concluding speech I carry to all creatures, that they prove the first part, that faith is not required in the minister of the word, from God's word. Let us see, who wants to take our reason away from them! But as I see it now and then, the final speech comes from the quiver of the pabst, so one must make use of it who does not have right arrows; for "no one speaks, the Lord Jesus, without in the Holy Spirit." 1 Cor. 12.

I had shown Luther with my finger where he found in Paul that bread is and remains bread, and that the body of Christ is called, not is. He takes this from me so impatiently, and makes so many words, 4) that whoever wanted to answer them would have to write a book as great as [the] New and Old Testament. And therefore let us prove lately that the words of Paul, "For as often as ye shall eat the bread, and drink the drink," 2c., have the sense of and explain what it is that was called corpse and blood before.

xxxxx, i. [e.] resumtio, that is, the taking up again, is such a form of speech, since one takes up again what was previously spoken darkly or inadequately, and makes oneself understood more clearly or sufficiently. As I say: Luther's pen is a bear's paw, no matter how far away; for as he wrote angrily and furiously against all men before, so he still writes, and cleans his writing nothing at all of invective. Here, the first words are quite tropical and dark: feather, hay as far, and bear's paw. Therefore, I take what I mean by this to hand again, and say that I understand his writing and his speech by the pen; by the bear's paw, the insolent peeling and the careless hammering, since he often sneers at himself, just as the bear himself hits the paw on the spit; hay and far here means, for and for, that he also does not measure up against kings (but who are far from him) and brothers. And here the little word ([vox] causalis) is a sure sign of the taking again; this indicates that one wants to purify afterwards what one meant with the dark words, and why one called another with different words; as is now heard. I have given another example from Rom. 4 in the sermon 6) at Bern.

90 When Paul therefore wrote the epistle to the Corinthians, and saw that the words, "This is my body," 2c. were well and truly written by the other evangelists, but might easily be taken into another sense, he and Lucas therefore made these words so clear and plain, saying, Jesus took bread, praising God, and broke it, and said: Take, eat: this is my body which is broken for you; do this in remembrance of me. Likewise also the cup after supper, saying, The cup, the new testament, is in my blood: This do, as often as ye drink it, in remembrance of me. For as often as ye eat the bread, and drink the cup, proclaim, praise, or magnify the death of the Lord, until he come.

In the words we see the epanalepsy, that is, the resumption, which follows after the word "for. And just as in the previous example of Luther's pen and bear's paws, after the little word "for" follows the explanation, what with pen and bear's paw: for as he was of unclean speech and writing before, so is he now. So here, too, after the word "for" follows the explanation of the three words, "corpse, blood, memorial"; in which one sees what Paul understood by them, namely, that he understands that which is served, not "flesh" but bread; not "blood" but wine; not "lightly remembering" (as one also remembers what he ate at night), but "with thankfulness praising, extolling, proclaiming, pronouncing". And speaks as if he spoke thus: "For as often as you eat the bread, which I first called the body of Christ, and drink the drink, which I first called the blood of Christ or the new testament, you shall praise God for the death of the Lord. 2c.

Here Luther will cry out for proof, so he has it: proof: Where the little word enim, denn, stands, there surely follows a cause or purification of the prior opinion, as the children learn in the Donat: da causales. But let us prove this with a few examples, of which the whole of Scripture is so full that there is not a leaf in the Bible where many such examples are not found. Rom. 7: "But I am carnal, and sold under sin: for that which I do I like not: for I do not that which I would gladly do, but that which I hate, that do I."

Here, pious princes, look at the two, and you will find that they are signs that give cause and purification to the previous dark speeches. "Carnal" and "being sold under sin" are both dark, half of the word "sold". Thus he shows from the beginning what he means by the tropum "to be sold"; namely, "to be owned by sin," just as a bought servant must do not what he but his master wills. So we also find prest-¹⁾ and sinful; and if we have God's knowledge, faith and love, everything that is against God displeases us; nor is the weak flesh so weak that something that is against God displeases us every day. And therefore he says, "For that which I do, it is not pleasing to me." And so from that time on, it would be spoken against: Why then doest thou it? but he answereth, xxx xxxxxxxxxx, 2) and saith, "Because I do not do what I would like to do, but" 2c.

94. 1 Cor. 1: "Christ sent me not to baptize, but to preach the gospel, not with wise speech, lest the cross of Christ should be emptied. For the trade or preaching of the cross is to them that perish a foolishness; but to those who keep it is the power of God" 2c. Here we see the little word "for," and understand by it that a causal explanation of the preceding words follows, which is to empty the cross of Christ, and for what purpose God intended the simplicity of preaching.

Accordingly, it is evident that if anyone wants to explain himself, he must speak clearly in the explanation, without doubt, and everything that was previously spoken darkly and with used words, must be presented simply with unused and unaltered words. But then Luther will cry out: Prove it, you wretched devil! So I will answer him: Not, "the devil!" Take the whole Bible, together with all the writings that are in the world; then do not invent a speech that is an epanalepsis, that is, a rehearsal, since it is not so. Gal. 3. says thus, "But since faith is come, we are no more under the schoolmaster." But here it is obscure what the schoolmaster is. And when we hear that he calls the law so, he expounds why we are no longer under the law, saying, "For ye are all the sons of God by faith in the Lord Jesus." Behold! how bright; behold! how all tropes are omitted, and nothing dark is spoken here.

96] To the Philippians Paul speaks thus: "Much more in my absence, accomplish your own salvation with fear and trembling. For it is God who accomplishes in you the will and the work" 2c. Here we have, however, after the little word "for" an explanation that is without any tropos, and again takes up the little word "working"; for the same brings something dark with it, namely, how man may work his own salvation, and speaks as if he thus spoke: "Understand me rightly with the working! Whether I call thee work, yet all the work of God is 2c., ut etiam sit μετάνοια, correctio, that is, an infraction.

The first is the improvement and a right naming and explaining of the work. So it is also here; 4) yes much brighter and stronger, because even close all epanalepses, i. [e.] Resumption, are in all Scripture. For as "corpse", "blood" and "memory" are written before dark, he collects them all three in the explanation, which is written after the little word "for", and thus explains himself: "For as often (see here, pious princes, as he also takes up the words "as often" again, so that one can see that he wants to explain himself about the previous darkness!

I called it a corpse, but it is only bread in substance, which you will eat 2c. as indicated above.

(97) This is now sufficiently evident to you, pious princes, that the manner of speaking of the words of the Greek language is wholly capable of this and no other; but that which follows after the words is also wholly conducive to this understanding, and thereby teaches us how Paul calls the bread and drink alone the body and blood of Christ, not that they are. And Paul continues on these words thus: L-rs, that is, "and therefore whoever shall be he that eateth the bread, or drinketh the cup of the Lord unworthily, he shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord." Here [you] shall see for God's sake, pious princes, that Paul, according to the explanation with which he set out, 1) has never put the body and blood to eating and drinking; but whenever he speaks of eating or drinking, he puts bread and cup alone to it, and that with such loud articles and pointers: 2) τὸν ἄρτον τοῦτον, that is, The bread .Of the supper of the night; or the bread of which we speak; or that, the bread which is only bread. That a wonder is that the world ever got behind the error we so actually see in the Greek language may not be suffered. And let this be said to all students who have not eaten more than half a quart of salt in the same language.

98 But here we must say, how is one guilty of the body and blood of Christ, if, according to the substance, he eats nothing but bread and drinks wine? This is what our adversaries say against us. As if the daily custom of all languages were not full of such speeches. The watchman falls asleep on guard; the reuter at the halt misses something, so that the prince suffers a great loss, or [the enemy takes him] the cord 3) even. Do not say now manly: The dissolute man is guilty at the pious prince. How? He did not kill him after all. True; but he did not watch when he should have. So one is guilty of criminis laesae majestatis against the prince, if one lewdly touches his legate or embassy; and yet does not touch the prince. So every superior is blasphemed if his coat of arms is reviled, and he does not feel this. Here Luther will cry out: Scripture here! Take care of it; everything is coming.

99. Matth. 25. Christ speaks in the person of the King, saying, "Amen I say unto you, that as often as ye have not done it unto one little of mine, ye have not done it unto me." Can we not here also speak thus: How can a man be guilty of not having fed, clothed, comforted, and taken into his house the Lord Jesus, when he is not 4) there? When our adversaries so splendidly throb in: How can one be guilty of the body and blood of Christ, if you say you do not eat them? So you see, pious princes, that those leave the Lord hungry and thirsty, who do not help his poor here with such deficiencies, 5) and he suffers neither hunger, frost, nor thirst anymore. And again, three will be equally guilty of the body and blood of Christ, who do not celebrate the supper of Christ with such faith, love, and discipline as befits the whole church, and each one should be especially consulted and reminded by Himself, which will soon come. And as little as the body of Christ may be clothed, and yet be guilty of it, whoever does not clothe it, as surely as he who does not go to the supper in a proper manner, is guilty of the body and blood of Christ, not which he has eaten, but whose sign, sacrament, and meaning he has misused. Such are: "He that receiveth you receiveth me"; "what ye do unto the least of mine is done unto me"; "he that despiseth you despiseth me." In all of these proclamations one becomes guilty of the Lord JEsu himself, or serves him himself, even though he is not physically present, nor is he bodily served. And so he becomes guilty of the hungry Lord, who may not suffer hunger, who does not feed him the bodily hungry, and becomes guilty of the corpse and blood of the Lord, which may not be eaten or drunk, who does not rightly commit the supper to him, in it highly praising and giving thanks for the death he has suffered.

100 "Worthy" or "unworthy" is not to be understood in the papal way for "without sin" or "sinful": for thus no creature would want to give thanks if we sin daily and say daily, "Forgive us our trespasses," even though there is nothing damnable attached to those who are in Christ Jesus, Romans chapter 8. We are indeed burdened with the daily burden, but it is not condemnably to us, if we are trusting in God. Now if "being worthy" is not "being unworthy," we must look at other places where "worthy" and "unworthy" are taken in Scripture. Matth. 10. Christ teaches the disciples, "if they came into a city, he would not be worthy.

to search who is worthy in it". But it is certain that Christ did not draw or direct his disciples, to whom he recommended nothing higher than love and lowliness [i.e. humility], to high-mindedness, nor did he say after the manner of the Pharisees: "Do not touch me" 2c. Therefore here "worthy" means skillful, decent, honorable, chaste. So also here "worthy" means rightly skillful, as it belongs to the supper, faithful, thankful, chaste and faithful, so that no one appears in it with unbelief, that no one does intemperance in eating or drinking, that no one despises his neighbor and does not wait from his poverty because of him 2c., as Paul shows them the presbyters. Luke 3 John says, "Do worthy fruits of correction." But there "worthy" is taken for rightly made, due, and proper. Bring forth fruits that belong and befit correction.

101 Now Paul continues: "But let a man prove himself, and so let him eat of the bread, and drink of the cup. For he that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh vengeance for himself, if he choose not the body of the Lord." But here we see how he puts eating and bread, drinking and cup together, not corpse and blood. Secondly, that after the word "prove" he calls it bread and drink. Therefore we may take it without doubt that Paul here supposes nothing of substance to be eaten, neither bread; for otherwise he would have said thus: "But let a man prove himself beforehand, that there be no doubt in his mind that here the flesh and blood of Christ are substantially partaken of, and therefore let him eat the bread again. But this is not so, but after he has said "prove" enough, he indicates that one should prove himself to oem bread and drink; not of substance, but for the sake of faith and discipline. Therefore, for the third time, we want to indicate to the ancients about this place that Luther cannot say everywhere: we speak, which has never been heard, even against the old teachers; but see that "prove" is not spoken of for the sake of the corpse's food, but certainly for the sake of faith, and for the sake of the church, which is the corpse of Christ; that in it no fornication be committed, nor the neighbor despised.

102 Ambrose speaks "about the 1st Epistle to the Corinthians", Cap. 59, thus about the present words: "Paul says that he is unworthy of the Lord who performs this mysterium or sacrament 1) differently, neither is it instituted by him. For he may not be devout who performs it otherwise, for

It is given by the author. And therefore Paul warns beforehand, so that the mind of the one who goes, according to the order given, may be godly for the thanksgiving of the Lord. For it is the judgment henceforth, that every man on the day of the Lord Jesus Christ take account how he goeth, so that they who go without the order of the use and discipline of the walk are guilty of the body and blood of the Lord. For what else is it to be guilty, neither to be punished for the death of the Lord, if he died for them that count his goodness void?"

These are all the words of Ambrosius, in which you, pious princes, see: I. That the devotion should be to give thanks to God for the good deed that he has shown us in the death of his Son. Now no one gives thanks for this, neither he who feels in his mind and soul the fruit and joy of his death, therefore faith is required above all things.

104 (II) You see that he requires the order and discipline of the offering, and whoever does not keep them is guilty of the body and blood; not whoever has eaten them unworthily in the flesh. But if Ambrose is with us, we recognize that one becomes guilty of Christ himself if he does not eat him, but does not eat properly that which is eaten in thanksgiving for his good deeds. But what order is, one learns from the disorder, which Paul punishes here.

The messes in the night meal.

The first disorder: When they came together, they became worse. So the first order is: That we should come together in thanksgiving for improvement.

The other disorder is that there was discord, division, and separation of doctrine and minds among them. Thus, the other order is that we be in one accord, which must be, provided we have One Faith and One Spirit.

The third disorder: That such divisions and discord were so hantlich 2) kept that it came to sects and gangs; but the orthodox remained with the discipline and use of God, and served the naughty outrages to the probation. This is the third order: that no one should become a sect, but that he should leave. There shall also be no one who will not give and take account of his doctrine or opinion in the church,' but, alas! do those who let themselves be deceived in this matter by a few, so that they do not know the truth,

From this we see that to decide does not allow to err where his spirit is. If the spirit of God the body of the Lord is nothing different, neither to decide is in a church, it may not be deceived into reading Luther's the church with its head from other assemblies, higher writings, which are nevertheless erroneous in this matter. and more special.

And again, if our teaching were erroneous, it would not be 111) The seventh order: That the poor were despised, accepted in the churches now and then. But not and therefore stood there ashamed, if they did not have interrogating and not considering with godliness and faith delicious food; indeed, some of them had nothing at all, is a cause of discord. For it shall befit the least 1) in the and the insolent, wanton rich dined and drank with church to prophesy in his order. splendor. 4) So the seventh order will be: Recognize that

The fourth disorder is that they came together, not as all who appear with us here are indicated to us by God as to the banquet of the Lord's thanksgiving, but carelessly, our members, whom we are to provide with food and recklessly, and wantonly, as one comes together to another banquet. Thus the fourth order is: That we come clothing as ourselves. This is not to despise the body of the Lord, but to esteem it highly and rightly, for we, the hither devoutly, with thankfulness and fear of God, giving multitude, are His body. Therefore, we want the order and thanks to God for the great counsel, that he took upon discipline of which Ambrose speaks to be proven from himself to make his Son ours, that we might be his [i.e. Paul, that it is nothing else at all, but 5) right faith and love of neighbor, in which man should prove himself.

God's] through him; that he made him, according to 112. III. Now we come again to Ambrosium. Thirdly, human birth, our brother in the flesh, that we might be Ambrose specifies the discipline of the vows: "and heirs of the eternal kingdoms. O delight and depth of whoever does not keep them will be guilty of the corpse and divine wisdom and goodness, when thanks are given to him! not only [because of] the incarnation and fruitful life and blood of Christ. And he does not say at all: of the and teaching, with which he instructed and educated us the corpse which he has eaten, but that he despises the dead as a schoolmaster, but first of all gave himself in death as corpse, if he joins those who give thanks, and is taken from fornication, not believing; therefore he despises the a sacrifice for our sin; in it he mocked, spat upon, death of Christ. For Ambrose says: "The immoral person is punished for the death of the Lord, not for the eaten crowned, scourged, struck in the cheek, insulted, reviled from body; so the immoral eater counts the suffering of Christ as wrong 6). And everyone who does not go with a right and cursed us 2c. Whoever, then, comes to these and their like actions with a mature mind, will go with mind and seriousness counts him wrong. Go now, Luther, earnestness, and not with foolish pleasure, as the and war with Ambrosio, not with us.

109) The fifth disorder: That they did not eat with each other, but each one ate and filled himself as soon as his judgments [dishes, feroula] were presented to him. Thus the fifth order is: That one should eat with another, that is, for thanksgiving 2) of unfaithfulness and contempt; wherefore now we do him no injustice, that we take the meal, which is to put up with hunger and thirst, according to the apostle's teaching, at home.

(110) The sixth disorder, that the whole church should be despised, every man eating as he pleased, and not looking to the church to eat chastely with one another. Thus the sixth order is: That we should eat the body of Christ, that is, the 113 Augustine speaks ad Januarium, epistola 118, thus: "This food alone does not want to be despised, just as the manna did not want to be despised. Then also the apostle says that this sacrament is unworthily received by those who do not separate it from other foods, with their own or more solid worship, which belongs to him. For from the time that he said: He eateth and drinketh judgment or punishment unto himself; he addeth, and saith: 'Not decisively the body'^" 2c. These are all words of Augustine. This is the epistle from which Luther in the front book so much; 1) but now he acts as if he had never seen it.

But you, dear princes, see that Augustine understands "prove", "unworthy to see" and "to decide the body of the Lord" with us!

(115) First, "prove," when he says, "Let the food be unworthy of consideration," and does not say, "Prove," whether we believe that there is flesh and blood here.

(116) Therefore, "That they are unworthy who count it no other meat" than the Corinthians did? It is not that they did not judge the food rightly, if they did not recognize that flesh and blood were eaten; for if this were so, Paul would have had to say of it above all things, and would have considered it the highest cause that they did not esteem the presence of the body of Christ highly enough. Moreover, if the Corinthians had ever been told that the body of Christ was bodily present, 2) they would never have fallen into such recklessness. Here we also see that we do not want to repress this sacrament because the body of Christ is not eaten in the flesh, but we indicate the actual worship and discipline, as heard above from Paul, so that the foolish horror, which we have received here from our writing, is accepted, and more proper devotion is adopted.

117) Lastly, Augustine says that those who eat vengeance for themselves do so because they do not decide the body of the Lord, and not because they do not believe it to be eaten. Now it is sufficiently proven from Paul that the body of the Lord is not to be decided upon, on the one hand, so that one does not come to this meal in any other way, neither to a filling meal. On the other hand, to despise the church, and the poor of the church. These two things are comprehended in the one word "body". For the church is the body of Christ, and Christ is the head. Now the head and the members are one body, therefore "to decide the body of the Lord" is to recognize Christ as the head, and the church as the members.

118 But Augustine says, tract. 62. in Joannem, thus: Be mindful why it is written: "Anyone who eats the bread or drinks the cup of the Lord unworthily will be condemned to death.

The body and blood of the Lord. For when the apostle speaks this, he speaks of those who took the body of the Lord as other food, without distinction and lightly." All this serves to show that "deciding on the body" is not to be understood as believing that the body is there; but that one held himself lightly in the meal, as in some other meat or company. But that Augustine here calls the sacrament the body of Christ should not grieve you, pious princes; for the ancients called it by the name by which Christ himself called it. But they also understood by the name what Christ understood. And as the Italians still today call this Sacrament corpus Domini, so it is called for and for, and yet only understood the Sacrament, that is, sign and special measure, which is carried around in thanksgiving.

(119) Now if Luther perverted all the order of our previous scholars, so that he cooked something that no one knew, and we are here at the place where we indicated to him that open places were also found in Scripture, in which it was learned that according to the substance there is nothing different here, neither bread nor wine, but according to the meaning and custom to be highly revered and feared, (2c) let us also compare the words of Luke about the cup before the supper with the words of Matthew and Marci.

120, Therefore hear, pious princes: The Hebrew way is to understand in the title of the matter the end and summa; as when we speak: When we slew the Duke Charles of Burgundy, we went against Nanze [Nancy], half of the forest 2c. Here the summa stands first, that the duke was slain, and the procession afterwards, which was before. As then in the biblical books daily is indicated, and the annotationes, with us excellently, testify, so is him also here. Matthew and Marcus 4) speak the opinion after the supper: "But I say unto you, that I will not drink of the vine 5) henceforth" 2c. With what words Christ Jesus has preserved for us the divine wisdom, that we may well see what it is according to substance, which he only before called his blood.

121 First of all, the Lord Jesus did not speak simply: I will not drink wine again; but by a periphrasis: "no more of the generation of the vine", periphrasis is as a much as a circumlocution, as when we say: The bold sword, but want to understand a bold man; the man's child, for: the man. But these circumlocutions should have the power that with them they actually bring forth the essence or quality of the thing of which they are. For it is much more glorious to say: There the bold sword appeared, neither: There the prince appeared; for the previous speech indicates that the prince was in [iron] and bold of mind and hand. So also the "human child" indicates to me either the human unfaithfulness and deception, or the human stupidity, which I do not understand in the word human, unless xxxxxxxxxxxx. Similarly, here "vine sex" is periphrasis, a circumlocution of wine. But the description or circumlocution brings with it that herewith Christ speaks of the essence and substance of the cup; and is not of the wine, as much as it is a sacrament, as if he thus said: That I have called my blood is according to the substance right natural wine, but is well a sacrament of my blood. Luther did not see this, and treats the vine like a sow treats an organ; and if he sows long enough, he strikes it so that the claves leap to heaven.

Yes, he says, before and before he acts this place: 1) If Christ had wanted something tropical to be understood in these words, he would have indicated it. As if it were the custom, when one speaks tropically, that he also always puts on the tropum; or if the tropus is a putting on, as periphrasis is, that he then first puts on what he wants to do with it. As when I said: Luther is a lynx; that I would add: That is as much as saying that Luther is as cunning as a lynx. And should Christ speak to him here thus: "that is", that is, "that means" my corpse. No one says, "Luther is a rude man," that is, he is crude and inhuman; but if someone wanted to rebuke him in this way, he would let it remain with the ruffian. But so that he lacks nothing at all, there are so many signs in the words, so many words; from this you can see that [it] is a tropical, used speech.

The word "that" forces Luther himself not to say that the substance of the bread is the substance of the body of Christ. For he immediately proves his praedication sur icksutioaru, that is, that the bread is bread and the body of Christ with each other, 2) and says: Yes, sacramental. For the bread is the body of Christ, as the scepter is the king.

The little word "is" must also force him not to understand it essentially; for if the bread is essentially the body of Christ, then the bread must have been crucified and risen, yes, born of Mary, suffered hunger with him in the desert, 2c., and no counter-argument does not help, for if it is essentially the body of Christ, then it must ever be encountered by that which is also encountered by Christ. Therefore, even if Luther complains, he still lets the word "is" be understood sacramentally 3), which is nothing else at all, neither "significant".

The word "my corpse" must also force him, because he who spoke it may not lie. If he has not spoken tropically or used, then it must certainly be his corpse; but if his corpse is taken from the lineage of Abraham, then also the bodily bread must come from the lineage of Abraham. His body also is taken in unity of the person of the Son of God, and the bread is his body: so also the bread must be taken in unity of the person of the Son of God. Dear! Release us, Luther, from the sylogismum, we do not know the Logica!

(126) "Who is given for you" is sufficiently indicated before also in other books, that they compel to understand the words otherwise. Not to mention the dissimilarity of the words in other and other evangelists, other and other articles, which will come hereafter; all of which compel to recognize the words of Christ as being tropical or used.

Now when Luther sees that Matthew and Marcus 4) are so unanimous in putting the words of Christ after the given drink of the supper: it is grapevine; he starts, like the false intercessors, 5) who can talk a hole through one's letter with a bit of eau de vie, and says: it cannot be, the evangelists must all three be unanimous, and speaks right; for they are unanimous, but not the way [that] he supposes. Accordingly, the number presses him, that those who put the words of the vine after the Lord's Supper are two, and Lucas, who puts them before, is one. Why does Luther not give an answer about our explanation, which we have therefore let go out before? Yes, after much distress that he suffers, [e.] Burckart has called it; therefore we must give him a tvenig hinters Fäl. 3) Behold, pious princes, in Luther's book, in the arc of the eighth tablet, 4) how honestly he holds himself in the words of Luke, which read thus: "I have desired with great desire to eat this paschal lamb with you before I suffer; for I tell you that I will eat no more of it until the kingdom of God is fulfilled. And when he took the cup, praising God, he said" 2c. Here Luther leaves with great diligence 5) eü/aj0t<?-7'<r "c, GOtt gelobet, dahinten: GOD thanks him! But why does he leave it back there? He has it before verdeutschet "blessed", so that he nevertheless strokes the simple ones something over the mouth. Should he now also interpret here that he has blessed the cup, it would become too loud among the simple, because they would think: Luther says what he wants, he needs "bless" in the opinion that one should understand that the words make the body of Christ bodily. Now if the cup is blessed here, and it follows that it is made of grapes, then Luther's blessed cup must also be wine according to the substance, and not blood, as Christ himself calls it after blessing. But should he interpret: He praised God or gave thanks, he would miss the blessing, which he made out of the xxxxxxxx.

7) [so] that they may prove all the glorious words: The word brings it with itself, so that they may anoint the simple, niener with [nowhere with]; for where do they want to bring about in the whole Bible, that some 8) words are determined, where they are spoken, that then it will certainly follow, which they read ?

129 The words: "In my name they will cast out devils" 2c., do not mean that, where the syllables "Jesus" are mentioned, that the devil is there.

But "name" here means power, authority and majesty, and so Peter drives the lame from the meager before the temple in the power of Jesus. (Apost. 3, 6.) Yes, they speak gloriously: The words bring with them that they read. This is true; they bring into the mind of man the opinion which they declare; as when Christ says, "Unto clean!" we are made to understand by the words, that the leper was cleansed by his divine power, that he had done nothing else to him, but only said, "Unto clean!" But that the closed] words bring with them, that they read, that is a foolish seal; or else 9) that poor farmer, who had no more than one cow, and heard that God would give him back a hundredfold here in time, would have done him right, since he gave her up; wanted to buy a hundred from God with one. Yes, since Luther saw that he would like to come right with the word "GOD is praised", he leaves it out nicely, and is, however, beautifully conceited, so that he frightens us that we may not punish it.

130] So hear, godly princes, the right reason and opinion of the evangelist Luke: All Greek books, which I have seen, have a great beginning at the words: "And when he took the cup" 2c. From this we see that the previous words are well and rightly understood, that he would never eat the old paschal lamb, but that he would then begin to count how Christ instituted the new thanksgiving; and therefore says of the cup alone, first of all, that where one has in Scripture of this sacrament, and at once is said only of the one part, the other is also understood. In the Acts of the Apostles, the breaking of bread is mentioned, but the cup is also understood. Here only the cup is mentioned, and what is understood of the cup is also understood of the bread. Now if the cup is the birth of the vine, the bread is also the birth of the ear or the mill. Secondly, Lucas sets the words for a title, so that the insert that follows may stand all the more gloriously after the Hebrew manner, as has been heard, and to prevent the words that follow from being understood by anyone that bread and wine are different in substance, neither really bread nor wine. And therefore begin to tell the use.

(131) That the first words of Luke are the title of the supper, and a forewarning, is proved by the words of Christ, Take this, and divide it among yourselves; for these are the very words which Matthew has, Drink ye all of it.

out"; and Marcus thus, "And they all drank dgraus." Both of which speak of the cup of thanksgiving. Therefore also Lucas speaks of the cup of thanksgiving. Cause: that neither in the New nor in the Old Testament nothing at all is invented, that s>s] had been a use in the old thanksgiving, to offer the drink around. But probably in Luther's "the new blasphemy", 1) that is, in the book against which we write here, the old bacchanal word is written: "Valetetrunk". Heben an ^zr/ smell garlic and Bollen 2) in Egypt. It is not enough that Luther, to prove his error, again runs to the old sophistic pieces behind him, he must also bring forth poor words that would be agreeable to the old priests 3). Oh God, oh God! How true it is: Who wants well, may easily be able; who wants badly, no art helps. When Luther wanted good, everything went well with his hand; but when he now goes the wrong way, what he takes in hand is lame. For when he is pained that Matthew says, "Drink, all of you, from it"; and Marcus, "They have all drunk from it," it all comes [from this] that he does not know the trvxvs and figures. There are two figures, one is called Prothysteron, the other hysterone proterone, that is, the anterior after that, and the one behind before that; since one says that which only happened after that, before that. As here, when Marcus says, "they all drank from it," but which happened only after the offering, thanksgiving, and after the words "that is," 2c. As soon as one says, "When we came to the Lord, he was kind to us; and when we rode into the castle, he met us. Here the kindness happened afterwards, but it is said beforehand. But when one says a summa beforehand, which one actually expounds afterward, that is prothysteron. So the speech is Lucian; [he] puts the summa beforehand 2c. as is heard.

Luther is also at ease in the aforementioned place that he refers to Augustine and says that he has almost worked his way through it. But why does he not say that Augustine is not of his opinion? Because the simple-minded should think that it is his turn, if he has only named him; they do not come over Augustinum. But Augustine speaks of the unification of the place thus, de CONS. evang. III. at the beginning: "That Lucas says twice 4) of the cup; once, 4) before Christ gave the bread, afterwards, when he gave the bread, [with this it is so/ that he said in the upper place, has he took before (vocat autem praeoccupationem Augustinus indubie ανθυποφοράν, quam Fabius anteoccupationem, cum tamen anthypophora sit sententiae figura, non orationis; praestat ergo prothysteron vocare), as is his (the evangelist's) custom. But that which he has set in his own place he has not wished to count in the upper place."

See, pious princes, that Augustine does not remember the last drink of the Old Testament, but that he speaks first: Lucas speaks twice of the cup. Which cup? Of Luther's. Valetetrunk? No: for he had spoken of the same only once, when Luther also confesses. Thus he speaks of the cup of the Lord's supper; thus Augustine holds it with us when he says: he speaks twice of the cup of the supper.

134. secondly, Augustine speaks: that [it] is the custom of the evangelist; this is spoken of Hebrew kind and custom, which language Augustine did not know; nevertheless, he has grasped its kind more than some who know it, as in doctrina christiana probably happened with him 5).

135 Thirdly, he also calls it a forewarning or foreshadowing, but not in the sense that the evangelist wants to count the matter, but only to name and preface it. As if one forewarned and said, I will bring forth much fire; but you shall not understand it otherwise, neither that I take "fire" for punishment and repugnance.

136) To the third [fourth] he says: that, since Lucas said the other time about the cup, the feie commemorirt, 6) that is, counted, and the upper not; and takes "count" here for "actually tell the essential trade". Vorsetzen, however, he takes for naming, titling and forewarning.

It is also clear that in previous books, also in this one, when Luther wants the words: "This is my body" to be dry, he can say, "Matthew and Marcus have the words dry"; and if there must be loud unanimity among the evangelists, then it follows that Lucas and Paul want nothing else at all, but that Matthew and Marcus. And from this argument he cannot find that he, half of all words, in turn also says: So also Matthew and Marcus must have the same opinion with Lucas and Paul. And here he also cannot say: Lucas must be of the opinion of which Matthew and Marcus are. Thus, Matthew and Marcus are on our side, and have two witnesses; so without doubt Lucas must be one with them, and Luther must have his teaching in the place of the spirit of disunity.

138. That he says: 1) "Before he would hold it with us, that there should be nothing but wine and bread (but we understand this only in substance, for we have already explained faith, love, discipline, and meaning), before he would hold it with the papists, that it should be vain blood," is well for him to say, yes, if he does not want to do anything right: For, as indicated immediately before, it is contrary to all Scripture that the bread should be changed into the body of Christ, as the papists say. Neither did he accept the angels, but only the seed of Abraham, not the bread seed. It is said (although I have never believed it) that Luther boasted that "he wants to direct the Pabstthum Wohl again, if he wants to". Where he is therefore, it would be in his hands to raise up and to break. If he has set something up, it is good to break it; the pope is stronger than he is; but if God has set it up, how would Luther break it? I want to look at, the calf with the gugel, 2) born in Saxony some years ago, is not yet laid out right. But what unfaithfulness each one has in him, God will well open. If Luther now speaks from the heart that he would rather have it with the popes; why then does he say of sacramental unity or presence of the body? 3) Which is more with us hellet [sonat, consonat], neither with the popes, because they have not let Berengarium remain with them; and yet Luther praises his recantation. And therefore God will bring it all to light. Chrysostom and Origen also understand these words "grapevine" from the wine, which is called the blood of Christ in the night banquet of the Lord. Chrysostom in Matthaeum, homel. 83rd; Origen, homel. Now these are the irrefutable places of Scripture, from which we learn that God with His own Word tells us that the substance of the sacramental signs is wine and bread, and not the body and blood of Christ.

139) Now when Luther says, 4) we conclude thus:

"With eating the sins are not forgiven; so also the body of Christ is not eaten," [he] publicly misleads us, so that we rightly conclude: If with eating the sins were forgiven, then there would be two ways of forgiving sins; one of bodily eating, the other of bodily dying. If this is not the case, then Luther is wrong in saying that sins are forgiven with eating; he wants to make him wrong; but if he cannot solve it, he writes such stamps, 5) and this throughout the whole book.

(140) He also teaches an unchristian doctrine without Scripture, without any foundation in Scripture, since he teaches us 6) about the merit of Christ and about the distribution of the merit, and says: "The death of Christ merited the remission of sin; but in the supper the merit is distributed. Answer: If it were so (which it is not, for the teaching comes from Luther's port, not from God's word), then the merit of Christ's suffering would have been given to the disciples through the supper before it was, for he never suffered in the supper; but if the merit of the suffering was given out in it, it was given out before it was.

141) Luther says: "God may well have made that which came after already present. 7) Answer: From the ability of God will come afterwards. But if the reason were to be believed, then we would even empty Christ out with him, and thus say: God might have redeemed and graced the world without the death of His Son; thus His Son did not become man. And to this blasphemous error there is one [the first] undoubted stage, saying: in the supper the merit of the suffering is distributed; for the next stage follows: so must the merit be distributed to the disciples in the supper; and after that the third: If he has not yet suffered, then the merit and forgiveness of sins was before and without the suffering of Christ; the fifth: so man would be blessed with the eating of the sacrament; the sixth: so it would not ever need death, if it could be accomplished with eating. Such a pretty thing follows from Luther's fictitious teaching, if he has turned to teach besides God's word.

In addition to this, "distribution" 8) is properly defined in Scripture. The outward distribution is the outward preaching, which Paul, Peter and all the apostles do, 1 Cor. 4: "So let men esteem us ministers of Christ, and dispensers of the things of God, which before were secret. The inward dividing is the drawing of the Father: "For no man cometh to the Son, but the Father hath drawn him," John 6; does not say, "He hath eaten my body bodily in the supper. Other disbursement is a false poem; for "as the rain and snow, when they fall from heaven upon the earth," Isaiah 55, "make the earth fruitful" without a disburser; thus, where God drops this dew of his grace and Spirit [cadärs kaot], there is already light, truth, redemption, joy, and security of conscience. For [-der] that 1) the grain comes into the earth, it grows without our work. So, where faith is, there [gernünant incls] heavenly fruits get; and the sacraments may not give faith, nor the flesh and blood of Christ, or else the pope would be believing; for he ever, according to Luther's opinion, eats the body of Christ. Therefore, let the poem please whomever it pleases, for it is an open blasphemy and may not stand by God's word.

(143) It is indeed unchristian that he speaks, 2) as if preaching forgives and accepts sins, [likewise] baptism, reading, eating the evening meal; for he does everything without Scripture, not considering that "neither the planter nor the waterer is anything, but he alone who gives the increase is everything. But Luther does as he always does, bringing the knife with him and speaking:

144 Luther [in his Confession, in the bow] e at the 7th tablet: 3) "We know well that Christ has not redeemed us through our eating, nor has anyone ever heard it otherwise from us."

Praise be to God! Be Luther of the words only well remembered! How then is the corpse and blood, eaten in the flesh, the testament, if the testament is the remission of sin? For if Christ did not redeem us by our eating, neither is sin forgiven, much less pardon dispensed, by our eating. How then are the sins of the disciples forgiven in the supper, or pardon given, if pardon is not in the meal? But the more he goes astray, the more he errs. So it goes with Luther; the more he writes new doctrines, the more he becomes a disgrace; for in the end, he always remembers what he has learned.

He taught that in the one death of Christ there is forgiveness of sin, and that only through the Spirit does a person become aware of this in his heart, if God's Spirit gives our mind a message and testifies that we are children of God, Romans 8. And therefore, the truth compels him to speak, which he vowed against 4) before. And this describes him throughout the whole book, and in all the books he writes in this error.

Luther says: 5) "Now one and the same being can be visible here and invisible there. Behold, pious princes, how insolently Luther speaks, and yet does not present a scripture, but right on top of it he rumbles, and says: "Oh, it is fool's work! they do not want to answer us, but they only want to plaudit and boast uselessly. Behold, this is his proving of so difficult a speech, that a thing may be visible in one place, and invisible in another at one time. Why? If he indicates the same thing, then he must indicate either the one Godhead, or else an eng rationis, i.[e.] a thing of reason. God is visible with the elect in heaven, and invisible with us here. But this alone befits the Godhead, Ps. 112, Isaiah 66. But we are speaking here of the body of Christ, which, while it lay in the pure body of Mary, was not visible in heaven and invisible here, but invisible in heaven and earth. Then he should indicate to us with Scripture that he was at one time in two places, invisible in one and visible in the other. It is not possible for him to do this; so he gives us a hard time about it, so that he does not do nothing at all.

But if he indicates a thing of reason, as: that I, bodily and visibly to Zurich, am nevertheless in Luther's sense; but as value, as the dog in the kitchen. But that I am with Luther is only an image, thought and mirror form. If he now wants to say that Christ's body is invisible in the sacrament here, we want to say more than he: that he is essentially present in our hearts according to God and humanity, and not in the bread. For the bread has no mind; it does not think, does not form, does not strive; but our mind strives, recognizes and sees his true humanity, his death, his glory; there he is right at home, there he is known. What shall he do in bread? shall bread strengthen the soul? The soul does not eat bread. Should it bring the knowledge of Christ into the soul? What may

Is it then the preaching and fructifying of the spirit? May one overcome faith with food; how then that one may not overcome all the graces of God with food? since faith is the summa. Why then do Luther and I not become wise, learned, chaste 2c. ? There are his sheriff's red pants 1) in the cooling bath with the blue ducks.

We have indicated to Luther and to all believers in Christ: that God's word itself may not suffer the body of Christ to be in the supper. And by other words, especially those indicated, which must be understood publicly of the absence of his body; for according to the Godhead it is not possible that he should not be everywhere. Luther now argues against this in two ways: One, that it is possible for God to find a way that is unknowable to us, which way he may be bodily with us; for all things are possible to God. Luther disputes the other way against the counterchange of the two natures in Christ.

149 Let us therefore now both hedge them up, and keep them, that he break no more through. Since we have these words: "You will not have me forever," Matth. 26, "I am leaving the world," Joh. 16, "For now I am not in the world," Joh. 17, 2c., he strikes them all with one stroke and says:

Luther: 2) "And what is more of the sayings, since Christ is preached to be in heaven. We also believe and say this, and there would have been no need to teach us. But it would be necessary to teach that because Christ is in heaven, His body cannot be in the Lord's Supper."

150 Answer: Although we would like to say that he is no longer in the world in the flesh, but only through faith, which recognizes him as true man and God, he has been here and died, and is now sitting at the right hand of God. Therefore, our adversary needs to prove that he is here. Nor do they do so on other grounds, either [the words], "This is my body"; or, "Do this in remembrance of me." And is heard six hundred times from Paul, that the words, "Put this in remembrance of me," 2c. do not mean, Neither to make nor to eat his body; but: Give thanks that he is given in death for us; this we ought to do. So then, if the words do not mean that we have called the corpse

2) Marginal gloss: [Luther in the bow] f on the first panel. [No. 21, § 86.)

3) i.e. hurriedly, immediately.

But with the word of God, it follows that, although Christ made his body with words, we have no power to make it, since it is nowhere recommended to us to make it.

151) Here serves, pious princes, that we admit to the adversary, if Christ had made his body like with the words "this is my body", that therefore it does not follow, we may make it, because we have no word about it. Not that we truly admit that Christ gave his body to be eaten with the words, but we admit to the adversary alone: if it were equal to him, but is not, yet they would not prove that it was recommended to us, as little as it is recommended to us, to transfigure him, although he is transfigured before Peter, James, John. Although we would like to have this entrance, which they truly cannot answer for: nevertheless we want to let it stand amicably, not overestimate it, 4) so that we may come to an end, and so we say:

If Luther can account for all the words: "no longer have"; "no longer be in the world"; "leave the world"; "I will take you to myself"; "one should not believe if one shows him here or there"; "he will visibly come again as he visibly went"; with the words:

Luther: 5) "So also, you always have the poor with you, but you do not always have me with you. What is meant by "with you" is given by the text itself, and is well to be reckoned, namely, as the poor are with us, so he is not with us. And so on, what they bring forward of the sayings more, is soon said: Christ is not with us, like the poor, mortal and worldly. Therefore, they cannot yet bring it up that our understanding is contrary to the Scriptures." So much Luther.

153. If Luther may offset with the answer all the writings that publicly speak of the absence of the body of Christ, then the two preachers, the one with the silver dagger, the other with the iron rings on his fingers, are not yet wrong [with that] which they practice in their cities; for with Scripture they cannot bring it about that one believes that flesh and blood are here: Only watch, pious princes, how Luther resolves all the words: "no longer have"; "no longer be in the world"; "leave the world" 2c. with such strong writings! "It is well known that just as the poor are with us, so Christ is not with us to die.

and worldly." Is not this a beautiful thing, that the whole world again should eat flesh and blood in the supper? I think Luther should bring out where "have" would be taken for "die"; and "have no more" for "die no more" 2c., so he brings on the Scripture: "And so on." Is not this strong thing? Well, good preachers of silver daggers and iron wrestlers! I must also present an experiment, that is, a request. When I say: Christ must have given us his body, as he was deadly; if you want to argue: he gave us his body, because he says: "This is my body, which was given for you" 2c. Have you not thus spoken to this irrefutable truth: You arguist a substantia ad accidens, a quod ad qualiter, from substance to importance? Yes, we have done it; but have you also understood that you do not know what you are saying, if I do not introduce anything in the subsequent speeches, but what is opened and understood in the first with bright words? I think so, too. But what do you think of Luther's opinion here, when he says that his should be understood as "being deadly, being worldly", ab esse simpliciter ad esse secundum quid?

"No longer have" should be understood: no longer have mortal, no longer have worldly. Although I cannot say what Luther meant by the word "worldly"; whether Christ was also "worldly", "like us sinners", which I do not hope [that it] will be said by Luther; or whether Luther meant "worldly" as "human", habitu inventus ut homo, that he was human in manner and measure, visible, sensitive, suffering. Where, then, does he need the word "worldly" for this, by which the simple-minded is hurt? But he wanted to make the clouds and smoke [fumos] thick, so that no one would see anything.

154. on this I must put the noble evangelists, pious princes, their dung before the noses, that they may be recognized by other people, for they do not know themselves; want to indulge and forgive me so much. We have shown before enough how honestly we in our syllogismo, 1. [e.] account, in the first [of the majors] nothing at all but God's expressed word dargethan; in the other of our enemies verjähene¹⁾ speech; and in the third nothing at all decided, than that is conceived in the previous two, so:

- 1) Christ's body is who died for us.²⁾
- 2) The bread is the body of Christ.³⁾
- 3) So the bread died for us.

1) i.e. pronounced.

2) Marginal gloss: Are words of Christ.

3) Marginal gloss: Are words of our adversaries.

Now let us also set Luther's account with the deadly poor, and give him first of all much merit in it.

- (1) You will have the poor everywhere, but you will not have me everywhere. 4)
- (2) The poor are deadly and worldly, so we will not have Christ deadly and worldly. 5)

Here open your eyes and see if Luther does not argue a substantia ad accidens, i. [e.] from substance to importance? as in the sophistical account:

- (1) Everything you bought yesterday, you ate today;
- (2) Raw [rouw] meat you bought yesterday;
- (3) So you ate raw meat today.

For Luther introduces (obmittam [omittam] enim, Huoä non rsots inäuoit minorsw oatbaZorieam 6) ack majorsm b^potbsticram) in the other one (the minor) an importance, which is not indicated in the first one, that is "tödemlich". Just as in the sophist's talk in the other one the importance "raw" [rouw] is introduced, which is not thought of in the first one. And that is to conclude from the substance to the importance.

But if Luther wanted to act formally, he would have to indicate the importance in the first [number] with the little word "like," thus:

- 1) You will not have me like the poor. 7)
- 2) The poor are deadly and worldly. 8)
- 3) So you will not have me deadly and worldly.

Then he lacks the first: for there are no more words of Christ, for Christ said simply: "But you will not have me forever", and does not remember the word "like the poor" anywhere. For the speech, when the disciples murmured about the poor, did not arise from the importance of how the poor were in the world, but badly from the substance of the poor, quod essent futuri; non, qualiter essent futuri in mundo; thus Christ also speaks of the essence of his substance.

157 Notice also, dear brethren (for I want you to be brethren, but you do not like yourselves so well; you are young roosters, or else your comb will be bitten), that in our first [proposition] Christ is the body that dies for us; the dying (which we call an important

However, it is a property, proprium aut differentia constitutiva speciei, hoc est, descriptiva, which is not abivesen (abesse, absent [one] may be at his time), yes, dying is publicly emphasized in our first one. But this does not describe in Luther's gloss.

(158) Notice also further that we rightly exclude under the word "killed" when we say: but he is sensitively and painfully killed; for we assume under the importance another importance, without which [the] first may not be; for what is killed must be painful: so Luther excludes under the substance importance, under the substance of the poor "deadly" [mortality], and therefore it behooves us to conclude:

(1) Christ's dead body is in the night banquet. ¹⁾

(2) Now he is sensitively killed. ²⁾

(3) Thus, he is sensitive in the night meal.

See how we exclude under "killed", and yet "killed" is publicly emphasized in the first [proposition].

I, pious princes, have to indicate that we poor people should learn to recognize with what muck we are dealing, if we do not want to look at the light of truth. You, simple reader, do not worry about it; for Luther was right and concluded that Christ would not be deadly with us and worldly, which is otherwise also true, because he would be invisible with us? that is why they are blinds. You must still have patience, so that the "perverse" (I have misunderstood) the "scholars" of this world can have their confusion removed; but you see here, where we want to explain the matter with simple scripture in such a way that you will grasp the truth and Luther's dishonesty with one hand.

God is the highest good, so that nothing is good at all, except that he is, and that is in him; yes, there is 3) nothing at all, without in him. He is wise, just, true, strong 2c., all to the highest. Now if he is also true to the highest, it is not possible that he should speak or promise anything that is not also certain to the highest; 4) so certain, indeed, that when he speaks words that are contrary to one another, according to our liking, from the first (if we look at them with faith, that is, the fear of God and the love of the truth) we feel that he is true and righteous, and that we had not rightly considered the truth. He is also so true, that everything which is a lie, or includes a lie, may not be of him, nor with him; but "the devil is the father of lies," John 8.

4) Randglosfe: That it is a dishonor to God to say he may do against his own word.

Now it is evident that "to be" and "not to be" may not exist with each other; so neither does God like that a thing be and not be with each other, for that is the lie and of the devil. Adam was created by God. Now if I wanted to say: God would be able to make Adam never be created, then I will make God the devil. For to be created by GOtt and not to be created is ever not truth; so GOtt does not like it; for it is a powerlessness, not a power. If the princes of this world deny that which they have promised, is it not dishonor? But why do they deny? Either that they may not perform what they have promised, it is ever a powerlessness; or that they repent of what they have promised; this comes from imperfection of wisdom, and both times become lying. Now if God were to pretend that it had not happened, but it did happen, it would be a powerlessness, not a power; for to pretend to oneself 5) is a powerlessness, and God would be found false. And if he spoke, and did another, neither he spoke, he would ever be lying.

162. probation of all things. Christ says, "I will be with you until the end of the world." And saith, "I will be henceforth no more in the world." If the words are meant to be true, that he is in the world, and is not in the world, according to one nature and essence, it is not possible that they are God's word. But they are God's word: so it follows that they must be based on other natures. For if they be not true of one nature, neither may God do them; for he may not do wrong, untrue, and lying altogether. "All that proceedeth out of my mouth shall not be turned back," Ps. 88.

So then we sit with faith and love between the words, 6) and faith says: If he has spoken it, then it must be so, it may not be the contradiction. But love says, "O Lord, I would gladly know the truth, that my flesh might be satisfied, that it might leave faith unchallenged; make known to me how these two contrary meanings are to be decided, and whither they are to be understood and drawn. So then God teaches by His Spirit and by the letter, which is written by His Spirit and order, saying, "Learn the Scriptures." So then we look at the Gospel of John in of the teaching after the supper, and publicly invent that he wants to say that he will no longer be in the world in the flesh; of this afterward. Thus we are delivered of the one word-shale, "I shall be no more in the world."

The knowledge of faith also says: Christ is God as well as man; and if it is not possible that God is not everywhere, then there must be no doubt that Christ is with us in eternity with his divine power and protection. And may both sayings of any nature in particular not be understood at all. It is not possible to speak of the divine, that we will not have it present all the time; so also "not have it all the time" must be understood to refer only to the human. So it is also not possible that the human one is on earth; for God does not like to lie, but says: "I will no longer be in the world"; so heaven and earth must break before we force him into the earth with our calculating, chattering and chattering. Luther does not want to accept this, and wants to force against God's word that Christ is bodily in the sacrament; which is nothing else at all, neither does it make him a liar. For that bread is his body, and that he is no longer in the world, may stand together as little as if I said, God created the world, and did not create it; or, God, who created the world, is well able to say that he did not create it. Which is not only nonsensical to think, but also foolish to speak.

Here Luther would like to say: I do not say that he is bodily here, and not here; but I only say that he is here, and is bodily everywhere, but that the words (which do not let him be here, even with faith and love decides) teach us that he is now dead and sensitive no longer here 2c., as is heard. On which words we might well say that Luther himself does him wrong; for he speaks publicly: how we might know by what means and skill the corpse might be here; and cites many examples (which, however, are all with us), whether he might find a way to teach us how Christ might be here bodily. And to what end does the praedicatio identica serve otherwise, neither that God should be made false? since he says: "One thing is possible for God to make, that it be two things with one another; namely: that the bread be once 1) bread and the body of Christ. For so it behooves me also to say, All men are flowers of the field and hay. Isaiah 40: God may make man once 4) grass and man. Soon the prophets make un-sensible animals, wind, harbors, firs, cedar trees, and others from the people. Are they the same also to that, that they are men? It must be according to Luther's praedicationem identicam, that is, speech, that one thing is at once two or many things: so the foolish speech, which even the Sophists reject, quod omnia entia sint unum ens, 2) that all things are one thing, must be true. And if so, it followed: If a man had killed a man, he would have killed only a blade of grass, and if he had let the poor die of hunger, he would have let a flower perish. Thus all truth, justice and godliness would be accepted. It would also not be true that God made all creatures with difference, as the creation shows; and would make God false.

This followed from Luther's praedicatione identica, since many things are one thing to him; but that is not possible for God Himself, if it is not possible for Him to do contrary to His own word. Now he says brightly that he alone took the seed of Abraham to himself; so the seed of wheat may not be "him"; and if Luther puts it to him, he makes him a liar. But that man is one thing, made up of two, that is, body and soul, you must not therefore understand that one thing is two, as we speak of it here; but the two things make a third, the man; and the body is not body and soul together, and the soul not soul and body together; but each is its own special substance, and when they come together it is one man. Thus in Christ God and mankind are One Christ, One Person. And no creature may be itself essential, and the other also; or else all creatures would be One Creature without distinction, and God would be irritus, inverted; for since he has made distinctive works, we would say: they would not be distinctive.

But ever so! Luther means it with the same error as he wants, so let us now make it clear that the words of the deviation may by no means be defended with "deadly" and "worldly". First of all, let us take Matthew 26: "But you will not have me all the way," and say thus: that in the days of the fables and the harrows 4) we would have been well provided with such a gloss: "Not to have" is: not to have deadly, not sensitive, not suffering; but not to Luther. For Luther cries out so often and loudly: We shall force the sense; since we have it

4) d. i. D. Eck.

He is forced from one corner to the other, that he doubts his own writings and therefore recants; that he speaks publicly against himself, and must soon escape from the circle. And does he not add a word from Scripture to such an unheard gloss? Why should he? He has not, otherwise he would not have spared it; for who has ever heard it interpreted with Scripture, "Me ye shall have no more": I shall die no more, nor be sensitive, nor suffer? He says, "Me," and not "I"; "ye shall," not "I will"; "have no more," not "be no more suffering." For if he were unsuffering with the disciples, yet they would have him; for they would have him with them after the primitive state, and was not deadly; but Christ casts off the "have," and saith, "They shall not have him for ever." And so this place remains firm and unchanged by Luther.

168 That is, look at pious princes, as Luther does here. Couples many proclamations together, and says: "and so on, what proverbs they bring more, is soon said: Christ is not mortal with us" 2c. It is true, it is soon said, but it is not yet valid. But one should make such an unheard gloss firm with many scriptures, and force it to be just.

The places, Matth. 24. and Marci 13.: "that we should not believe those who show us Christ here or there, because they are false prophets", still remain stiff. For from Luke 17 we learn publicly that Christ speaks of his bodily presence; not of external things, as Luther says. Now if he says him to be "in the bread, with the bread, with the bread," or as he wills, he ever shows him to us in the supper. So now see how he will reject that the evangelists call him a false prophet!

170 John 16: "Again I leave the world," 2c., Luther may also not be satisfied; for he must not glaze the word "leave" with "not mortal" or "to be worldly. Now it is certain that he may not leave the world according to divine nature; so only the human one must leave.

171 Marci 16: The Lord, having spoken with them, is taken up into heaven, and sitteth on the right hand of God. If he is taken up, he is not here after mankind; for Luther, not yet a creature, has never proved that the humanity of Jesus Christ is more than in one place. But what Luther subjected himself to in destroying the Word of God will come later.

172 And that Luther could not say, He is well received in heaven, but yet he was with them; so hear Lucam, Apost. 1: "He went, 1) that they might have seen, and the cloud received him out of their sight." So he went away from their eyes. And if Luther would say, "He came out of their sight," 2) Lucas rivets it with a bass, and soon after says, "The Jesus who was received up from you into heaven." Behold, pious princes! as he speaks, "Up in heaven," "from you" that are on earth, "he is taken and received." He does not say that he is here on earth, but invisible; that he is with the disciples, but immortal; but that he is of them, and not near; but that he is in heaven above, and the disciples here.

173 "He is risen, and is not here", Marci 16. Here we have "he is not here". We do not take this place to mean that he is no longer in the world, but that you, pious princes, may see how Luther does not speak at all according to God's word when he says: Christ is everywhere according to mankind, as well as according to the Godhead; also when he says: one should understand the words "no longer be in the world": "no longer be deadly and worldly" (that is, sensitive, visible, suffering). Which comment or poem is thrown to the ground with the some saying. For, to speak according to the Godhead, Christ is ever everywhere; so this saying must be for mankind alone. If then Christ was not there, then mankind is not everywhere where the Godhead is; for the Godhead was there, not only according to the omnipotent presence, but according to the gracious illumination of the Spirit, who set the hearts of the seekers on fire, so that they fervently sought him.

If now Luther would also dispute this place: "He is not here" should be as much as: he is not deadly nor suffering, or prestigious 3) here: so the angel would give the answer from Luther's opinion: Christ dies no more, and is no more worldly. I have no doubt, the pious women would report him: Dear angel, we do not inquire of the same, we inquire essentially of his body, and have prepared ourselves with ointments to anoint him. Therefore he gives them an answer from the substance of his body, that he is not there. Or did Luther mean to say: he would not be worldly,

3) i.e. frail.

If the man had been there in a sensitive or passionate way, the women might have said, "We can see for ourselves that he is not there. We ask about the substance, we ask about him, we do not ask about the importance.

175 Behold, pious princes, how Luther seeks all excuses from substance to importance. But all this put aside, even though we would like to answer Luther with a few no's, because he, as is indicated, brings nothing at all but his deeds, not Scripture: so [we] want to give the simple Christian people, who [are] ourselves, into the hand (because the servants threaten us daily, as it will soon be over for us), that God's servants can defend themselves against the poem itself.

In Luke, the angel decides the whole mess that Luther makes, because it says: "And he", the angel, "spoke to them", the women: What seek ye? seek ye him that liveth among 1) the dead? He is not here, but is risen" 2c. There is no doubt that the angel is speaking of the resurrected body of Christ, when he says: "You are looking for him who is alive among other dead", who are alive according to the soul, but the corpse lies dead, as Isaiah 26. says; but this corpse lives for other dead, and is already resurrected. Accordingly, he says that the resurrected, transfigured corpse is not there. Now what mouth on earth has ever been allowed to say among old and new scholars that the declared body of Christ is also everywhere? Only because they see here publicly that it is said of the declared body that it is not there, it is never everywhere. Except the one Luther may speak against everything that has understanding in heaven and earth, that he is everywhere. And the Word of God is clear and open; and to prove this, nothing at all brings his laborious argument: he is not sensitive, or visible, or deadly there. And if we want to rumble with him and say: "is, is, is" there; as he is wont to do: "He is not there", let the words of God stand in God's name! He will not find a word for this, since "is" is understood for "to be deadly": for this, where he would find it, he speaks here of the body, which was already deadly, that it is not there. The women did not need the angel to tell them that he was not in the world and that he was deadly, because they saw it.

177 Therefore, you, simple Christian, may safely place yourself behind the two reasons, "He is not here" and "He who lives among the dead is not here," against Luther's confusing teaching, since he pretends,

1) Marginal gloss:xxxx xxxx xxxxxx.

Let the corpse of Christ be everywhere, and let him therefore shoot at you with all the thunders of words, let him cast the fire of his anger and rage against you, and with the blasts of his evil words let him hurt you, and he will not move a hair of your head. Until these reasons also be remembered; for we shall hereafter speak further of the declared body of Christ, whether it be everywhere.

178. John 17, Christ thus speaks: "I will no longer be in the world, but they will be in the world". The saying is an antithesis, a counter-setting, by which one sees what Christ meant by "being no longer in the world". As, so I speak: Dear friend, I cannot be with you, but my children will be with you. Quia χῆ ἀντί ὁ 2) ponitur Hebraeorum more. Here I must ever be understood thus, that my children will remain essentially with the friend for the time [ea vice]; and so we see now well in contrast that I speak of the presence of their body, that I speak also of presence of my body; and want to say that I want to be half of the body completely not there. But do not deny that I want to be there with the thought; but my thought and care will be there more than if I were there bodily.

So this is an antithesis, a contrast: "I will no longer be in the world, but they will be in the world. But if Luther were to come with his "worldly" and say: Christ would not be worldly or deadly in the world, but the disciples would be deadly in the world, it is not enough; but he must express the contrast in the disciples as well 3) as in Christ, and thus speak: Christ would not be deadly or worldly in the world, yet essentially; but the disciples would be deadly and alive in the world, and not essentially. Since it is seen that according to the power of speech it is found that Christ speaks of human nature, that therefore he will not be essential in the world at all, but according to the Godhead with his care and grace.

180 But all this notwithstanding, the whole of the seventeenth chapter of this book is so open with us that no one can contradict that Christ goes out on the opinion that he has been with the disciples until now, and that he has cared for them so faithfully that, without Judas, no one has perished: but now he goes away from them, so that he commends them to the Father. For he saith afterward, But now I go unto thee, and speak these things.

in the world, that they may have perfect joy" 2c. Then he will say, "I speak these things to them so that they may be comforted and undaunted, even though I am no longer with them; for you will keep them as if I were with them.

And the whole seventeenth chapter is an antithesis, a contrast, to all its previous physical presence. Until now I have been with them; but now I will not only not be with them, but no longer in the world. I would also like to hear how Luther glossed it: "But now I am coming to you. For it is knowable that, according to divine nature, he never came from him; and the words, "I came forth from the Father," and the like, are all xxxirocear, that is, an imputation of human morals 2c. For how will "I shall henceforth be no more in the world, for I go to the Father" rhyme with Luther's opinion: he shall be invisible in the world, if he speaks plainly: "No more to be"? I think: where "to be, is, being, are" 2c. would stand, should the words be understood allways essentially according to Luther's rule? But it is heard enough that also the invisibly declared body is not everywhere, so it is also not in heaven and in the world at once.

182. On the 14th of John, Christ says: "I will ask the Father, and he will send you another Comforter, that he may abide with you forever. Here Christ does not say: I will send you another Comforter; but: "another Comforter, the Spirit of truth. By which words we well see [that] all the consolations which Luther sets forth in the bodily meal are set down, for the Spirit of truth will comfort, not the flesh eaten bodily. One may also put down with all theologis Luther with the word "other"; for the Holy Spirit is nothing else at all, neither the Father nor the Son; but he is indeed another, namely another person neither the Father nor the Son. Now if another Person is indicated here, and Christ is One Person, of divine and human nature; then the consolation is ever withdrawn from human presence, if it is placed on the Person of the Spirit; for humanity is [i.e. belongs to] not the Person of the Spirit. Knowing well that all the effects of God are against the creatures of all three persons, because of the one essence. What concerns the personal qualities, however, remains unchanged and unmixed in each one, as becoming man, suffering, dying is the personal property of the Son, and is not added to the person of the Spirit. More about this in the sermon given at Bern.

183 Luther does not understand Paul's saying, 2 Cor. 5, 1) he should not be angry. For short of that, he still does not see the argument or opinion on which Paul there goes out. He says just before that [vv. 11-16]: He is in hope that he is well thought of in the Corinthian consciences, so that he may not boast before them, nor may anyone write and recommend for him, as the false apostles boasted and wrote for one another. For he is well known to God; but all that he boasts of before them is for their sake, that his name be not taken away from them 2). And if he does anything above measure, it is for the glory of God; or if he boasts so highly that it seems childish to someone, it is for their benefit. For the common love that all Christians rightly have for God also compels him to gladly risk his life for God's sake, 3) since Christ gave himself for all of us, it is right that we also give ourselves for him without looking back. Therefore he does not think that his name will not be reviled, because he seeks no comfort or help in all creatures, that he seeks no other comfort in the flesh of Christ than he has already received, that is, that through the means of the flesh he has suffered death and redeemed us with death; he seeks no further comfort in the flesh of Christ.

Now Luther thinks that Paul teaches us in this place how we are to be a new creature. This is not so; but Paul argues from the common sense, ἐξ ἡς χρείας, 4) since all Christians know and understand that we should all be prepared to suffer death for the sake of the Lord, if he has borne it for our sake; that he, too, is completely of this mind, and does not pride himself on protecting himself or his name; for there is neither comfort nor compunction in his heart [cordi sibi], neither the one God; that he also does not seek in the flesh of Christ any other 5) comfort than that which he has already received and felt. Otherwise he knows that Paul often teaches how we are to be a new creature. Let the scholars see what I say!

185 But in the words of Paul, Luther's consolation falls to one whom he promises in the bodily meal on his sock, not on God's word. It teaches us also, for another time, that Luther's rejection of the AllCEh, since he does not yet know the name, as follows, is a futile sacrilege, when he sees that Paul may also especially call the flesh of Christ, and say: "he no longer recognizes it according to the flesh". Now here "to know" is taken for susplicere, to hope, but the He is always exempt from comforting sufferings, but even Paul rejects other consolations in the flesh. And yet holds the inseparable unity of the person of the Son of God, and hopes in him, has all comfort in him, and yet rejects the flesh for other comfort.

Luther says: this saying would be better for us than for him. Yes cr says it, but does not indicate it with any sound, neither with his rich verbiage. But he is able to do two things, of which Luther may reverse tweders [neutrum, neither of them]. The first: If Paul recognizes nothing more in the flesh than his death, resurrection, ascension, 2c., so that the flesh of Christ, which sits at the right hand, brings him no more help nor comfort than he already has, then the saying is able to do as much as: The flesh is not profitable to eat. The other thing that Luther cannot reverse is that eating the flesh of Christ does not forgive sin; or else Paul would have taught daily comfort in it, not realizing that he sought no further comfort in it.

Now, pious princes, Luther would easily protect this mind, 1) and cry out over me: I reject the humanity of Christ, but this is not at all, as he himself also confesses, since he speaks. 2) I make Christ a mere man; how then could I reject humanity? But I recognize the true deity of Christ, and so recognize it, that for this reason one should not ascribe to it what is not due to it. I also recognize the true humanity of Christ, and so recognize that it should not be given what is not due to it. And do all this knowledgeably with the Scriptures and enlightenment of the old orthodoxorum, the right theologians and teachers.

For Augustine speaks thus of this place Pauli, 2 Cor. 5, 11b. l. äs clootrina 6Üri8tiäna, vap. 34.: "Behold how the apostle (though the truth and the word by which all things were made had already become man or flesh, so that it dwelt among us) still speaks nothing the less: 'If we have Christ after the flesh we do not recognize him now.' Now he who not only gives a home to those who come to him, but has also willed to give the way to those who go to him, namely himself, who is a beginning of ways, and has willed to take the flesh to himself. This is also the purpose of it: The Lord created me in the beginning of his ways, that they which would come might receive them. Therefore the apostle, even though he was still walking on the way and following the reward of the heavenly calling, namely, the calling Lord, still forgets the things he left behind him and reaches out to those who are before him. He who had already gone before the beginning of the ways, that is, he did not lack that at which all must start and compete who desire to come to the truth and to abide in eternal life. For he speaks thus: I am the way, the truth and the life', that is: through me one comes, to me one comes, in me one remains. For if a man comes to him, he comes also to the Father; for by the like he is known who is like him, by binding and sticking to us, through the Holy Spirit, that we may abide in the supreme and immutable good. From which we understand, NB. that no thing shall keep us in the way, if the Lord Himself, according to the manner, and He hath graced Himself to be our way, hath not willed to keep us; but that we go forward, that we may not cleave weakly unto temporal things (though the same be accepted and applied for our salvation's sake), but rather walk fruitfully through the same things, that we may come unto Himself, who hath loosed our nature from temporal things, and set it at the right hand of the Father."

These are all the words of Augustine, by which we actually learn that he understands the words of Paul according to our sense; namely, that he wants to say that we should not cling to the humanity of Christ in some measure, but rather go through or proceed in this way: human nature is assumed, so that we come to God through it; and when we have grasped this, we should not cling to humanity any longer, but cling to Him alone, to whom we have come through it, until we are drawn to Him in heaven. This does not reject the humanity of Christ, but teaches us to think rightly of it, and not to pretend, as Luther does, that we do not have God's word: if one eats the flesh of Christ in the flesh, sins are forgiven; it brings with it (thus they speak) God with all his goods. Yes, Luther says: "If I give you bread, I give you God with all His goods.

1) i.e. to throw dirt at.

2) Marginal gloss: ls (in Luther's Confession) in (arc) k on (the) 8th panel. (No. 21, § 177.1

To be master over the goods of God, like the pope. Christ's body has all authority in heaven and earth, as no theologian has ever said, but Christ has all authority. Christ's body is everywhere, like the Godhead; which also no td6oloſu8 ortioäoxus has never spoken. But it will follow hereafter how one should hold and speak in things.

190. So now, pious princes, we have the expressed bright words of Christ, which may not deceive nor be drawn elsewhere, neither to the humanity of Christ: "Not having all ways"; "not showing here nor there"; "leaving the world"; "being taken up to heaven"; "taken from them in their regard"; "taken from you"; "he is not here"; "even the declared risen body was not there when the women sought him"; "I shall be no more in the world"; "he shall send another Comforter"; "for else know not Christ according to the flesh." Eleven irrefutable places in which Christ indicates his body's absence; which completely overturn Luther's reasons as to how it is possible for God to do so; for it is not possible for God to do contrary to his word; for that is not a power, but a powerlessness.

191 Although Luther himself now recognizes against the King of England that a posse ad [es]se, from the ability of God to "thus be", does not befit [to] conclude: nor must he now make use of that which he has thrown down before. If he is not ashamed to speak against his own knowledge of the truth; yes, even to put the same writings in suspicion, in that he leans on the books that he has written in four or five years: then I must take off his guest-hat 1) a lot, so that one can see him right in the face.

192. 1) The highest blasphemies of God are when He is blasphemed at His essence and nature;
- 2) Luther blasphemes him by his nature and essence:
- 3) Thus Luther also commits the highest blasphemy against God.

This is an account that is known to every Christian. For all blasphemy that reaches to the things that come to pass [aoicksntik] is not as great as that in which the substance itself is blasphemed, just as all contumely to the accidents are small, until man himself is attacked, as Job 1. stands. It is also the sin in the Holy Spirit, which is not venial, only for this reason so heavy, that it is essentially contrary to God's spirit and truth, Matth. 12., because, that truly by the power of God beschach, the godless admitted to the lying devil. Therefore, the first [i.e. the upper sentence] is irrefutable.

1) "Gasthut" probably means the same as "Hehlkäpplein" in "Luthers Schrift Wider die Türken", No. 53 in this volume, § 7.

Now it is up to the other one [the subordinate clause]: that Luther blasphemes God in his essence and nature. So we prove these. To the first, of the essence. Christ says: every kingdom divided against itself becomes nothing or united. Yes, even if the devil, who is the kingdom of lies, were against himself, his kingdom and nature would not exist. Now Luther accuses God of doing contrary to his own word, and of making repugnant things true together, which must confuse and break the devil: thus Luther breaks the kingdom, power and essence of God with blasphemy. For his objection is now sufficiently justified that the words must not be understood according to Luther's gloss, but that they all indicate the bodily absence. But Luther wants to falsify this, if he wants to have him in the sacrament. For to be in the sacrament is ever to be in the world. Now "to be in the world," as Luther speaks, and "not to be in the world," as Christ speaks, are contrary to each other, as being God and not being God. And Luther wants to show up both Gods; 2) so he wants to overthrow God with the reversal of the power of God into the powerlessness of God and to turn back.

194 Secondly, that Luther blasphemes God by his nature. The nature and manner of God is that He is true, for Christ JC is not Yes and No, but Yes is Yes with Him and Amen; that is, everything that God speaks is fixed and unchangeable. Whoever then admits that God acts contrary to His own word blasphemes Him in His truth, for He is true by nature. If then Luther reviles God in truth under the appearance of omnipotence, he confuses himself and blasphemes him in his omnipotence, for he cannot do against himself; and it is a powerlessness where someone does against himself. He also blasphemes him in his truth, when he says: May God, besides the words, be a way in the flesh in the sacrament, which is unknown to us. Just as if GOD had said the words that we well understand and are clear: "I will no longer be in the world", are spoken to us, and in contrast, another is acting. This is blaspheming God in His honor, power and truth. As when I say of a man, "He speaks to you clearly and loudly, but he does another thing.

2) i.e. impose.

3) Here we have omitted the word "him" which is too much.

But Luther pushes in against this with a strong trick and says: 4) Christ speaks: "I am not in the world; but was in the world", Joh. 17. Now "Christ speaks the words, while he was still in the world. How then can the Spirit speak that the text is against the Lord's Supper?" Response. There is no text in Scripture that is against the Lord's Supper; but there are countless others that are against Luther's opinion. But these words: "I am not in the world" are Greek: "For now I am not in the world." 2) And Luther also conceals here that the Hebrew language has the custom to put praesens pro futuro, present time for future. So when the Hebrew says: xxxxx, 3) I come the, or I come, he wants as much as: I will come. In the same way here: "I am not in the world for the time being" is taken for "I will no longer be in the world". But it may be little of that; for there is an xxx, that is, "for the time being" which little word probably indicates that he does not speak of the present time. In addition, the words themselves prove what kind they are, namely, as one is wont to speak in all languages. One says, I am nothing; 4) another, I am dead. And the one cannot be nothing, or else he could not speak. Nor this one be dead. But each one thinks that he is close to becoming nothing or dead.

196) The words of Luc. 24 are to be understood in the same way: "These are the sayings or speeches that I told you while I was still with you. Now he was still with them but he speaks of the former time in which he was with them and walked in the flesh. And thus he will speak: When I dwelt with you before I died, I told you all the things which are now fulfilled. But if, as Luther also does not deny, he uses the word "to be with" or "to dwell with" to refer to the bodily dwelling that took place before death, it is evident that he was no longer with them after the ascension. To this, in all languages, it is customary to name that which is so near, as if it were there. So Christ speaks, he says: no longer in the world at the time of the ascension. But putting all this behind, he says in the future: You will not have me all the way; nihil enim refert, quod Graeci εχτε habent. From which future time will well be seen that also other words, which are

The words should be based on the opinion, should reach to the time of ascension. So much for Luther's one way, since he wants to introduce the omnipotence of God, that he is impotent and acts against his own word. Now we want to look at him from the opposite point of view.

From the counterchange or alloeosi.

197 I want to explain myself, pious princes, first around the name, what I mean by the word "counterchange". Luther asked me why I, speaking of the two natures, did not use the old tropum synecdocham? About this

I will answer him, and with that the NaMe of the Allöoses becomes terminable. I do not worry about the words half, as far as one rightly understands what is meant by the words. Synecdocha is called collective or comprehensio by Cicero, and is a figure or tropus, since one word comprehends many things, and the speaker needs a part of the same thing for the whole or the whole for a part. As, the word, "city" comprehends all houses, buildings, towers, people and possessions. Accordingly one says: "the city of Strasbourg, Costenz, Ulm, Augsburg, Nuremberg 2c. are at Esslingen on the day"; and are no more, however, than the messengers of the cities, there. Again, Matt. 3: "There went out to John Jerusalem and all the Jewish country." How could Jerusalem, the city, go? But the people who were in it went out; and yet not all, but a part. For this tropus can be bent so meng 5) way, that even one out of the whole assembly is named with the name of the assembly, as is first heard from the messengers. If I speak: The whole Rhine speaks Greek, there is the SYNECDOCHA in the word Rhine; because I want to say: all residents of the Rhine. And so I say: all the residents, is but [times] a trvxn8; because not all who live on the Rhine. Greek can, but some; also not at all ends, but at some.

198. alloeosis but is such a trvpu8, as the due property is confused, but in things inherited or closely joined together; as, since in the Grammatica numerus per numero, persona per persona is ge

2c. Example that is known to us: When I say: Man is nothing but dung; then I speak of the whole man, half of the word. But I do not understand more than a part of man, namely the corpse, because the soul.

5) i.e. various.

is a noble spiritual substance, and is ever not filth. Again, if I say that man is a noble thing that can be understood, I speak of man everywhere, but I understand only the soul, for it alone has understanding.

If the synecdocha can be extended to such an extent that it is also suitable for things that have no characteristic, no unity, nor similarity with one another, except the most distant, the occasion: then it has not seemed to me to be skillful as alloeosis, counterchange, because it is only suitable for things that are completely similar to one another. And as in the Lord Jesus Christ the divine nature and the human nature are thus united, that also Athanasius speaks in the Symbolo: "As the rational soul and the flesh, or the body, are One man; so God and man are One Christ: so alloeosis is more common 1) than synecdocha; because synecdocha, is much too mean.

But if Luther recognizes synecdocham 2) to be used by the ancients, why is he angry with us that we need a more proper name? Why does he rebuke us as if worse heresy had never been? and yet he himself recognizes [that] the ancients used synecdocham. Shall we therefore rage for the sake of the name alone, which all scholars recognize to be neater and more proper than synecdocham?

In the Latin Exegesis 3) I have spoken of the counterchange thus: "Alloeosis, i.[e.] counterchange, is the leap or passage or, if you like, the change, since we, speaking of the one nature in Christ, need the other name. As when Christ says, 'My flesh is the true food,' there is ever the flesh of the human nature in him, nor is it taken in that place by the change for the divine. For after that 4) he is the Son of God, he is the food of the soul, for he saith: 'The Spirit is he that quickeneth.' Again, when he says, as the legitimate right son is slain by the feudatories, he takes the right son, though it is the name of the Godhead, for the human nature; for after that he may die, and after the divine not at all. If indeed one nature is said to be that of the other, that is alloeosis, i.[e.] counterchange or common of properties and change."

This is not only to be understood from Luthern.

But these poor people do not see, first, that I teach nothing at all different from what their theology itself has always recognized, even though they have not spoken of it most skillfully; for communicatio idio-matum, i.e. commonality of attributes, is called alloeosis, counterchange. Secondly, they do not see that Luther speaks and does violence and injustice to me, even against himself; for he accuses me of this "place: "My flesh is the true food," that I have said that the flesh is taken in that place for the divine nature; and in so doing does not leave me without infidelity the cause that I put to it. Now that I have done this, and have also signified the cause with scripture, how then shall I make a purified man of Christ, if I also say that the flesh shall be taken for the divine nature?

But I will further interpret to you, pious princes, what I have written about it in Exegesi 5): "This alloeosis, i.[e.] counterchange, is so necessary that one sees that whoever despises it or does not know it, not only devastates the gospel of John, but curses the others, with unheard errors. And this is the cause why all teachers have so inclined to use this common of attributes or antitypes. That he who is the Son of God from eternity (beloved, notice here, pious princes, whether I deny humanity or divinity!) has also become the Son of man with the assumption of human nature. Not that he who was the Son of God left the essence and state of the Godhead or changed it into human weakness or diminishment, nor that he changed human nature into divine nature; but that God and man were one Christ, who therefore, being the Son of God, was the life of all men, for all things were also created by Him, and therefore, being man, was a sacrifice, that eternal righteousness, which is also His righteousness, might be atoned for." Behold, pious princes, this is the cause which has compelled all orthodoxos, that is, right-minded teachers, to recognize the antitype, and not from human reason, as Luther mockingly interprets to me; but that God's own Word urges us to it. For Christ calls himself "the Son of God"; he also calls himself "the Son of Man".

204. further I have spoken there thus: "But God has the two natures thus consisted into One.

4) "that" of us immune instead of: and.

Person joined together and agreed, that nevertheless each retains its quality or kind all the way; the some except that the inclination to sin has been farthest from his humanity, because he was not born of the prestigious 1) seed, but of the Holy Spirit, who made his mother, a maid, fertile. But the innocent burdens [onera], sufferings, punishments or afflictions he has borne on him until death, as there are hunger, thirst, heat, frost, sleeping, waking and the like sufferings" [passibilitates].

This opinion we have there, pious princes, fortified with unbreakable testimonies, and much of them. For He who is One Christ of divine and human nature, One Person of the Godhead, has made the blind see, awakened the dead, known the inward parts of the heart, foreknown all things that are to come, even those things which are called things without danger, made the consciences free, cleared the prison of the captives, and risen up mightily from the dead. These are all open effects by which we recognize him, the true God, and that he has not lost the divine power, because he has taken the human stupidity to himself. He also bore hunger, thirst 2c., and all bodily defects, except the sinful one, in Him. He grew and increased in age and knowledge; he did not know the day of the Lord; he timidly went to death; he desired to have the cup taken from him; he cried out in pain, "O my God, how hast thou forsaken me?" he died. But all this according to human nature alone. From which it is now evident that the effects, attributes, or types of both natures remained in Him, and yet He is One Christ, Son of God and Son of Man, One Person of the Son of God, an unsaved Savior.

Accordingly, I have further spoken in the aforementioned book: "What unification (understanding of the two natures in One Christ) image and language the holy men of God have sought much, so that they taught it clearly. Some have brought forth the likeness of man, which consists of soul and body (which strikes me as the most equal), teaching that God and man are one Christ. Some have brought forth a sword or iron glowing with fire. For if one cuts wood or other matter with it, a wound is made and a fire with it. And have with the likeness of any nature power, life, nature, kind and effect want to indicate." Here you see,

1) prestigious - frail, deficient.

Pious princes, that I was never of the opinion that I wanted to make two persons out of Christ, as little as man is two persons, although he has two natures of body and soul, as little as I make two things out of the fired sword. If then man is one person, who alone is a creature, how much more is Christ, who is the Creator and creature, only one person!

After that, in the proof and explanation, I have also treated the words "the Word became man" thus: "The Word became man, and God became man, is also spoken in terms of the opposite, so that He who took man to Himself is eternal God, also an eternal man after He took him to Himself. For GOD did not thus become man, that he who was GOD should be changed into man; but that he who was not man before should take man to himself. And therefore we say: God became man, who also made man, whom He took unto Himself; and thus speak [there] for: the human nature is assumed by the Son of God, As Athanasius also recognizes: 'Not that the Godhead is turned into the flesh, but that humanity is assumed in GOD?' Still in this way no one is hurt, if one speaks of the community because of the characteristics: God became man, for: man became God, or, adopted to the person of the Son of God. Behold an inviolable unity, but see also how one should not mix the attributes in the mind, even if one transforms the words or names."

Here you have, pious princes, the summa of our doctrine, although it is dealt with there according to length with many proclamations. But Luther sees how strong the truth is, and does not turn back a message that it is not so; but has enough that he speaks freely that greater seduction has never been heard. And all the ancients whom I have seen have spoken of it in this way; though it does not compel us, yet it glimmers. And I would like to hear from Luther which of the ancients he can point out to me who does not speak in this way. But that Christ speaks thus with his own word, that we must keep the difference in his words, is touched upon before and abundantly set forth in Exegesis; yet let us act an example or two, and accordingly interrogate Luther's own words; for he is of the opinion in this book and elsewhere, as will be clearly found.

209. Christ speaks John 14: "The Father is greater than I." Now he must speak true; so

He also says: "I and the Father are one thing", John 10, an unfaithful soul; he is an evil corpse; for there soul and and: "Father, everything that is yours is also mine; and corpse are taken personally for the whole man, and not for everything that is mine is also yours", John 17. How can the essence. Luther also omits the piece from the one be greater than the other, if they are one thing, if they Sophists' Theologia and defiles the mouths of the simple-have equal power? If true faith answers, as Athanasius minded and speaks:

did, "He is equal with the Father according to the Luther. 1) "When one says: God is man, or: man is the Godhead, and less than the Father according to God; here can be no alloeosis, yes, also no synecdoche, humanity." Matth. 20. he says: "Sitting on my right or left or some tropus; for there God must be taken for God, man is not my power to give you." And Luke 22 says: "I for man."

prepare the kingdom for you, as my Father has prepared Here I ask Luther, if there is to be no allososis, it for me; that you may eat and drink at my table in my whether he understands the Godhead in the word "God"? kingdom." The two sayings are also publicly opposed to If he says: Yes; then it follows that the Godhead is each other, and must be decided solely on the basis that humanity; this is unchristian. For the Deity is an eternal, what he himself admits extends to mankind alone; and uninherited, unsuffering good; so mankind is a created, what he himself admits must be understood as referring light [labilis], suffering thing. Says he: No; then the tropus to the Godhead alone. And is nothing the less such an is already there; namely, the pious alloeosis, which inseparable unity of the two natures, that, if either is teaches us that GOtt must be understood personally in spoken of, that of the other, yet alone iu vouersto or personal, uou iu abstraeto, is essential (non, non enim concreto, not in abstracto. That is: God must be taken here licet dicere: deitas est humanitas, aut, deitas est crucifixa; not only for the separate (does not mean the divine essence from the persons, but this separation is described sic neque humanitas est aeternus DEI filius, etc.).). In in the human mind, solely so that essence and person are this way, no one is hurt, nor do they speak untruthfully, recognized before each other) essence, but also for the but always so that they speak personally. person, and is undeniably called the person of the Son. Of

When one says, "God is man," it is a personal speech. him it is rightly said: God is man. Does Luther not see here Here it is certain that the Godhead is not mankind. But it that it is an alloeosis? since "God" is taken not only for is equally certain that he who is God is also man. And God, that is, deity, but also for the one person of the deity. again, "man is God," pointing to Christ, it is certain that And there the alloeosis is also indicated to him, since the mankind is not the Godhead; or else we must say that the essence is taken for the person, and the person for the Godhead would be turned into mankind. Nor is it true that Christ, who is man, is God also. But the naturally essence, and yet it is not understood differently in separate some being may not be said of another. One personal speech, neither that the person is predominant, that is, that he who is God is man; and not that the may not speak Christianly: The Godhead is mankind; for Godhead, which is also the person of whom we say, here the being is named separately from the person. The human being.

separate being may also not stand with the personal one. I will make it quite clear to you, pious princes, if the One may not say: The Godhead is man; also not: matter requires it. Twenty years ago, there was an Mankind is God. excellent Scotist, Antonius Beck, at Freiburg in Breisgau.

So we have speeches about man. "Man is a celestial He finally claimed that he wanted to maintain that there animal" is said of the soul, but it applies to the whole man. were three Gods; and that for the following reason: Father, "Man is a sow" is said of the whole man, but it is Son and Holy Spirit are essentially One God; they are also appropriate for him only half of the body. Nor is it proper personally three, so there are also personally three Gods; to speak: The soul is the body; nor: The body is the soul; for it is said of each one that he is God: The Father is God, for here soul and body are taken essentially, pro animei- the Son is God, the Holy Spirit is God. And if one speaks tate et corporeitate, ut Sophistae olim verba fingebant, in this way, one does not understand personally alone (he quae in- lingua latina et germanica non competunt. But would have this befits well: He is

1) Marginal gloss: Is [in Luther's Confession] in the h at the 5th tablet. [M. 21, § 133.]

but also essential, that every person is essential to God. The erroneous sophist came to this, that he did not recognize the word "God", [that it can be taken] per alloeosim, by the counterchange, sthan, separately, for the Godhead, but sthan for the person together with the essence.

Example. When one speaks: There is only One God; here the word "God" has the personal form, as if one wanted to say that there is only One Being and Person; but one does not want that, or else we deny the most holy three Persons, but the concretum, i. The personal word "God" is taken separately and essentially alone, and not personally; and the speech is as much as if I were to say, "There is only one Godhead"; and the personal word is taken per alloeosim, by the counterchange, for the separate, essential one.

Here Antonius Braß is defeated; 1) for since he wants to say that it is appropriate for him to speak that there are three Gods; for there are three persons who are essentially God: so there are also three Gods, he does not see that the little word "God" may not exist; for even if it has a personal form, it is not understood personally at all; but everyone who hears it understands it as if there were three persons and three deities; and to all of this alloeosis comes to the rescue.

Now you understand, pious princes, how Luther is missing, when he says: "God is man" 2c., there is no alloeosis; for if one should take God separately, essentially for the Godhead alone, then it is unchristianly spoken: "The Godhead is mankind. But if one understands "God" by the counterchange, the one who is essentially and personally God: for so it is: "God is man," that is: the person, the Son of God, who is essential God, who is man, you see, how we must depend on the person, and not on the essence; and is nevertheless as true essential God, who is man, as true Son of God personally he is, who is man. It is not yet proper to say: "God is mankind", but: "God is man".

Now we want to interrogate Luther about the two natures in our Lord Jesus Christ, and see if he confesses "that each nature has its own effect and nature, and that nevertheless one is often taken for the other", for the two pieces are the most common cause of imprisonment. Please, pious princes, take good care of Luther's innumerable words, which he needs in this matter in the present book; for he often fights against himself in four or five lines; it is even true that "anger is a nonsense that lasts for a while"; 2) for Luther certainly does not know what he is saying in places because of anger. And even though he insists that he should be punished for a lie, the whole book is nothing but a deceptive lie; 3) for since he speaks right in one place, he turns it wrong from the beginning, so that I wonder if there is only human understanding in those who allow themselves to be led by the Scriptures. And even if we put his own words before him, he will still find good evidence from his part that he has not lied; for he is angry and speaks in anger, and if anger is temporaria insania, a temporary nonsense, then he has spoken out of nonsense, not out of a lying mind. Now let us hear Luther himself.

In his postilion on the epistle on the [third] day of Christ in the high mass, Luther speaks about the words "through his Son" thus: 4) "Here we are to learn to recognize Christ properly, how he is in both natures, divine and human, in which many err and partly make fables out of his words, which they give to the divine nature, which nevertheless belong to the human nature, blinding themselves in the Scriptures. For in Christ's words is the greatest authority, which are due to the divine nature, which are due to the human nature, so they are all easy and clear."

Here you see, pious princes, that Luther himself recognizes that it is a mistake to attribute to the divine nature what is human. Now, hear him further!

Luther 5) on the first panel: 6) "But you, dear brother, should keep this instead of the alloeosi: because JESus Christ is truly God and man in One Person, then in no place of the Scriptures is one nature taken for the other; for that is what he ([Luther] means me) alloeosim, when something is said of the deity of Christ, which nevertheless belongs to mankind, or again; as, Lucæ ultimo: Did not Christ have to suffer, and thus go into His glory?" Here he gules that Christ is taken for human nature. Beware, beware!"

These are Luther's words. Luther was not supposed to prove his point by yelling at people:

1) In the previous paragraph: Beck.

"Beware, beware!" but he should prove: that these words, "Christ therefore had to die," must be understood by both natures, that is, that the divine also had to suffer; or he must confess, [that,] that Christ suffers, is sufficient for mankind alone. Therefore I do not want to say anywhere that Christ is not God and man. Nor do I want to say that He is more than One Person, and I want to have testified to this once enough and completely. It does not appear in a single word that I have gone thereon, or have held thereon; although Luther charges me with it. 1) But why does he do it? Therefore: With the property of the alternation of both natures one obviously learns that human nature in Christ always retains its property; before death the property of the deadly body, and after the original state the property of the declared body; and whichever way one measures the matter, it is not found, except that the body of Christ, whether it was deadly or is now declared, may not be 2) fit to be more than in one place. Then, however, it may not be in the supper, or else, it would have to be in our church in Zurich alone often in a thousand mouths once, but that may not be. Therefore, Luther says, if human nature were not commonly reported in this way, the simple would not reckon human nature differently from divine nature. Now the divine is omnipresent; therefore the simple should think that the human is also omnipresent, and thus it would be thought that the body of Christ is in the Sacrament of the Last Supper. And if the pious alloeosis clearly brings this to light, then he speaks to her effectively 4) as to an old witch. But if she is interrogated against Luther, he will not bring anything against her, but will stand at her footsteps. Now if Luther says: "that those are mistaken who admit that the divine nature is that of the human nature," and here he cannot say that the divine nature suffers, but only the one nature, the human nature; then Luther is mistaken when he thinks that one should beware of the decision.

Luther speaks further in the postillum shown above on the third day of Christ: 5) "Now that we come again to Christ, it is to be firmly believed that Christ is true God and true God."

Man. And sometimes the scripture, and he himself, speaks as a pure 6) man; sometimes as a pure 6) God; as when he says Joh. 8: 'Before Abraham was, I am', this is said of the Godhead. But when he says Matth. 20. to Jacob and John: 'It is not mine to give you to sit on the right hand or on the left hand'; that is spoken of the pure 6) humanity." So much Luther.

But now we want to set against it his own words from the Confession. Luther at the sixth tablet: 7) "Thou shalt not believe nor suppose that the tropus alloeosis is in such sayings, or that one nature is taken for another in Christ." So much Luther.

(223) Now I ask Luther whether this saying, "Before Abraham was, I am," is spoken of mankind in the same way as it is spoken of the Godhead? He says: No; so the alloeosis, i.[e.] counterchange, is saved. And if the divine nature alone is understood, and if Christ himself speaks, then the speech, which must actually be understood of the One nature alone, is taken for the whole of Christ, and therefore one nature for the other. And if the God is man, then the divine must be taken without the human. Luther would say that [they] are not one person. Not that we want to say that the humanity was also before Abraham, which is the same as the divinity One Christ; but that we see how it is appropriate to speak differently of both natures. The humanity of Christ was nowhere when Abraham was; nor does Christ the man speak that he, who is also God, was before him; which was of the Godhead alone. And yet the whole Christ speaks, that is, the whole person, God and man.

But if Luther says: Yes, that humanity is understood in the same way, then it follows that he was not born of Mary of virgins, because the same had never been born. It follows further: if he had been man, that he would have had two human natures in him: one, which was born before Abraham, and the other, which was born of Mary, and the like innumerable errors and blasphemies. I did not say so much here, because Luther wants to say as if Christ's body had also been in heaven, since he was assumed in the unity of the person of the Son of God, and only began to grow in the body of Mary according to the nature of humanity; for he speaks thus after many lamentations:

Luther at [Arc] I at the 2nd tablet, 1) from the words: "The Son of Man, who is in heaven": "A devout Christian tell me, whether it is not higher and greater that mankind is in GOD, yes, with GOD One Person, than that it is in heaven? Is not God higher and more glorious than Heaven? Now Christ humanity has been higher and lower in God and before God from the womb than any angel, so of course it has also been higher in heaven than any angel. For what is in and before God is in heaven, just as the angels are when they are on earth, as is said in Matth. 18" These are all Luther's words.

Here are, pious princes, so many errors, so many words. But briefly! so Luther falls with the argument, 3) since he thus wants to conclude: To be one person with God is greater, neither to be in heaven; now his humanity was one person with the Son of God: so it was also in heaven. This is called beautiful a a substantia ad accidens, to conclude from substance to importance by the deception of likeness. As I said: It is greater that Christ is a Lord of lords and has the kingdom of consciences, neither that he has the fleshly kingdom of David. So he is also an earthly king in the kingdom of David. Yes, of course it is a wonderful thing that he, who is one person with the Son of the eternal God without suffering, started here in time and has been suffering until the declaration after his death. For if he had been bodily in heaven, he would never have hungered or thirsted in heaven, nor would he have been scourged or crucified in heaven, as little as the Godhead was crucified. For mankind suffered so unitedly that it cried out, "O my God, how hast thou forsaken me?" as Luther himself confesses here, "that it might not have helped itself on the cross. But against the blasphemy of all is the saying of John 7: "Jesus was not yet declared.

The other argument: "The humanity of Christ is higher than any angel: so it is also higher in heaven than any angel. But Luther put 4) an importance, the ubi, into it. And that now it is true that he is bodily exalted above all angels, but that was not true then; for he was here on earth, and not in heaven. Therefore it follows as little that Christ was bodily present in heaven, as in a place, as little.

this conclusion follows: Christ's humanity was higher, nobler and more precious than any angel. God never had an angel crucified, so Christ was not crucified either. So we let up that mankind was not more noble than the angels, which is not the case by nature, Ps. 8: "You have made him less than the angels", but according to dignity and sanctification he is the firstborn, that is, the most noble of all creatures, Col. 1. Thus all the escapes that Luther seeks are enough to blaspheme God's Son and man.

228. the third. "What is in and before GOD, that is in heaven." I ask Luther whether Mary, according to the as 5) she had said to herself: ecce, ancilla domini, nun Wohlin, ich will eine Dienerin des HErrn sein! had been in and before GOtt? Now he must ever affirm that she is in GOD; "for in Him we are, in Him we live and strive." He must also affirm that she was before God; for all things lie bare and manifest before Him, Heb. 4. But was she therefore in heaven? I think not; or else she would not have suffered the hearty death stings on earth. Thus it is false that what is in and before God is in heaven. Dear, which theologian has ever spoken in this way?

But here Luther will mercifully cry out 6): Help God, the great people (whether he called us people, because he almost calls us devils, he has such a friendly spirit), and thus say: Now I have given a good explanation, how Christ is mankind in heaven; since I said so afterwards:

Luther: 7) "Yes, how? if I were to say that not only Christ was in heaven when he walked on earth, but also the apostles, and we all, if we are mortal on earth, as far as we believe in Christ" 2c. Here you can see how I mean it. 8)

230 Answer. Luther says that Christ was bodily in heaven at that time, just as we are still in heaven today. We then want to become one with him, not only about this saying, but also about the whole main point; thus: We are now in heaven with body, soul and mind (for I do not mean that Luther wants to understand "in heaven" cosmographically, as all bodies are in heaven), in God's knowledge, cognition, election, prudence. 2c, but the bodies 1) are not themselves naturally essential in it. So also Christ was there in heaven, when he lived here, and in addition so much more, that he is one person with the Son of God; still he was not himself naturally essential with the body in heaven.

But what does this see against us? Yes, but it is the ointment to defile the mouths of the simple. Well then, if Luther means it, we will soon be one. We gladly recognize that Christ's body is in the supper, as our bodies are now in heaven, that is, in the knowledge, choice and prudence of God. For whoever does not recognize Christ in the Last Supper, does not trust in Him, does not carry Him in his heart with all certainty, that He has accepted true human prestige, and with it has accepted our prestige, has made us certain children and fellow heirs of God, and therefore does not give Him thanks, emits a judgment to Himself. So we have him in the supper; 3) but naturally, essentially, and bodily, that is as little possible as having the moon in the bowl when it shines in. And it is to be taken care of, who thus say, undoubtedly believe themselves to have him in the supper, neither milk nor moon, as [the] proverb reads, in the bowl.

232 But that Luther wants to be understood as "being in heaven" is indicated by the messages he sends in after much reproach, in which "being in heaven" is taken in Hebrew for "heavenly" or "divinely minded," as one is in heaven, and as we pray: "Your will be done on earth as it is in heaven. As also Isa. 27. xxxxxx, in war, is taken for warlike or fienklich. 4) Equally as one also speaks: we were yesterday in paradise, for: We were in friendly yet great joy with lovely company, song, instrument 2c. Paul speaks of such an opinion in Eph. 1: "God has gifted us 5) (Luther, however, makes "bless" out of it) with all kinds of spiritual gifts in the heavenly places in Christ." Here "in the heavens" is taken for "with heavenly gifts," and that with Christ, as the following words indicate. Thus Luther also misconstrues the other sayings. So Luther does not want to have Christ in heaven any other way, neither we are up there, except for the personal union, in the word: "The Son of Man who is in heaven"; so it must not be necessary; we are one. But then he must recognize that in the word "the Son of man who is in heaven" the word "is" is not taken essentially; namely, not for "being essential," but only in recognition of 2c. being. And then the word in the supper, "This is my body," may also mean that in thanksgiving the body of Christ is in the mind 6) and that the signs signify this. But if he does not want to let this go, he must confess that the alloeosis is here, and that "the Son of Man" is taken for "the Son of God. And so this, it follows that the humanity in Christ is not alloeosis, since the Godhead is. Summa, taking the "is" as he will, he lies in the word, "The Son of man, which is in heaven."

Lastly, he says: 7) "Just as the angels are in heaven and on earth, as he proved in Matthew 18," meaning the saying: "Their angels always see the face of my Father who is in the heavens. Here I ask him if he wants to say that the angels were once 8) essential on earth and in heaven? He says yes; therefore write. He says: Matth. 18. There Christ does not say that they are at one time 8) in heaven and on earth, but he speaks thus from word to word: "For I say to you that their angels see in the heavens all the way" 2c. Hie is "in the heavens," ἐν οὐρανῷ, sine articulo, non enim dicitur οἱ ἐν οὐρανῷ, from which something would like to be zeiset. Now it is not new to see from one place to another, but not to be there; for Luther needs it also in this matter, that I am surprised that he did not think of it here. The glorious word of Stephen is a witness: "I see the heavens open, and Jesus sitting at the right hand of the power of God. Now Stephen was not in heaven; but the eyes of the soul look up; yes, according to Luther, just so that we do not quarrel, the bodily eyes also saw the appearance that God opened to him 2c. Much less must the angels be in both places, and still see the Father above, and work their Empfelch [command] here.

Now we come again to Luther's word from the Postil, since he said for the other: "To sit on the right or on the left is not mine, to give you" 2c., be spoken of pure humanity." Then I must ask him: If I thus spoke: This is spoken of mere humanity; whether he does not reasonably suspect me of separating the one person? Yes, of course he does, although it has never occurred to me, and yet I have never used the "pure" that I know of. But Luther is right: It is spoken of the pure humanity. And if, nevertheless, Christ is uncertified, and if, nevertheless, Christ has spoken, then the whole Christ alone is taken for the one nature; or else, if he is uncertifiable, one nature for the other; then the innocent alloe0- sis is saved. And stand fast, that every nature in one person keeps its quality eternally.

Luther continues in the same postillon: Luther: 1) "Just as the same could not help her on the cross. However, some here want to prove great art with their sinister interpretation that they meet the heretics.

Luther speaks against this: 2) "Thus says the Holy Spirit, John 3: God so loves the world that he gives his own Son to it. Rom. 8: "He did not spare His own Son, but gave Him for us all. And so from then on, all works, words, sufferings, and what Christ does, does, works, speaks, suffers, the true Son of God" 2c.

237 See here, pious princes, whether Luther does not deal with anything but dyeing and dazzling. In the previous speech from the postillon, he publicly recognizes that mankind could not have helped itself on the cross, and speaks here that everything that Christ suffers, the Son of God suffers, and does not want to let up on the alloe0sim, the counterchange; so it followed that the person of the Son of God had died, that it could not have helped itself.

238 But I hope you, pious princes, see that he, blinded by anger, refutes what he himself holds. For in the previous speech it is said that mankind did not like to help itself on the cross. But when he speaks in this book: The true Son of God suffers 2c., he ever wants to blind as if he also suffered according to divine nature. And he does this with the word "truly". It is true that he who has suffered is the true Son of God; but he has not suffered, indeed, he does not like to suffer, because of his divine nature. He still goes about it in such a way that the simple are confused and can distinguish between the two.

The people of the world do not quite decide, and like to leave them in the misconception that God's Son also suffered according to the divinity itself; only that next to him, they assume that mankind is also, as it were, the divinity everywhere. Should not one explain, when he says: The true Son of God suffers, that he truly did not turn to suffering, but to the Son, so that he, who is the true Son of God, has suffered; but not according to the nature which is named here, but according to the other, which is with this One Christ? Thus, when it is said, Man is dead, all men understand that the body alone is dead, for the soul may not die; nor is it said of the whole man, and yet the superior part may not die. That is ever sought with violence darkness, and the darkening, which is before cheerful rejuvenation.

But since someone would say here: Luther explains himself 4) soon afterwards thus:

Luther: "Because you have to say that. The person 5) (shows Christ) suffers, dies. Now the person is truly God; therefore it is rightly said: God's Son suffers. For although one part (that I speak thus), as the Godhead, does not suffer; nevertheless 6) the person, who is God, suffers in the other part, as in mankind. Just as one says, "The king's son is sore; yet all his leg is sore" 2c.

240 As much as Luther. Here, behold, pious princes, I well recognize that Luther speaks rightly and Christianly; insofar as by the word "person" he understands "Christ", not that which is most prominent in the person, "the Son of God" 2c. For otherwise one is not wont to say: The person suffers; and I would not wish the words themselves otherwise. For they are entirely of our opinion, namely, that when one speaks thus: God's Son suffers, dies; that there God's Son is taken for mankind in Christ. As when one says: Man is wounded, and yet only the body is wounded; so "man" stands for "body" here. What can be said more clearly in this matter? If we are now completely one in this place, why are we not one everywhere? Because Luther does not stay with it, and now speaks one thing, and soon another. And there are many more simple-minded people who are thus confused by his words, 7) so that they now do not have any up-whether he is equal to himself and exists, but rather they 1) just want to come forth and maintain with Luthern: The humanity of Christ is everywhere; it was bodily in heaven before the ascension; it is bodily essential in the supper; the Godhead is also sufferable; and the like. And if one looks at Luthern thoroughly, his own words are able to do otherwise. But he speaks no less clumsy words, so that those who believe him fall into error. Isn't that a workaholicism? If he is long and insistent, then the truth forces him to be time-barred against himself. Look at the words:

241. Luther [in the bow] h in the first panel: 2) "For if I believe this, that human nature alone has suffered for me; then Christ is a poor Savior to me; so He probably needs a Savior Himself" 2c.

242 Behold here, pious princes, the words against the forerunner, which please us so well! There he says publicly that although the Godhead does not suffer, humanity does suffer 2c. Here he speaks with such a form of words that it cannot be defended; for he speaks exclusively that where he believed that human nature alone suffered for him, he must not be his savior. What can be said more blasphemously? If God may also suffer, then he has also died; for suffering is here taken for dying. Is he no longer the only undying God? 1 Tim. 6.

243 By these words one sees that Luther wants to darken by force, and to swim away in the fog, that is, to speak such words, which are understood differently before the simple, neither he wanted to have spoken them, if one asked him for it. Is this honest? Are we speaking two different things from one mouth? If we build up again that which we have broken, we open ourselves up to be derogators or transgressors 3). Gal. 2.

244 So now Luther says white, soon black, he undoubtedly wants to think that it is to act with God's word as ringferig (frivolously) as one plays in the Brennter 4). And that is a wonder that in the unfortunate speech (for I am sorry from the bottom of my heart that he gets into such error) he has not been so careful that he would have thought so: Well then, if your adversary were to say, "If my God were to be a suffering God in some way," then he would have to say he will not be my God. And I say for myself: If Christ Jesus would be suffering according to the Godhead, he would not be God, he would not have to be my God either. Abel 5) Let it be far from us that we come to the point with quarrels 6) that we, to the screen of error, also blaspheme God! Augustinum's quarrel also involved that he spoke something about co-suffering of the Godhead, contra Felicianum. He explains himself in such a way that he only understands the soul of Christ, which would have suffered sorrow in the dying of the body according to the word: "My soul is sorrowful until death". But where will Luther turn here, if the popes will accuse him of having spoken: The divinity of Christ has also suffered death; and if this is spread to him with writings, will this not be recognized in eternity for the most blasphemous, foolish error? For even the philosophi have recognized τὸ θεῖον ἄ-ίávarov, numen esse immortale, which is GOD, that must be ohntödemlich. Now when it is said, Christ suffered for us, by "suffer" is understood to suffer death; for with his death we are made alive.

If Luther says of the suffering of the Godhead, as if without it Christ should not be his Savior, he must understand that it also died; for if he would have understood that it suffered in hunger, thirst, scourging, crowning, and not in death, it would not have suffered, since the most powerful sum of the suffering was: "with his death we are made alive," not with hunger 2c. The same things he hath well borne for common remedy and consolation of our temptations, but the payment is death, as is invented in the 2nd [Epistle to the] Corinthians Cap. 5. and throughout the Epistle to Hebrews. I should not scold in such a cruel matter; but I may well say to Verschupfung 7) des Irrsall: If Luther insists that the Godhead has suffered, and therefore must have died, then the pope is still right that he wants to be his governor. For Paul also says in Hebrews 7 that the chief priests of the Old Testament were many because death did not leave them. If now the eternal Son of God has died to us according to the Godhead, then the pope is justly his governor. And in the darkness, Luther has lost himself badly on a stick. We still want to question him further, so that he may not complain.

Item, Marci 13: No one knows about that day, neither the angels nor the Son, but only the Father. Is it not necessary here to use the phrase: The Son does not know', that is, he does not want to say it. What does the gloss do?"

247. so much Luther. Behold, pious princes, whether Luther weiß was 2) say otherwise, neither we have ever talked or taught with the pious alloeos? Nor do we want to hear him further.

Luther in the aforementioned postillon: 3) "The humanity of Christ, just like another holy natural man, has not always thought, spoken, willed, noticed all things, as some make an omnipotent man out of him. The two natures and their work in each other are not evident. As he has not seen, heard, felt all things at all times, so he has not looked at all things with his heart at all times, but as God has led him and brought them before him."

249 So much Luther. Look here, pious princes, at each piece in particular, so that the speech we want to set afterwards will be all the clearer to us.

I. The humanity of Christ has not always thought all things 2c., like another holy man.

II. That some do wrong without a doubt, who make an all-powerful man out of him.

III. That they also do wrong who mix the two natures and their works together.

IV. That he did not look at all things with his heart at all times:

V. But as God has guided and directed him.

In this, however, we are one, even though there are some words that we have not presented in such an uncouth way; Luther is still right in his opinion. For all the differences that we have with one another, of two natures and effects, are known here again by Luther. If the humanity of Christ has not at all times thought, perceived, spoken, and willed all things as another human being, then it is distinguished from the divinity according to human nature and effect. Just as man consists of soul and body, so each is of one essence, nature and effect, but with a difference, that, although the body has its own nature and essence, it does not have the continuance of its essence without the soul; for as soon as the soul is from it, it has fallen away; and as soon as the soul is added to it, it is again raised into existentiam, into a state 4) as will happen in the last judgment. Now the two natures, body and soul, are nevertheless one man and one person, although the person is composed of two beings and natures, but not of two beings, each of which has its own special permanent existence, but only the one, the soul. So in Christ the essential natural Godhead is also the essential natural humanity One Person; and the one nature, namely the human, is not of its own continuance and abstinence in the person; but as the common man's body has its continuance and abstinence in the soul, so the whole humanity of Christ, body and soul, has continuance and abstinence in his other nature of the Godhead.

251 But Luther did not say that this was taken from the juggler's bag, for this is how Scotus and John Picus Mirandola write on the measures, and all theologians de ente et essentia, et de essentia et existentia; so we now bring the proof. Christ says John 10: "I have power to take my soul from me (I know that soul means life to the Hebrews, but the soul gives life) and to take it to me again. Now Christ's soul cannot be any other soul than an essential natural soul. But in these words we see that it has its continuance, abode, and retention in the Godhead, when he says: "He has power to add the soul and to take it again. For the human soul, which is like the sustainer of the body, has no power to put the body down and take it away again. Therefore in Christ there is a stronger sustainer and sustainer of neither the soul, who also can put away and take again the soul, who is the Son of God. Item, Col. 2: "In him dwelleth all Godhead bodily." I do not want to say here at length whether "bodily" means "essential" or whether "bodily" means xar xxxxxxxxx.

The word "human" is taken to mean that the full Godhead dwells in humanity, for Luther does not like to hear it. But as the soul is said to dwell in the body, yet the body dwells in the strength and preservation of the soul; so also here the Godhead is said to dwell in the humanity of Christ, 6) since the humanity, in its

The first thing is that the divine nature and person is taken up, remains in it, exists and is preserved. And this is personae constitutio, 1. that which makes a person, through all creation, when two natures come over one and into one stock. (rationalis creaturae individua substantia.)

Now it is heard enough that the body comes to the soul, it has its own being and nature, but not a retaining power, but the soul is its retaining power. Unde et philosophi²) actum vocarunt aut potius actionem. Therefore the name "person" is assigned by us to the holy three names, not that the holy scripture calls them "persons," but that, as a person consists in the soul, since the corpse is also a part of the person, therefore the three, which otherwise have not special beings, but special qualities, are Father, Son, Spirit, One Being. Therefore, the three who are One God are called persons; not according to the quality of Scripture, 3) as also Augustine ās oivit. Ub. 7. oap. 4. but according to the comparison of the God-fearing mind, which desires to show us the divine unity of the three in One Being. Have I ever had to indicate, pious princes, for it helps to reject Luther's error; he speaks of things not only darkly, but also unjustly and very seductively, as will come. And now speak Luther.

Luther in the Confession [in the Arc] h at [the] 4th tablet: 4) "For where the works are divided and separated, there also the person must be divided, because all works or sufferings are not assigned to the natures, but to the persons; for it is the person who does and suffers everything, one according to this nature, the other according to that nature; as all this is well known to the learned."

Here I urge that Luther's word be measured carefully, neither the silver nor the golden predicates; for one will see that he is not only not one with the superior words from the postilion, but also speaks publicly against himself in the words themselves that are there. First, he says here: where the works are divided and separated, the person must also be divided. Here I ask Luther: which theologian has ever taught that the difference of works separates the person? or whether he does mean in his heart, that it is thus? No, he does not mean it seriously; for he says immediately in four lines the contradiction, as will come. Or whether he means, that neißwa [anyhow] is such a confused mind, which believes this? For what man does not recognize that the corpse eats, and drinks, and wakes, and swallows, and heals, 2c., and does not describe any of these in the soul; and yet they are only One Person. The soul, however, understands, calculates, thinks, judges, 2c., none of which the corpse is capable of, and yet they are only One Person. And all theologians have always recognized that not only the effects but also the natures do not separate a person. For if this were the case, then man would be two persons, one the body, the other the soul; and Christ would be three persons, one the Son of God, the other his soul, which is created, the third the corpse, which grew out of the lineage of Abraham. For this reason, too, theologians judge from God's Word that His humanity, that is, true body and soul, is included in the continuance and preservation of the person of the Son of God; that His divinity and humanity are not two persons, or else there would be four persons in the divinity. But Luther speaks immediately as if he had never known what the difference is between singulare, suppositum, individuum et personam. If he now says in the postilion: The humanity of Christ, just like another holy natural man, has not always thought, spoken, noticed all things, 2c., then I ask Luther: whether the divinity of Christ also, like a holy natural man, does not always think, will and notice all things? Will he undoubtedly say: the Godhead is knowledge, light, clarity, wisdom, power itself; how could light not be light, knowledge not be knowledge? 2c. It also follows that the human will of Christ, the human mind of Christ, has had its own human natural kind, just as our body and soul have their own kind, which is different from the kind of spirit that God knew in us, Rom. 7.

255 Probation. Christ says: Not my will, but yours be done, 6) and nevertheless remains only one person, although he has his own will, according to mankind. But this alone, because mortality is attached to his body; after the declaration of the original state, the weakness and contradiction is accepted. 1 Cor. 15: "If the fragile attaches to the unbreakable, and the mortal attaches to the undead.

Then the saying that is written, "Death is swallowed up," 2c. For the weakness and fear of Christ was because of death; but if the fear of death or of going into mischief is accepted, not only does the will of Christ not resist his divine will, but our bodies will not resist the soul either; for since there is no fear of mischief, only then is the body helped to peace and rest. Therefore Paul also cries out: "I wretched man, who will deliver me from the deadly body? The grace of God through Christ" 2c. Now if Luther so publicly indicates in the postillon that the works of the two natures are so different that the divine cannot be given that which is human, and says here that the works separate the person, it follows that he separates the person, not we. In short! Luther has stretched out his neck, he does not care what he says, how he speaks against himself, how he speaks against God's word. May God pardon him!

This becomes even more obvious when we consider the next words of the confession in relation to each other. To the last he thus insinuates: "For it is the person who does and suffers everything, one according to this nature, the other according to that nature, as the scholars well know. Behold, pious princes, how this rhymes so well! In the beginning he says: he who separates the works separates the person. And in the end he separates the works with such proper words, that I let them stand out in the face with large letters 1). And says: the person does and suffers all things, but one according to this nature, the other according to that nature. Oh God! What do we teach and speak differently, because the last words are! Do we not say that God and man are One Christ, only One Person? But the natures are distinct, each with its own quality and nature, and the difference cannot separate the person. And is herewith our woe, lamentation, and cry; "for who shall be vexed, that it may not burn us ?" 2 Cor. 11. Yes, our woe is that Luther just speaks in four lines against himself, and urges him 2) God to speak against his presumption, and to ever confess the truth. And the solemn deceivers (I should have said teachers) do not want to see that Luther in no place throughout this whole book argues so hostilely nowhere against us, God forces him to recognize the undefiled truth with us, thus,

1) Zwingli thus refers to what is printed locked in § 253.

2) "him" put by us instead of: "in".

that the whole of Scripture is nothing else at all, neither a message that Luther has been overcome, nor that he does not like the truth. Says someone: Why do you write with so much work against him? Answer: Only so that the quackery, that is, the dishonesty, the dishonest and confused way of being in the matter, and the false teaching, may be well recognized and henceforth be forgiven. 3) For all the brethren must know this. For all the brethren must inform me that I have been blasphemed by Luther for the fourth time with open words, and yet I have tried to write against him, 4) all in the good hope that God would open the light for him to see the truth; but he sees it, yes, he forgets it, 5) and does not want to see it or to understand it. As Isaiah, Cap. 6, Christ, Matth. 13, indicate.

257. II. This becomes still more clear when the words in the postillon are considered more truly, since he speaks thus: 6) that some do wrong who make an omnipotent man out of him; and if the humanity of Christ were extended according to the Godhead, as Luther says, then the humanity of Christ would ever be omnipotent; for omnipotence is from the infinite. And may nothing be omnipotent at all, but the united infinite good, and what is essentially infinite, that is also omnipotent. Now if the body of Christ is everywhere where the Godhead is, it is essentially infinite; if it is essentially infinite, it is also omnipotent. I will prove all these disorders with Luther's own words.

Luther [in the arc] i [at the] 2nd tablet: 7) "So it must follow that he also be and may be according to the third, supernatural way everywhere where God is, and everything be full of Christ through and through according to mankind; not according to the first, bodily comprehensible way, but according to the supernatural divine way" 2c.

Watch! This is a wonderful theologian! Who then mixes the natures? All theologians say that "being everywhere" is the inner nature of the divine being, and they are right. For the word Jer. 23: "I fill the heavens and the earth," may suit no one but the one divine being. Now he admits it to mankind, regardless of all the Scriptures that contradict it: so he must ever mix the natures and make an omnipotent man out of him. 2, from the prophet David:

4) i.e. abstain.

5) i.e. he confesses it.

6) Walch, St. Louis Edition, vol. XII, 155, § 12.

7) No. 21, § 143.

"You will not let my soul go to hell." Now the Godhead is essential and powerful everywhere, also in hell, so also the soul of Christ, and therefore the whole mankind, would have to be in hell; contrary to the proclamation of David and Peter. For this is the way of the declared bodies, to have eternal joy in heaven or eternal sorrow in hell with the soul. And if Christ were humanity in hell, but since the Godhead is unsuffering, Christ would have to suffer humanity in hell: such a glorious thing followed from Luther's teaching.

Luther speaks the same: 1) "And where you would show a place where God would be and not man, then the person would already be separated" 2c. Answer: yes, we have shown it now. In hell is God, Ps. 118. And is the man Jesus Christ not in hell, as is now heard. And the person is no longer separated at all, because the soul went out of him when he let the spirit (that is, the soul and the life) out of him or gave it out, Matth. 27, and the soul went out of him, Joh. 10. The soul of Christ was separated from the body, but the person was not separated, because it was always One Person. So also the person is not separated, since mankind is not everywhere, where the Godhead is.

But on this he brings a still greater error, and Luther speaks in the same place: "Because then I could say with the truth: here is God, who is not man, and has never been man! Not to me of God" 2c.

262 Here you see, pious, wise princes, well 2) a beautiful sophistical little pellet Luther tears! how he concludes from the accidens (importance) to the substance (or essence), and chases the mayor with the red pants 3) around in the bath. He first spoke thus: Where you would show a place, where God would be, and man would not be, the 2c. dissected, there is in every place the ubi, that is, the "where", or place; so here he omits the udi finely and puts the substance instead, and says: Here is God, who is not man! See how he has put a "the" for the "there", which points to the substance! but there he should also have put the "there" for mankind and thus have spoken: Here is God, since man is not! and not: who is not man. For since God is in hell, since mankind is not, God is nevertheless man. The Emperor's mind is in Milan, and he is in Hispania and not in Milan;

It does not follow that he is a man. The sun is in its celestial circle; and there is no sunshine nor day in the whole world, it is from the one sun, and is also called the sun; nor is the corpus, the body of the sun, here. And so the power, the shine and the brilliance of the sun can be everywhere; and the body of the sun is not everywhere, but only in one place. So the divine being is everywhere, and where one can say: There is God, there one can say: There is God, who is man. Behold, how I now add "the" to God and to man! But you cannot say: Where God is, there is man.

263 Here Luther leads 4) a long Stempei 5) from the Sophists armory, as a thing in looo, that is, in one place is, understandable, incomprehensible and supernatural. Now I leave it that he has not quite verteutschet 6) circumscriptive, definitive, impletive, and will alone indicate 7) that he has also not quite read the Sophisten Güsel. [To the first: Circumscriptive, that is, "to be comprehensible (will also use his words) in one place" is, if a body is whole and with all its parts in one place, that it and its parts may not be in another place or exterior. This description alone befits the corpse of Christ, and Luther alone excludes it [I] do not allow myself to be mistaken by his wild examples, which he now brings forth, and thus proves the "being comprehensibly in one place" of the corpse of Christ. But "comprehensible" must not be understood that I and everyone comprehend the body, but that the body is of such a kind that it is in one place alone, with all its members, although no one ever grasps it. An eagle bends all its days in the air, that no one seizes it; nor is it circumscriptive, that is, comprehensible in one place.

264. andexn, so the whole description of the comprehensible place befits the declared corpse of Christ. Well, if we wanted to loosen Luther 8), he is not in a place so grossly corporeal, as his straw bag, and the sheriff with the red pants in the bath. But circumscriptive, that is, 9) um-

1) he should not thus understand bodily, oorporalitor, nor verteutfchen bodily. But he teutschet and gropes around in all things, like the young dog in the child bath. I leave to 2) all who are reported to sophistry or philosophy, whether circumscriptive should be verteutschet: corporaliter.

Thirdly, the declared bodies of men are contained, circumscribed, and prized in one place only; not otherwise do all believers know. Proof: We are beautifully introduced by Paul, 1 Cor. 15, into the knowledge of the transfigured bodies through the heavenly bodies of the sun and stars, which are also bodies, and are circumscriptive, that is, encompassed, circumscribed and prized in one place, and yet are not as coarse bodies as the coarse sheriff in red pants in Luther's stable (Forgive me, all believing hearts! I can't help it, I have to speak shamefully about things, when I see Luther's laborious intercourse, since he becomes so gouty 3) that he doesn't know how wildly he should speak). So also the declared bodies of all men are prizes in one place. And if the corpse of Christ is according to the original state, as ours will be, then it is also only in one place.

266 If this proof also serves for the article "seated at the right hand," then we want to set up two works with one proof. One, that Christ's body is embraced; the other, that he is at the right hand of God. Although the right hand, that is, the majesty and power of God, is everywhere at work, his body is not everywhere bodily present.

That Christ's body is embraced.

267 Gal. 4.: "GOD sent His Son, who was born of a woman (see here at a pretense, GOD's Son, per alloeosim, by the counterchange, actually called only humanity; though it is true that he who is born is GOD; and Mary gave birth to GOD; but not according to the Godhead, but the man whom she bore is also GOD; and [she] is GOD's child-bearer, therefore that her child is GOD's natural son; as the princess of Bavaria is said to have said, she gave birth to princes, not counts or lords) is made." Now if the humanity of Christ is made by a woman, it is encompassed, umzielt, umprisen.

268. Philippenses 2: "He emptied himself (emptied himself, that is, forgave his divine glory, as all believers have ever understood) and took the form 5) of a servant, and became like men, half a man in nature and walk, like another man"; βῆχματι εὔρε&εῖς ὡς ἄνθρωπος. Annota primum verbum inventus hebraice poni pro fuisse; secundo ut homo, hominem poni sine articulo, unde naturam potius et speciem significat, quam individuum. Transtulimus ergo: homo sicut alius homo. De forma σχ-ῆ-ματι non est monendum, quod nonnunquam ponitur pro forma, quae dat esse rei, nonnunquam pro persona; ideo tam late exposuimus: "of the being and change half" 2c. Now if Christ is fully human like us, except for the sinful, as will follow, and we are umzielt Und umprisen, then he is also so, or else he would not be true man like us.

Hebr. 2. chapter: "He has to be compared to the brothers in all things" 2c. Behold! in all things, except the sinful. Now we are included, so is he.

270 There: "If therefore the children of all are of flesh and blood, he is also partaker of them. Behold! He is partaker of them as we are, and we are included, so is he included.

Hebr. 4: "We do not have a chief priest who may not have compassion on our infirmities, but one who is skilled in all things, as it were, like us, except sin" 2c. Behold, pious princes, if Christ's body had been in heaven and on the cross at one time, as Luther raves, he would not have been trained in all things as we are; for ever in heaven the stapling of the nails, the painful lifting up, would not have hurt him 2c. So it follows publicly that he was embraced, embraced and embraced, as also every man is.

But Luther wanted to say: Before death Christ was included, but not after death. Answer: It is sufficiently evident about the word John 3: "the Son of Man who is in heaven" that Luther says: he was then also in heaven bodily; that it is a seductive error.

Here, pious reader, is the nonsensical blasphemous speech that Luther leads. Item [Bogen] k⁷) on the seventh and eighth tablets, and what he also says, he brings no other scripture, because: Luther: In gelte in dieser Sache gleich so viel, als über, außer, durch und wieder herdurch und allenthalben 2c. Behold, how so finely köppisch 1) and gauklerisch Luther can speak of it! And that the simple are blinded, so that they do not inquire about anything; so he sighs 2) deeply on it, and cries, "Oh, what am I talking about such high things!" Here he should have added, if I can do nothing at all with it. We still want to show him the fullness of it, and, according to the original state, to prove that we have embraced the body of Christ.

(274) Luke 24 says himself: "Behold my hands and my feet, that I myself am"; or "that I am the one"; understand "one" for "actually". With which words he wants to say, he is the one actually himself, who was before with them, and is again with them. Now, if he is umprisen before death, he is umprisen also after death, or else he would not be the actually himself Christ.

There he speaks further: "Attack me, and look at me; for a spirit has neither flesh nor bone, as you see that I have. If the body of Christ has allowed itself to be attacked, it has certainly been embraced; for that which is not embraced cannot be attacked. In addition, "having the flesh and the bones" is a definite description of the body that is embraced. For what has parts is targeted; even more so what has limbs. For the legs need not be as large as the whole body; likewise the flesh alone need not be as large as flesh and leg, veins, nerves, and all the members with one another. I know well that the declared body of Christ is not to be understood so roughly as flesh and blood and bones, like Luther's proud body in red pants; but I understand that Christ with the miraculous attack wanted to make them understand his whole true humanity; and that he would bring back his true body, which he brought into the world from the handmaid Mary, even from the dead, yet declared; not made infinite or all-embracing; or else they would not have been able to reach over a finger, a hole of the nails. And not I alone have the understanding, but [also] Ambrose and Augustine, yes, all believers; yes, Luther himself. For I firmly believe that all his life he never intended that the body of Christ should be everywhere, until the quarrel brought him to the point where 4) he stands there so miserable and sweats like one who is beating the last shell of his father's inheritance.

276. Paul speaks 1 Cor. 15. thus: "The first man is of the earth, kätin (of dung, earthly) or stöybin (stäubin, of dust: The other man (see! "Man" and "the other man," that by the contrast thou mayest know that he is true man, as Abraham was; wherefore he is called the other Adam here in this chapter) is the HEART from heaven. Now as the celestial is, so must the celestial be: And as the celestial is, so must the celestial be. And as we have borne the likeness of the cothine; so shall we bear the likeness of the celestial." Here you see, pious princes, through all the burden and weight of the words, that Paul makes Christ our firstfruits, and us the offspring; so that as he rose from the dead, so he presented to us an image, that we also may become the offspring. If then Christ's declared corpse would be everywhere, our declared bodies would also have to be everywhere. It follows also, per conversionem simplicem: we shall have declared bodies, as Christ has; so also Christ has a declared body, as we shall have. Now ours will be encompassed and circumscribed; so also Christ's body will have to be. Know ye also how χα>^' αλληγορίαν Paul's words may be understood as an exhortation that we should live heavenly, but the fundamental meaning is that of which we speak here. So Luther misses the point about the body of Christ, as he takes it to mean that he wants to either send or extend it to all ends and everywhere, according to humanity as well as according to divinity. Now it is at the right hand.

From the right hand of God in heaven.

Luther speaks of the right hand thus (is [in the arc] h in the 5th tablet): 5) "Item, because they do not prove that God's right hand is a special place in heaven: so my indicated way also still remains firm that Christ's body is everywhere, because he is at the right hand of God, which is everywhere; although we do not know how this happens, because we also do not know how it happens that God's right hand is everywhere."

278 Answer. Since Luther claims that he does not know how the right hand of God is everywhere, we want to tell him the same thing first. The right hand of God is taken everywhere in Scripture for the majesty of God.

The authority, power and might of God. So Isaiah 48 To one [i.e., to the first] of human nature half reckon. For speaks in the person of God: "I am the beginning and the Christ having in him two natures, according to the divine, end; my hand has made the earth firm, and my right hand it may well be said, Christ is at the right hand, and the right has measured the heavens. I called unto them, and they is universal; so Christ is universal; all is right, yea, stood with one another." Ps. 43. (44,4.): "Their strength according to the divine nature.

hath not cut them off, 1) but thy right hand." And 87th 282 Luther says: They are one person, which is Psalm: "Lord, make thy right hand known," that is, show inseparable. This is also true; but does it follow that each thy power 2c. Matth. 20: "Promise me that my two sons is a quality of the other? Says Luther: Yes; for it is said: will sit next to you, one at your right hand and the other" God has suffered, God has died, God has risen. Answer: 2c. Here also rights is taken for glory or majesty. Now if we have spoken enough of the saying, namely, that the Luther knows how the power of God is everywhere, his speeches have force for the reason that he who has knows how the right of God is everywhere; why then suffered, died, and been scourged is also God; not that does he say that he does not know? He wants to blind therefore the Godhead has suffered, 2c., as Luther himself without doubt.

279 Therefore look up, pious princes, when he says: only one of Solomon's fingers is sore. But here we speak as we must prove that God's right hand is a special place of the "also-at-himself-being of the distinct nature"; as, in heaven, or that Christ must be everywhere; so either when one speaks: God suffers; whether the divine nature with the right hand or with the body of Christ he must give itself suffers, or whether the speech must be understood us one over the eye; and therefore let us put his only personally? that is, well spoken of the person of the syllogism in order, if we may see wherewith he blinded two natures, but pertaining only to the One Nature.

us. Luther says: such speeches are appropriate for both

- 1) God's rights are universal;
- 2) Christ's body is at the right hand of God;
- 3) Thus Christ's body is everywhere.

(280) Here the first (major) cannot be deficient; for the right hand, that is, the power or authority of God, is universal. So we must see what deficiency the other has. Thus we find 1 Thes. 4: "And so we shall be with the Lord always." Here "to be with the Lord" means to be with Him in another way, neither is He halfway; or else we would have to say that our bodies also are halfway. And therefore sq "the creature being with God" is not to be spread out according to the infinite of the Godhead; for if so, the creature would not be a creature, but God Himself. For the one God is infinite and immeasurable. Job. 9: "He alone hath stretched out the heavens." 2) is a creature, it is not possible that it is always 5) not a creature. If then "being all" is only of the one Godhead and And (Cap.) 23: "He alone is, and none can turn aside his counsels." Now "to be omnipotent" is the vein and origin of omnipotence; now if the creature were omnipotent, it would be the Almighty, and therefore the Creator, and not the created.

On the other hand, we are half ashamed of human nature that we do not recognize it as a creature. And this does not serve to disgrace Christ, but it is the marvelous thing of which David says that the Son of God, through whom all things were created, has also taken to himself the creatures which he made. Now if the humanity of Christ is a creature, it is not possible that it is always 5) not a creature. If then "being all" is only of the one Godhead and Creator, it follows that the humanity of Christ is with God as a creature, although the highest creature that is in heaven and earth; and that it never leaves the kind of creature. Hominem, quem adsumpsit, from amigit the

Behold, pious princes! all this would come from our ancients have spoken; and we before with the word: "He saying, The right is universal; so is the humanity of Christ risen, and is not here", and in this place, have sufficiently universal. Therefore the defect is, that if we say, Christ indicated, that is at the right hand of God, (we) should not be able to

- 1) unburden - redeem.
- 2) i.e. extended.

3) This "so" seems too much.

4) "for" put by us instead of: "to whom".

5) evermore - ever.

he had true humanity in him in all ways, and was not everywhere when the angel spoke this 2c.

285 Let us make the matter still more pure. Christ says John 14: "We," that is, I and the Father, "will come to him who loves me and have our abode with him. From this we will now see an account that will not suffer the other saying: Christ's body is at the right hand of God, to be understood differently, neither that it is at the right hand of God, as a creature is with God. Thus.

- 1) God is everywhere;
- 2) Whoever loves Christ, with him is God:
- 3) So is he who loves Christ everywhere.

Here you see well, pious princes, where the defect is, namely, that of being with God, or, God being with man. For if God is with man, he remains everywhere; and the creature nevertheless remains in one place, and is also with God. Thus the humanity of Christ remains with God as one creature, and remains in one place; but the Godhead is everywhere.

287 Another calculation made on the life in heaven alone:

- 1) We will be with the Lord all the way; ¹⁾
- 2) The Lord is everywhere:
- 3) We will also be like this everywhere.

It is equally as false as the previous one. For "to be with the Lord" carries with it the secret connotation or touching, as the creature is with God. But it does not follow that the creature is with God, as he is everywhere. All this teaches us even more clearly that Christ speaks John 17: "I will, Father, that where I am, there My servant may be also. Here is a loud "where"; so I will now bring it out unconcealed:

- 1) We will be servants of Christ where Christ is. ²⁾
- 2) Christ is everywhere after mankind. ³⁾
- 3) We will be like this everywhere.

Behold, pious princes, how Christ himself instructs us that he is not everywhere after mankind, but in one place, when he says, "We shall be with him. Now it is certain that we will not be everywhere where the Godhead is; so it must follow that we and he are in one place after the body.

So here with the humanity of Christ. Paul speaks Phil. 2: "For this reason God has given him to be.

hear." Understand therefore that he suffered for us. If then suffering is a cause of exaltation, he is never exalted, so that his humanity is universal, as Luther says, before death. But if after death he is all things to all men, as he is to the Godhead, what need has he to go to heaven if he had been before all things?

But saith Luther, How may these things be? Answer: Are you a master in Israel and do not know that one should not know more than the true fear of God teaches? Or can you not take from the visible things a figurative knowledge of the eternal invisible* things? Consider for me 4) the sun! It is a body, a body that is surrounded, surrounded, surrounded, which is not at all in two places; but at the same time it illuminates and shines through the whole world, so that there is neither an end nor a place of air, whether in it, under it, around it, since its light is not. The Indian sees the sun, which the Hispanic sees; the Muscovite is in the sunshine, in which the Moor is, but the body of the sun is in none of the places. It is also none of the places or people with the body of the sun.

Thus the Sun of Righteousness, Christ Jesus, true God and man, is everywhere with the appearance and splendor of His divine power and being. But the body of mankind is alone in one place and is recognized and seen throughout the world with the eyes of the soul and faith. It is enough for us, if he is bodily only in one, his place. We do not wish him to come down, as we do not wish the sun to come down; it is enough for us in its place. There would come a Phaeton or a Luther, who would want to confuse, mix and confound it all. Let Christ sit there and let the light of his grace shine down to us; let him give light, joy, delight and pleasure to those who are above and around him, and yet be in only one place, and be seen and worshipped by all creatures. For after that he is one creature 2c. which cannot be separated 5). So it is with all the parables that Luther brings in.

The voice or sound is heard 6) a hundred thousand times a hundred thousand people, or as much as Luther wants. Still, the man or bell is only in one place, whose voice or sound is heard so far. So Christ is word and knowledge in the whole world, and he remains in one place.

The eye sees far; but the eye is in One place alone, and comes [not], 1) whither it sees. So Christ is in one place according to the eye, that is, according to humanity; but with the face, that is, according to the Godhead, he is everywhere. Since Luther says of the opalo, he shows himself that he klinim, lib: 37, oap. 6, either has not read or has not understood. Let it be, however, that the gold migeln 2) appears through the whole stone, and yet is only on one oertlet; but that is how it is for us.

294 "That Christ's body passed through the sealed tombstone," says Luther, not the Schrist. "The angel has taken away the tombstone," says the evangelist. Then the declared corpse did not have to penetrate through the tombstone. Luther's sheriff in red pants, the coarse knob, would like to come out. But that is the miracle in the original state, that he himself has risen. And shall we not make miracles, since they are not; or else the blind Jew may mock us, that we seal up the penetration for a miracle, and be it not in our Scripture. But be it so, nor prove it, that therefore the body of Christ is more than in one place. So, that his body went in to determined doors, that it penetrated through the substance of the door, the Scripture also does not say. And we must not help the power of God with our lying; for there are many other ways by which one may understand the declared body of Christ to have entered. There is not a place in the world where there is not air, God gives, how well one may refrain from preserving and obstructing anything; nor does air come into all places and ends. Therefore, if the declared corpse's ring-ready 3) and obedient ones are more flexible than the air, and if we are not aware of the purity of the air, then the body of Christ, like the air, would like to come to a place. But be it as it may, if it has passed through the door, it is not yet proved that it is everywhere, or that it is no more than in one place, since it has ever been.

So now the account "the right hand of God is everywhere" 2c. The reason for this is the deception that mankind is at the right hand of God, like the Godhead; but this is not so; but it is at the right hand of God, like a creature (Luther compares even the humanity of Christ to another holy natural man, as is heard), but it must be in One Place. Just as God, who is everywhere, is in us, and yet we are no more than in one place; and we also will be with God, who is everywhere, but we will be in only one place. For he must be like us, his brethren, in all things, Heb. 2, except the sinful, Heb. 4. But we also want to have proved herewith that the transfigured bodies are circumscriptive, that is, encompassed, circumscribed, and circumscribed in one place, ex parte locati not of the air or other circumstance half, non ex parte locantis in circumfuso aere; for we are well provided that in heaven it may not be of the air, but God it is all in all. Still the bodies will be in eternity, that they will be one, and in one place, and no more. So also the body of Christ 2c.

Now we come again onto the track, and we have insurmountably proven that the body of Christ is encompassed for eternity, and we care neither for sophists nor for Luther's refutation; for we have proven that we are encompassed with God's Word, not with philosophy, even though philosophy is also with us.

297. Now follows further in Luther's art: 4) "On the other hand, let a thing be definite in one place," [the^ he translates "incomprehensible". So Christ is in the gravestone and wooden door (it is good that he does not make it isin [iron], or else we would first not come anywhere through with him), there he makes him 5) definite, that is, 6) final and certain in one place; for that is definite, final, certain to be in one place; as when an angel, soul, or spirit is in a cloud or in a body, there the angel is certainly present; but he is final, so that therefore he is not everywhere. And the soul holds the body, and is nowhere substantial outside the body, and the body does not comprehend or embrace the soul, but the soul leads and holds the body. And since the body loses a thigh or arm, the soul loses no part of it, for it has no lying parts or limbs. It is still so endowed that it is in only one place, whether it is in the body or outside the body.

298. on this explanation, which Luther cannot deny, we ask him thus: whether Christ, since he penetrated through the gravestone and door, as they say, would have taken the declared body to himself.

or not? He says: Not; then he was circum-scriptive, corporaliter, localiter, that is, encompassed with bodily manner, of body and air half, in one place, and not like a spirit, soul or angel. And Luther is wrong in saying that he was definite, that is, final, like a soul. He says: Yes; he has already taken the declared body to himself. Why then does he say afterwards: 1) he is repletive or impletive, that is, supernatural, as he tollretschet, 2) all over? Did Christ also have two declared bodies, one that was only in one place, like a soul or angel, the other that was everywhere, like the Godhead? Behold, Luther's doctrine is as good as if one put an oxen's handle into a dog's pen. Should the unclean woman Chätinen [Käthen], the Sophisterei, be led into the holy scripture, and should she therefore not really be needed? Is that honest? But for the sake of it:

Know, your dear, pious princes, that no declared corpse, much less the corpse of Christ, can be definite, that is, terminal (understand, like the spirits), in one place! Cause: to be final in one place is only of the louder spirits, which are creatures, and lead and govern something body. What does now the transfigured corpse of Christ lead? Yes, he is led by the Godhead through the means of the soul: So it is not so final, definite, in one place, as the spirits, as Luther speaks of it; so it is not supernatural all over, as is heard, or else we should also be all over; for as the declared bodies are in one place, we do not call supernatural; for we have not otherwise from Scripture, than that the declared bodies shall all have one kind, though one clearer than another; even as men have all a common form, but one is more beautiful than another: but Christ hath ascended to heaven with his declared body, and sitteth at the right hand of God according to the nature and kind of all declared bodies. For if this were not the case, we would be deprived of the hope of the first rites, the transfiguration and the ascension. Now if his body were everywhere, as Luther says, and we well know that our bodies will not be everywhere, for Christ says, "In my Father's house are many mansions" (many mansions receive the infinite), then our security would ever be weakened, for we could never think that we would be declared to heaven, like Christ, when

He would not come to heaven in any other way, nor would we. But if he be the firstfruits of all them that die in faith, 1 Cor. 15 Cap. it is certain that he is now as we shall be, and we shall be as he now is.

After all this, we return to the words of the postilion in which he said that some do wrong who want to make an omnipotent man out of the humanity of Christ. And give him his words to consider carefully, which he sets forth in the Confession:

Luther. 3) "But now he is such a man, who is supernaturally with God One Person, and apart from this man is no God" 2c., which follows, serves for the impletive or repletive esse in loco.

Here I ask Luther what he wants with the other part of the words (for we are one with the first), since he speaks: "and 4) apart from this man there is no God"? So I ask him: whether God was also before Christ became man? I mean, yes: God was God without human nature at that time. But if he wants to say: he is talking about the form when he took man to himself, then I ask him what he wants with the word "except"? If he wants to say: that the Godhead does not extend further, neither mankind (therefore words must ever be used in things), then it follows that Christ had to know, to order, [to] like all things 2c., but against this are his words, which we have heard. For if God is everywhere, and according to Luther mankind is also everywhere, then it follows that he sees, may, order all things 2c. It also follows that he suffered no more than on the cross, and had joy elsewhere 2c.

If by the word "apart" Luther means that God is nowhere, since he is not man, then we are one; for God is in no place, since he is not man. If, however, by "apart from" he means that God is nowhere, humanity is also there, he is mistaken, as has been sufficiently shown. It cannot be reversed in the dialectica either: God is man where he is; so mankind is where he is. It is not proper: Louis is king where he is: so is the kingdom or queen where he is; for if he lies captive, the kingdom is not where he is.

I alone indicate that the wretched fools who carry Luther's book so high see that they are much more foolish, neither he is evil. For he speaks that everyone may grasp that he only seeks colors to talk himself out of. For who has ever so-speaks: "Apart from this man there is no God"? He wants to go away with his hand in the air, God give! was 1) he would come; the gaechs do not want to see that. And so this speech: "outside this man is no God", is not only childish, but falsely blasphemous.

But if our answer would turn out to be too much, if we should answer all errors according to necessity, then after such a clear explanation we will let everyone open his own eyes in this matter. And we do not want to add anything more here than some more repugnant words of Luther, and thus conclude the matter.

Luther: 2) "And it should remain for me a bad Christ, who would be no more, than in a single place, at the same time a divine and human person" 2c. Behold, pious princes, what strange birth of new senses and words! First of all, who says that Christ is a person only in one place? Do we not say that God is a person everywhere? And where God is, there He is 3) man? Only this we exclude, that the 3) man is not bodily everywhere, where God is; because he was not bodily in heaven, when he died on the cross, and this does not break nor weaken the person.

Take an example from the rapture of Paul. This was the person of Paul, when the mind was immediately raptured in the third heaven. The other example of us: We will be with God, who will fill us [with] all joy and gladness, delight us, and satisfy us; and he will be everywhere, and we not; but we will see him who is everywhere, and how he is. 1 John 3: "Beloved brethren, we are already the sons of GOD: but that which we shall become is not yet opened: but this we know, when the same shall be opened, that we shall be like him, and shall see him as he is." The third example: that we see the sun shining over the whole world, and yet the sun is not of one country or man, but of all, and does them all good. The fourth: that each one of us sees the whole sun, which is greater than the whole earth; and though none of us be with the sun in all places, yet each one sees it enough.

307. so if he is with us, let us go up to the humanity of Christ and see how he is God, pervades all things, and the man who is supreme at the right hand of God sees all things through the divinity that is personal to him.

is united, himself, God and man, and man in the Godhead, so that nothing at all is hidden from him according to the declaration; for according to it he said, "All authority is given to me in heaven and earth," all through the Godhead. Before he did not know some things; but as he [as] man sees all things, so therefore he is not all things according to mankind, as is heard; and this separates the person [as little] as it separates the man, that with knowledge he sees the whole world', and yet his body is no more than in One Little Oert of the world 2c.

308 Secondly, first of all, who has ever said that Christ is both a divine person and a human person? Christ is at the same time a divine person and a human person? 4) He who says this makes two persons. We say, then, that two essentially distinct natures are One Person; and "essentially" here is distinguished from 5) "existing" and "preserved. For just as the human body is essentially a part of the human being, but does not maintain and exist on itself, but in the power of the soul: so human nature is essentially a part (so Luther also speaks, and there is no power in words, if we can only grasp the understanding rightly) of the person of Christ; but not that it has its own continuance, ὁμόστασις, but its continuance and resounding is the divine person; therefore the divine and human natures are only One Person, as has been sufficiently heard. Now what does Luther want of the quackery? Yes, I also want to think that he has seen how much he wants in Scripture, so he is not yet sufficiently reported to speak of the person of Christ. But if he is reported, and brings such hurtful speeches, then he is a 2c.

Luther (Is in the [arc] h on the 5th panel): 6) "For if the alloeosis existed (then see, pious princes, how he raises [to] fear their strength!), that one nature would be taken for the other; such would nevertheless concern only the works or transactions of the natures, and not the essence of the natures."

Behold, pious princes! what does he bring us here! Luther does not yet see that where the theologians say "two natures," they do not mean that each nature is not its own essential thing; rather, they only shun the word "essence," and put nature for it, so that one does not fall into it, as if human nature had its own existence and its own preservation; and then there would have to be two persons.

1) d. i. whereupon. Cf. § 82 of this paper.

2) Marginal gloss: Is in [arc] i [at the] 2nd panel. [No. 21, § 144.]

3) Marginal gloss: He and The.

4) Luther did not speak like this. Compare No. 21, § 144.

5) Marginal gloss: Lsse, adLn-osi-Hvat

6) No. 21, § 133.

But actually to speak, if you understand "essence" as we have purified, for "true nature and quality," for a thing that can be received and is its own, but does not have its own continuance; so mankind is essential in Christ, and suffers essentially, that is, rightly as a man who is man alone. And suffers, as the corpse of the pure man suffers essentially, which nevertheless has continuance and preservation in the soul, that the soul therefore does not suffer. Now I do not want to teach that therefore someone should say "two natures" for "two natures", because the word xxx<rra "r-5, being, as also Jerome recognizes, is dangerous; for not everyone knows what difference there is between "being", if it is able as much as "being"; and if it is able as much as having its own being and existence. Example. To be wise is also a "being"; yet it has no existence of its own, neither in the mind of man 2c., and therefore I leave it enough with two natures.

312 But if one nature is taken for the other, this concerns only the works and transactions of the natures, not the essence, as Luther says. This is nothing but an obscuring. For if he means to say that the nature taken for the other is not the essence of the other at all, that is, it is not the other nature at all, then he is speaking Christianly and rightly, and we are once again one, for we should not mix the natures. But why then does he make two things of essence and nature? But if he does not mean the work and business of natures, but that each has its own work and business, but if he means to say that each work is essential to the other, he means to deceive us either by the word "essence"; for if it be taken for "subsist" and "maintain," it is true and certain that everything which the humanity of Christ suffers, suffers therefore, that it has its continuance in the Godhead. And therefore Scotus, I mean super tertium, is forced to recognize that everything, so Christ suffered, is wonderful, as if 1) it also is. Ps. 117. [118, 23.] But it is nevertheless a nature of its own, like the body of the pure man. But if he does not seek escape under the word "nature," but thus says: If one nature is taken for another, then that which is said of the hidden nature is not actually said of it, he is mistaken; for there is John 3: "The Son of man which is in heaven"; if the "name" is taken for the "divine nature," and the divine nature was truly and essentially in heaven.

However, such obscurations are nothing else, neither blindings of the bad, and spy out how one might escape. And therefore we want to set the words here and those before [in the arc] k on the 4th panel 2) against each other. Luther: "Because all works or sufferings are not assigned to natures, but to persons." Luther [in the arc] L on the 5th panel: 3) "If it existed that one nature was taken for the other; such would nevertheless concern only the works or transactions of the natures" 2c.

- 1) "Whether" seems to be too much.

Behold, pious princes! whether the two speeches do not look together like the devil and the seven-pointed star, like a proverb? But it shall happen to one: he who does not remain on the chariot must walk in the mud afterwards.

Accordingly, we will continue to hear him from word to word in those places where he was not ashamed of the truth. Luther, in the foregoing place of the postilion: 4) "He was full of grace and wisdom, so that everything that occurred to him he was able to judge and teach; therefore, the Godhead, who alone sees and knows all things, was personal and present in him. And finally, what has been said of Christ's abasement and exaltation is to be added to man; for divine nature can neither be abased nor exalted."

Behold here, pious princes! [First, how Luther admits to the Godhead alone, since it sees and knows all things. Second, that he admits to humanity that it "can" judge and teach all things from the Godhead for the sake of personal union; but he has withdrawn from it the foreknowledge beforehand, and not unjustly. Thus it follows that the humanity of Christ did not know all things before the Declaration, although it took all judgment, doctrine, and truth from the Godhead. From this we can see that the Godhead thereby reserved for it the foreknowledge in several things and made it known that Christ was true man, who therefore was not made infinite. 2c. Thirdly, Luther recognizes, just as we do, that everything that is said about the lowering and raising of Christ is to be attributed to human nature alone. For this is the reason why people quarrel here when he sometimes says: "God suffers"; as if the simple should understand: the divine nature in him suffers. Yes, he himself says it publicly, as has been heard.

317. read what follows in the often-mentioned postilion after the words: "Which He set has to an heir of all things"; 1) so he finds even clearer that we say of Luther that he holds of the two natures that are One Christ wholly as we do.

318 If we, pious princes, have saved our doctrine of the allosis or counterchange against Luther from God's Word, and if there is much disputation and sparring, in which something dark might easily be spoken, which we nevertheless do not mean to be dark or erroneous, then I will explain myself in a summa [i.e., exponam], as I hold it of both natures in Christ; thus:

I know that the eternal, almighty 2c. Son of God true, whole, prestigious, without the sinfulness, deadly humanity, which is a created sea! from heaven, and a natural body, created by the pure handmaid Mary, and born of the conception of the Holy Spirit, thus joined to Himself and to Himself in the unity of the Person of the Son of God, that they are One Christ, One inseparable Person, and yet each nature of the unified Person retains its nature and characteristic; only that His humanity does not have its own existensexistentiamrwiam, that is, existence for itself, but in the Person of the Son of God; just as in us humans the flesh has its own nature and existence, but does not exist for itself, but is maintained in existence by the soul. I also recognize 2) that the two natures in Christ can never be separated from each other, that they are not one person. And although the humanity is taken up into the unity of the person through the means of the soul, as through the suitable part (for God is also a spirit), and therefore the soul is separated from the corpse in death, so that his holy corpse lay there, like another body that had been disembodied, or (as we speak) made lifeless, truly dead, truly lonely, truly powerless: still so is the person as little separated in the separation of the body and the soul, when soul and body were with each other. Cause, the soul of Christ is not the sustainer xxxxxxxxxx, of the continuance, of the human Nature, but the Godhead is the sustainer of the existence and permanence of the body and the soul, both parts of the whole mankind. And therefore the person of the natural man is in that place an inadequate example of the person of Christ. For when the soul of the natural man is separated from the body, then the man is no longer a person. Cause, that the soul, which is an inheritance is the sustainer of the human person, is no longer with the body; and is therefore no other nature that keeps it in unity with the person. But in Christ the Godhead is the "sustaining nature", which also surpasses his soul, as holy as it is, with power and holiness, as far as God and the Creator surpass all creatures; therefore in it not only the soul, and through the soul the body, but body and soul are sustained. Since his body and soul were separated from each other, the person was not separated, since the parts of the one nature were separated; because the whole mankind consisted in the Godhead with body and soul. I see also from these reasons that the humanity of Christ must eternally be the assumed nature, before and after the original state; for otherwise there would have to be two assumptions of human nature; one, that humanity would have been embraced before death and would have been assumed sufferingly; the other, after the original state, that would have made humanity infinite; but there is only One humanity, and only one is [once] assumed, which also exists in the Godhead, and not in it itself. Therefore the Godhead, which is infinite in all ends, is to her, mankind, all sufficiency, all light, all knowledge, that mankind may be to no work nor deed everywhere; but, as the elect in their place, where God delights them, have all sufficiency and delight in God, who is equally everywhere, and they are only in One place: so also the mankind of Christ is with them, and is satiated so much higher in all power, knowledge, being, joy and delight, as much more there is. Being a person with GOD, neither being only a creature of GOD. I also recognize that it is impossible for human nature to be all-essential; it is impossible for there to be more than One God. For God's intrinsic quality is that He alone is omnipresent; and if the creature were omnipresent, then God Himself would be; and then there would be many Gods. Again, I perceive that, although the humanity is not omnipresent, as the Godhead, yet the person is not divided, yea, less divided, neither if it were omnipresent: for if it were omnipresent, it would now be perverted into the Godhead, and would no longer be Christ; for Christ is eternal God and man, that is, the person of whom we speak. Where now the received nature would be reversed into the receiving nature, the person would be gone; for the person Christ must have two natures, one "receiving" and one "received". Now if Christ were to be humanity everywhere, this would have to come solely from the fact that it would be inverted into the Godhead.

1) Walch, St. Louis Edition, vol. XII, 156.

2) recognize - confess. Cf. § 368 of this writing, where Erkenntniß - Bekenntniß stands.

it would no longer be the "preserved" nature; and therefore the person of the Son of God alone would be the divine nature, and not the human one, and Christ would not be a true man for us in eternity. I also recognize that, for the sake of personal inseparable unity, the natures are taken for each other and exchanged, and nevertheless remains to each nature its characteristic, and only One Person. God remove all error from all living hearts! Amen.

This is, pious princes, the sum of my explanation, which has been sufficiently proven with writings before, also so irrefutable that no theologians may bring anything against it. For even among the ancients the difference between the two natures was so well investigated and founded in Tertulliano, Hilario, Ambrosio, Augustino, that in many hundreds of years it has not come onto the track. track has come. So far at this time, Luther makes humanity a deity, and needs for this the absurda, that is, the clumsy arguments of the Arrian heretics; as is invented in Tertulliano ad Praxeam, and in Ambrosio, de sacramento dominicae incarnationis. Has indicated to me Heymrich [Hcinrich] Bullinger: but the Anabaptists say he is a prophet, and not the natural Son of God. But be unconcerned, pious princes! they must all break and lie down. I have no doubt that Luther will seek something so that he will not give up the war so easily; but it will not help.

From the place: the meat is not useful at all.

Now when Luther wants to take this in hand: "the flesh is not useful", he rumbles before, and says: 1) Luther: "Therefore be an analem", and curses, where it is said that Christ is born of flesh" 2c. As if one of us said that the humanity of Christ was born of sinful flesh, and did not realize that it was conceived by the Holy Spirit in the pure body of the virgin Mary, and there became flesh or man. And thus rumbles between the two names of the flesh, since "flesh" means the sinful conception and kind, and is also called the immaculate beautiful human nature and image of God, as Adam was a man before the fall, and as Christ is man, who brings back the fall.

322. for this he does with many words, like

1) Marginal gloss: Is [in the arc] I on the 7th panel. [No. 21, § 192.)

as if "the flesh of Christ", whose seed is the spirit, did not take its bodily origin and growth from the pure field of the virgin body, but was only a spirit (as he 2) speaks); all this, however, is enough to diminish the divine goodness. For the more truly God is recognized as having taken on human nature for our sake, the more surely we see that we are dear to Him as our Aeti [i.e. Father].

But we recognize that it is a Marcionian heresy, as Luther says: that the flesh of Christ is a spirit; for how can it be a spirit, which with such pains is united to the cross, 3) that it cries out: "O my God! how hast thou forsaken me"? But the fact that Christ's whole action leads us and brings us to spiritual life does not mean that he is a spiritual substance according to the nature of mankind, but a bodily man. Summa! These are all arrows of the mocking Arian heretics, as indicated before.

But you, simple, pious Christian, will be able to beware of the wagging dog, which beats with its tail now on one side and soon on the other. You know well what we think of the true humanity of Christ; you also know well what we think of our desert flesh, that we do not suspect the holiness of Christ's humanity anywhere.

(325) Yes, says Luther, even the Holy Spirit is pure poison where it is received without faith. 4) As if the Holy Spirit were a thing enjoyed or received by unbelievers. Lift up the magic of thick words, through which the simple may not see.

326 And therefore, putting all circumstances aside, we will now depart safe and sound, and give you, pious princes, to hear thus. We have honestly scolded Luther for omitting a few words of "that" from the words: "The flesh is of no use at all. But he is responsible for this in such a way that we would now like to scold him even more. For as the Greek language has articles and pointers, like the German, the Latin does not; so Luther needs speed: he interprets 5) the Greek words: x "üx xxxxxx xxxxx, first into the Latin: Caro non prodest quicquam, so that he can interpret from the Latin words:

2) Marginal gloss: Is [in Luther, in Arc] 1 at the 7th plate. [No. 21, § 194 deceptively listed].

3) i.e. extended.

4) Compare No. 21, §197 to this statement by Zwingli.

5) Marginal gloss: Is [with Luther in the bow] m [at the] first panel. [No. 21, § 199.]

"Flesh is not useful": so he should also translate from the Latin: "the flesh is not useful." 1) For to the word "spirit" he thus says, "The spirit"; and not, "Spirit is he who makes alive." Thus he should also, virtute antitheseos, by force of contrast, have made from the Latin oa.ro "the flesh", and not "flesh".

327) Notice further, pious princes, that Luther does not yet recognize the articles, which I have misinterpreted, that they show all the way. 2) For although they do not always show demonstratively, that is, grossly presently (as, if I say, with a long "The 3) woman has denied the rebirth; and point with the finger at her), they do always show the actual thing that is spoken of before; or they bring forth a thing well, of person or being; therefore I have rendered them "pointers", not "pointers". When I say that a woman should be obedient, I am not pointing to any particular woman, for this is short; but I am pointing to the nature and status of women, and the little pointer means that it belongs to every woman that she be obedient. Here the article separates the essence from the person; for one does not speak of this or that particular woman, but of the whole sex. But when I say, Marc. 6: "Is he not the carpenter?" Here, the more obvious one indicates the person, namely, the person of Christ, whom they all knew well, according to his handiwork. And the little pointer is able to do so much that we see that he was personally known to all men.

Before I go any further, I must nevertheless indicate that it seems to me that Luther may not have understood me there; for when I made a virgule 5) over the other one, accentum gravem, the printer took it for an ä, and made "där"; I also never noticed this until Luther did so desolately; then I also looked at the print, and thus find: Där Zimmermann; but it should thus say: Is he not the carpenter? 2c. But that the little pointers also point to the thing, of which spoken before and yet not be relativa, or subjectivi articuli, is thus evident that no leaf in the Greek language is ever written on which that is not publicly invented, that distorts me to indicate example therefore; but let us train ourselves with little.

329. John 1: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God". Here, the little pointer in the first place is a pointer of the person, namely, of the Son of God, whom he calls "the Word", or "thing", of which he wants to speak. In the other place, however, it not only points to the person, but also 7) äfert, as if it thus speaks: The same word; that one sees that it does not speak of another word, but means the very word, of which is also said before, and is nevertheless not relative to.

330. there: rd φως Τό ἀληϋόν, "the Light was the true light. Here the first pointer can do so much as a demonstrative, a finger pointer, and is not a finger pointer with the Greeks, but only a small pointer. But it can do as much as the light, of which I said, or, just the same light. And the other pointer is able to bring forth the essence that the light of which it says is the right true light.

331. Joh. 6. this observation, that is, with diligence noted piece, becomes quite obvious. When Christ began to say to the Jews and disciples, "What is the true bread from heaven?" he said to the last: "I am the bread of life. Here a short "that" is only a pointer; nor can it do more than this: I am the bread of life, of which I have said unto you.

332 But after this he says: "Truly I say to you: He that trusteth in me hath everlasting life. I am the bread of life." But here is a little pointer, "that", nor is it able to point and point to the bread, 7) which is spoken of.

333 Soon after, it says: "I am the living bread that comes down from heaven. Here, the first "that" can be seen as pointing to and referring to the bread of which the speech began. The other "that" is a striking out of the essence, namely, that he came from heaven.

334 So it is also with the flesh. Luther says: In the words "the flesh 8) is not useful at all" the little pointer "the" points to the evil way of the flesh. 1) And seeth not that it yieldeth to the flesh for and for, whereof it was spoken before. So Christ spoke before: "And the bread, which I will give you, is the flesh mine, which I will give for the world. Here the little pointer stands in the "the flesh mine" to indicate the being actually.

335 Soon after this the Jews said, "How can he give us the flesh 2) to eat? Behold! Here, pious princes! the little pointer "the" stands so dear and strong, and points to the flesh, of which Christ spoke (although his opinion was not that it should be eaten bodily, as the Jews assumed), that the Latin interpreter has made a being out of the Greek that, and thus interprets: How may he give us his flesh to eat? According to this, the pointers for and for stand at the "flesh", so that one can see that all speech is of One flesh; although the Jews understood otherwise, [that] it would be said of it, neither Christ carried out. And therefore he also gives an answer to accept their error, and says:.

336. "It is the Spirit that gives life; the flesh (x -a^E) is of no use at all." Here the little pointer "that" runs along all the way, and misleads Luther (just as a pious servant keeps her wife, that one may not do anything rude with her), that he does not like to deal with the words, as lust teaches him, and points hard to the flesh, to which it has pointed before for and for, and points to the flesh, and says: "The flesh", of which you only want to understand, as if it must be eaten, that is not a thing that is useful to eat. For the eating, that is, to be put off, of which I say, the one spirit must do. And that in this place the little pointer "that" should and must be put forward, we want to prove first with Christ, and then with Luther's words.

337 Christ thus saith, The Spirit is he that quickeneth. Then I ask Luther: whether here the little hands "the" and "he" may well be omitted, as with the flesh, as he says? he will have to say: that they may not be omitted; for the Latins have a Latinis in relativum translatum, ne putet nos temere loqui de vi articulorum, το πνεῦμα ἐστὶ τὸ ζωοποιούν. But why do the little hands not like be omitted? Therefore, that they actually and personally point out what is understood by the Spirit here. "The Spirit is that which quickeneth," or "the Spirit is that which quickeneth. If one were to omit the "he" and say: Spirit is that which gives life, then the word "Spirit" would stand in the common, and it would not be clear that it alone would be taken for the divine Spirit essentially and personally. But if the double "the" is there, one sees that he speaks essentially of the particular Holy Spirit, and not in the common of spirit, that is, of spiritual being, life, or discipline. For the latter does not make us alive, but if we are already alive in the Holy Spirit, we live spiritually.

338 If then the little pointer is not to be omitted from the Spirit, because it speaks of the special Holy Spirit of God, then the little pointer is also not to be omitted from the flesh, because it points to the special flesh of Christ, which is of absolutely no use to eat bodily, because it is an antithesis, a contrast.

339] As if one of Paul, 1 Cor. 3, said to the bishops, "Behold, all your buildings are nothing but pure gold! and the stingy bishops wanted to understand: they should see that all their dishes and housings were golden (as they unfortunately have done!), and say: Who would bring about so much gold? They would be answered: The clear, undeceived truth is that which is to be built by you; gold is of no use at all. Here you can see that this word "gold" means, first, that it should be built, but not according to the mind of the stingy. Secondly, gold is rejected, which is also named before, but not according to the mind of the miser, and is rejected according to its meaning, that it should be of no use at all for the building. 4) 340 Now Luther's proof follows. He speaks of the urge, 5) since we had written: as far as Christ spoke of the evil kind of the flesh, he would not have answered the disciples to their error, since they thought that he had spoken of bodily food, and therefore did not murmur against the mind of the fleshly kind; for nothing at all was spoken of it.

Spirit, and against the bodily eating of the flesh of Christ; for they understood none rightly. "2c.

342 Here I will enforce from Luther, if it must ever be enforced, that Christ speaks of his own flesh, that he is not useful to eat; thus: Luther confesses that the disciples murmured against the mind of the spirit, and against the bodily eating. Now spiritual understanding and bodily eating are not of one sex, unius generis, so that they may be understood together. And therefore I ask Luther: is neither 1) the right understanding? For the Scriptures, as he himself confesses, must have a proper sense. If he says: this is the understanding of murmuring, that they murmured against the spiritual food, then we say. How could they murmur against it, if they had not yet understood it? For he has never named the word "spirit," therefore they murmured only out of lack of understanding. Secondly, they grumbled against the spiritual mind; why then does Luther add that they also grumbled against the bodily food? Because the Scripture must have only one meaning. If they murmured against the spiritual mind and against the bodily food, it would be publicly against each other; for if they murmured against the spiritual mind, they would never eat the bodily food.

343 But putting all the requests aside, Luther recognizes that they have grumbled against the physical food; so this is the most prominent cause of their grumbling. For Luther would not have put it where he could have escaped it by some way; but he did not like to do so, for the words were on his neck, which are thus, "But the Jews murmured on his account," περὶ αὐτοῦ, "that he had said: I am the bread which came down from heaven; and said: Is he not the Jesus, the son of Joseph, whose father and mother we know? how then does he say: I am come down from heaven?" These words are so bright that no better would be set for us, that the Jews grumbled, "How can he who eats his flesh have eternal life, if he were a natural man, well known to them by his parents? Behold, they speak not against the manner of the spirit, nor against the manner of the flesh, but against the bodily eating, which they supposed to be false.

344 If Luther recognizes that they also murmured against the fleshly food, then it is undoubtedly the right thing to do; for he would not have denied it where he might have done so. 2)

1) i.e. which of the two.

2) i.e. to resist it.

If, then, the Scripture must have a proper natural meaning, it follows that it is the one that Luther also recognizes; namely, that the Jews grumbled against the bodily food (although not rightly understood) and not against the common doctrine of the spirit and flesh, which is not dealt with here. est enim favorable dicere: plurimum prodesse, si spiritu vivas; esse contra exitiale, si secundum carnem, juxta verbum apostoli, Galat...

345 Since it has been established that the Jews did not grumble on account of spiritual or carnal understanding, but on account of the fact that they mistakenly thought that Christ wanted to give them his body bodily to eat, it is also evident that Christ's responsibility extends to removing their mistaken opinion, so that they see that he did not speak of a bodily meal at all when he said, "The flesh is of no use at all," that is, to eat, because he wants to exclude the bodily meal from them. And if this is of no use at all, they see that he did not tell them about the bodily eating of his flesh. Therefore the disciples also said, "Thou hast the words of eternal life; and we know it, and believe that thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." Behold, pious princes, the faith, and the falling away of the erroneous opinion! and [they] do not remember with a word, that they said, but the unclean flesh hath the poison of death, or the like.

346 Summa, we have previously indicated this place with many strong causes, which prove [that it] must be understood according to the sense which is now indicated, not to be elicited again here. In addition, no Christian has ever been of whom I have heard or read that he understood the words "the flesh is not useful at all": the carnal evil kind is not useful. For it is 4) too easy to all disorder and contradiction that Christ should say: It is not useful; but he had spoken much stronger, as Paul Rom. 8: "The prudence or wisdom and manner of the flesh is death"; so also Luther has in all his previous books our, that is, the right sense known; therefore we are in all ways stronger neither he.

corpse" poor miserable words. I may well have scolded the poor miserable people, who dare to keep the dead letter so idiosyncratically, which they do not understand; but that I have thus scolded the words, that is an open denseness. But half of the pointers read Luther O^{ri}Uum, lib. 1, cap. 4. But there is little in this; we have presented open examples of Scripture for this reason. And herewith let fall the denunciatory gloss, foreign to Christian teachers, which he says about the words: My words are spirit and life, and says, it is so much: I must have spiritual disciples. That is where we come to, that we say what we want, it rhymes or glues itself, when we become so great that one believes us what we say. I also let him put the rule in sackcloth with others, since he explains to himself: Where flesh and spirit stand in opposition to one another in Scripture, "flesh is not taken for the flesh of Christ; for where does he prove it? or where does he find in Scripture a place that is like it, so that he has learned from many places to cast this rule? It is the children's game, if they want to lose the nut, they say: It does not apply so. Show me Luther a place of the Scriptures or a teacher, from which this rule is measured or taken! it is all aörör id est, Burkhart has called it.

348. the value is that he writes in the [arc] n on the seventh panel thus: 1)

Luther: "But Christ does not speak here of His own Spirit, which He has personally; but, as the text reads, of the Spirit that quickeneth, that is, of the common Spirit, which is in all believers; though Christ giveth the same, and Christ is Spirit" 2c.

Behold, pious princes, how beautifully this is spoken! Yes, if the words were the words of a dissolute prankster, who thus wanted to sweet-talk with old women. Tell us, Luther, who is the Spirit that Christ has personally, and that the same is his own Spirit? and who is the other Spirit that he does not have personally, that is not his own Spirit? and thirdly, who is the Spirit that gives life, that Christ gives, and is not his personal Spirit?

In short, they are famous 2) caps. The Holy Spirit is who goes from the Father and the Son, and sends him the Father and the Son. He is the third divine person, and is the Spirit of the Father and the Son, indeed, the bond of them both. He is the Spirit who is in all believers; and

The son is not personally called the spirit, nor is a personal spirit, which, differently, is his, admitted to him. But it is the death sting of one who wrestles with Luther. He sees in the little pointer: "The Spirit is that which gives life" that Christ says of the personal Spirit, who is God; and presses him on, [that] the flesh also must be taken personally; and therefore he convicts it with a cake lump, that one does not know it rightly.

351. Since he tells us to show the analogy of the bread to the body of Christ, if it means him, I do not say anything else, neither that he reads the sixth chapter of John; and if he has read over that, he does not find the analogy, that as the bread strengthens the body, so the only strength, comfort and food of the soul is Christ, so let us fill an egg in water for him, if he wants to eat something; read also Lactantium Firmianum lib. 4. de vera sapientia cap. 18; Augustinum in Ioannem, tractatu 26. et tractatu 13.; and afterwards Oecolampadium.

But the similarity of the chalice, he means, 4) we may not indicate. So let us see! In Jeremiah's 26th vision, God gives the prophet a cup or goblet to give to all the nations to drink with; and Jeremiah takes it and waters all the nations with it. And the watering is nothing else, neither the punishment nor the sorrow that would come upon them, 5) as it is shown afterward to every nation in particular. Each cup is taken for suffering.

353. ezek. 23, 31. "You will," O Haoliba [Ahaliba], that is, Jerusalem, "drink the cup of your sister." But there[times] cup is taken for suffering. For he means to say that the kingdom of Judah must suffer what the kingdom of Samaria also suffered, being destroyed and carried away captive 2c.

354. Isaiah 51: "Arise, arise, Jerusalem! you who have drunk the cup from the hand of the Lord" 2c. But [times] cup is taken for suffering and punishment; for he wants to say that Jerusalem is punished by God 2c. In the prophets are innumerable messages. But [times] in the New Testament.

Who will come to such honors of the right that you desire, since I alone will come? Soon after: "You will drink my cup", that is, be killed and suffer 2c. Here he calls their suffering his "cup"; for that which is of the members he makes his.

356. John 18: "Wouldest thou that I should not drink the cup which the Father hath given me?" saith Christ to Petro. Did you want me not to suffer death according to the will of my Father?

357 And Luke 22: "Father, if it is possible, take this cup from me; not my will, but yours be done. This is the most open place, since cup is taken for death and suffering. So the cup in the supper is a symbol, sign, form and figure of the suffering and death of Christ, which he himself called the cup. And I am surprised that Luther looks at it with such a poor request.

The fact that he uses "to break" in the words "which is broken for you" and "to give" in the words "which is given for you" on bread, which is broken and presented, and not on the body of Christ, and says: even though he does not say so, yet let someone keep to the interpretation, is just like other things, in which he introduces a fictitious sense in addition to the natural sense. But I wonder very much what kind of Christian people these are, who see and read such an inverted book, which has so many confused teachings, that they do not see from themselves to what dishonor and diminishment of the suffering of Christ it reaches? As if all the prophets were not full, since "to perish" is taken to mean to suffer and to perish? Isaiah 24, 19: Confractioe confringetur 1) terra etc., "the earth, which is utterly destroyed", that is, glorified 2) and punished. Ezech, 5, 11.: "So will I also commit crime 3) and will not communicate mercy." And not only the xxx is there, but all the words that are called to them are called to be broken. So here "broken" is taken for killed and perished. If Luther does not know this, it is too impudent that he speaks so strongly of an unconscious thing.

359. "Surrender." Rom. 4: "Christ was given for our sins and rose again. John 3: "God so loved the world that He gave His own Son that we might live." Why then is the word "to be given" so strange to Luther that he uses it for the presentation of the bread? Why does he not show a

What is the reason for the predecessor, if he brings anything that serves to diminish the honor of Christ's great suffering?

360. 4) Scholars also see how rightly this is understood 1 Cor. 15: "Why are they baptized for the dead?" since he makes "for" into "before," and wants to have proved thereby that the body of Christ was broken before the disciples, makes "for" into 5) "before": but the Greek language has not a little word which is called for and before, as the Saxons need for before; but ὑπέρ/ for or κατέναντι, or ἔμπροσθεν etc., before; since ver Luther hides behind the stove in the corner of the jack's box.

Luther 6) condemns 7) some who say that faith must have a spiritual aspect; but he takes one of his pieces 8) and says: How then would we believe that the world was created by God? without doubt, that the world is a bodily thing. As if Luther did not understand what they (I think it was the pious Silesians) understood by "believe"; namely: trust, that is, that the treasure and sight of human trust must be "spirit". And is the faith that I believe heaven and earth to be created by God, not the faith that is the "firm trust" in the highest good, but only a "lesson" from faith, because those who called the Historiam, have also spoken something. But Paul Heb. 11: "By faith we know that the world was created by the command of GOD." There we see that this knowledge is a fruit of faith; and not faith, since we trust in GOD: therefore Luther's struggle is kürbsin. 9)

362. But I would like to ask him: whether his finite [ultima] and thorough confidence stands in another thing, neither spirit? So we are confident in Him who says, "God is a Spirit," John 4; and if we recognize Him, we see that all things are not only created by Him, but are also sustained and nourished. Yes, faith cannot suffer that it does not settle on a mere creature; therefore also the theologians have halfway spoken of Christ as distinguishing human nature from divine nature.

it should not be worshipped. To be worshipped is only of the good in which the soul unquestioningly entrusts itself. Thus one relies on Christ, God and man; therefore we recognize by faith, not only that we have trusted in Jesus Christ, who was conceived by the Holy Spirit, born 2c., but we say beforehand that he is the only begotten Son of God, and is our Lord and God. For this reason he also proves his divinity everywhere through the gospel of John, so that people may see that they can trust in him without doubt.

363. I also do not want to rumble very much that he speaks: 1)

Luther: "Here it is said of the one Godhead that it is threefold, as three persons" 2c. In which his words, as in all of them, throughout the whole book, are erroneous; for the Godhead is not threefold at all, but only one; and the holy three Persons may never suffer themselves to be threefold; but they are called trias or trinitas, Dreiling or Trinity. But no orthodox, that is, jurist, has ever called them threefold; for they are thus one being, that they are three pure ones, neither mind, memory, and will being one soul.

I completely understand that Luther has entered so many oddities in this note that one may be forgiven for all uncleanliness. For to what purpose do the unchristian sayings serve, that the Godhead is threefold? shall not the simple learn that there are three natures of the holy three persons? and if there are three natures, then there are also three Gods. How can he let such words go out of his mouth? Are the scholars in Saxony blind? or are they such sleepy dogs that they do not bark at the foreign words? or, if Luther speaks unchristian, may they not speak against it? In this book I feel as if I were looking at a sow in the flower garden; so unclean, untheological, so inauthentic is his talk about God and all holy things.

And you theologians (I will name you all across Germany) keep silent, just for the sake of quarreling? Can you not think that even if Luther were right, it would still be better 2) to hang millstones on our necks and sink us, neither that we let such aggravation proceed unchallenged? Yes, I know those who say: Oecolampadius and Zwingli will not leave it unanswered. Is therefore the trade not yours? or are they the ones in whom you have believed? Have not also the apostles all for themselves, yet One Opinion and from One Spirit, preached?

366 I must also indicate here that Luthern's quarreling brings him to the point that soon afterward he himself recognizes everything that he has fought about before of the two natures, and here of the three persons half; and thereby indicates that he is dealing with quackery. But interrogate him yourself!

Luther in the [Arc] u at the 2nd panel: 3) "Who makes here, 4) that two different natures become one being, and one is spoken the other? Without doubt not the essential unity of natures (for there are two different natures and beings), but the personal unity; for although it is not one being according to the natures, it is nevertheless one being according to the person. And so from this arises two kinds of unity and two kinds of being (as, a natural unity and personal unity), and so on. From the personal unity arises such speech that God is man, and man is God; just as from the natural unity in the Godhead arises this speech that God is the Father, God is the Son, God is the Holy Spirit; and again, the Father is God, the Son is God" 2c.

Behold, pious princes! these words have slipped my mind above, although I had distinguished them. But Luther never made such an acknowledgment 5) above, but put it here behind that, as it would go, he could still saw: I have spoken thus; and this has also been the cause of our forgetting.

Here Luther gives reason why the sayings: God is man, and man is God, are true; and says no other, neither of which we have shown anywhere; therefore that two natures are one person. But above he did not decide between the two natures; 6) but mixed them up so that he said: The divine has suffered, and the human has gone out into all infinity, where the infinite Godhead is; yes, all speech was carried out so, as if he wanted to make mankind omnipotent and the Godhead. He also recognizes that there are two distinct natures and two distinct beings of natures.

I have thanks, Luther! Wohl knows that Luther does not want to understand this word "essence" for "to exist" or "to be a person of one's own" and stasis 7); but for a real, essential, and essential nature.

For he saith, Though they be not of the same nature, yet they are of the same nature according to the person. There we have two 1) natures: The first is called the quality of the essential natures; the other is called the hypostasis, the self-existent person; thus the two distinct natures are One Person. But when he says, "Two kinds of unity arise here," he understands the one, since the holy three persons are One God, and calls it natural unity; what then may he do with the word "three kinds" above? The other unity he understands the unification of the two essential natures in One Person of Christ. He calls the two different natures two beings; as his examples themselves indicate.

Behold, pious princes! if not Luther's verse in this place at a letter with us helle [consonet, agree], in the long explanation of the Allöosen or Gegenwechsels matter droben gethan.

If only the human nature of a human being, or quality (I take care to put quality, especially, actually, or "nature" for "essence," so that I may not be suspected of making two persons); then the human nature must not be spread out according to the divinity; it must not be everywhere, but be in one place; as this befits the essence or quality of human nature. And Luther is at one with us; and only the seductive, arrogant guests who want to be of an opinion from Luther's book, of which Luther is not at all, last me. However, the fact that Luther waffles now and then should be brought out and corrected, for the divine spirit does not teach that one should give way to the truth with quarrels and bickering, but with discipline and fear.

Accordingly, Luther comes even closer to us when he admits that 2) "the bread is the body of Christ, just as the fiery flame or cloud is the angel, or the dove is the Holy Spirit. And in sum, 3) "so between the bread of the supper and the body of Christ there is a sacramental being". Now the cloud or flame is not the angel; nor the dove the Holy Spirit; so it follows that even according to Luther's position or opinion the bread is not the body of Christ.

376 And therefore we leave the same to the Scoto, Brulifer and Capreolo. And let us say recently of the sacramental unification; for that is also touched upon above. Sacrament 5) is made by the Latins several times from mysterio, 6) a Greek word, which means something secret, something external form, figure, or being, but which means a great secret, divine, or serious dina. And so in the New Testament we find sacramentum for the secrecy of the divine council, since he has before him to redeem man with his Son. But when we need it here, for a sign, form or

Figure by which we form and signify a great thing, we do not find the name Sacrament in the New Testament; for that Eph. 5. stands is called per allegoriam sacramentum. And sacrament, thus taken, is described in two ways. Sacrament is a sign of a sacred thing; or: Sacrament is a visible form or image of an invisible grace. The first description is the most general, although the other does not mean anything different from the first, namely, that it is a visible sign or form of divine grace, which is not visible. Thus is the divine grace that gave us Christ. The grace is invisible to us; but to the grace we practice a visible symbol or sign, the supper, to praise and extol the grace (proved to us). And is but as much, as a sign of a holy thing.

If the bread and the body of Christ are only sacramentally one, they are no longer one, because each sign is one with the signified. But the image of the honest Coclitis, who is called Cocles himself, is not; therefore the image for the sake of his honest deed is put on the market for him; so the image after his death is called after him, since he has never been in many hundred years. So now the signs of the emperor and the French in Neapolis are the emperor and the king; for when one sees the emperor's and the king's eagle and gilts 1) one says: This is the emperor, this is the king; but they are only their witnesses with their signs. Thus the royal scepter is the king; thus the keys are the power. For if one gives the scepter or the key to someone, he signs that he is the king, or the magistrate and the authority. And the scepter and the keys are neither king nor authority. So the morning redness is a redness, that it means a future redness; and the evening redness is a beauty. So the paschal is the passover, and can be nothing but a sign of the passover. And the bread is the body of Christ, that it may be a sign to us that Christ suffered death for us 2c.

378 In sum, to be sacramental is nothing else at all, neither to bear an image of a sacred thing, since the sign is not the sacred thing; but because it signifies the sacred, it takes the name of that which it signifies. It does not follow, however, that the body of Christ is where the sacrament of his body is; for baptism is also a sacrament of the sacred.

Death of Christ. 2) Therefore, if Christ had to die wherever one baptizes, it would not now be a sign of a thing that has happened, but a sign of a thing that is happening in the midst. But the bread and wine in the supper are signs of the dead body and blood of Christ, therefore the body and blood are not there; for if they were, they must be killed and sacrificed, or else they would be there for nothing; unless our adversary relents, that they are only there in remembrance, and in the hearts of the faithful; then we are one.

379 Probation. If the sign and the signified are together, as our opponent says, then the suffering must also be present; for the sign, the sacrament, is a sign of Christ's death, as they also recognize. But if they confess that the sign is indeed there, and the sign is also essentially there, but that the sign is presently suffering, that is not so. So I ask them: Why is this supper instituted? Must they ever admit to me: to commemorate the death of Christ. For thus speak Christ and Paul; and not: of the body of Christ, especially [separately] without the suffering. Now if the suffering is the chief thing, wherefore this remembrance is signified, and the thing signified should be there at the sign: then Christ should ever suffer there, and be offered; or else that which is chiefly signified, that is not there. This account, founded in God's Word, we have to indicate, so that the simple may be well paid to the sacramental unity or presence; for it seems to me [mihi videtur] that they are blinded by the word "sacramental", so that they do not know what sacramental presence is.

380 But from these explanations it will now be seen that it is nothing else at all, neither a divinely chaste gathering of the people or Church of God to the body of Christ, that is, to the thanksgiving of the death of Christ, which is therefore called his body, that one remembers and gives thanks for his death and torture in it; in which thanksgiving one carries around the signs of his body and blood, as an external sign of his and our love.

381 Now we see that the body of Christ is sacramentally there. Just as the emperor or king is in Neapolis, because his signs are in it, and the one is in Hispania, the other in Gaul: so Christ is here in the hearts of the faithful with great joy and gratitude that he has taken on true human nature.

2) Marginal gloss: Rom. 6. [V. 3. 4.)

1) "Glichen" is unknown to us; but one recognizes that it must mean a sign or standard.

He became our brother and with his death redeemed us and made us his co-heirs. But essentially his body sits at the right hand of God. And the bread and the wine, which are partaken of together in this memorial, are called the body and blood of Christ, according to the noble thing that is done here, which is the thanksgiving of the death that he suffered in the body. Neither are wine and bread any more one thing with the body and blood of Christ, for the signs of kings are kings because they show the authority of kings.

382. nor has there ever been a sacrament that made present what it signifies, but 1) it has indicated and testified that what it signifies is present. So circumcision did not make God's children, but those who were God's children before, according to the promise, took circumcision as a sign and testimony of the covenant in which they were. So the paschal lamb did not bring the transgression with it, for the same had only happened once, but those who gave eternal thanks for it testified to it and brought their believing, thankful hearts to the lamb; and in their hearts they carried the transgression. So baptism does not make children of God, but those who are children of God before take the sign and testimony of the children of God.

So the supper of Christ, or the bread and wine in it, does not bring the body or death of Christ present, but those who recognize the death of Christ, which was suffered at first, make it their life, 2) bring it into the supper in their thankful hearts, and thereby take from their members the sign which Christ appointed to be taken from them, and testify that they have seen his death. But that in this theologians 3) err, cannot be accounted for; for they do not recognize the saying Eph. 5. and Titum 3. of the cleansing of the washing away with the word, and of the bath of regeneration xxxxxxxx 4) being; that the signs are admitted to signify only, as is now sufficiently indicated. For ever that is without doubt, that purification is of the soul of the united spirit. "It is the Spirit that quickeneth." For this purpose also the remission of sin is admitted to the apostles, that they may preached the word of salvation and indulgence; for otherwise all believers well know whether no one else 5) gives them rest of conscience, neither the comfort in God.

384. But that Luther says: 6) "The bread is like the body of Christ, as the dove is the Holy Ghost, and the flame the angel" 2c., and says of a new being, et quomodo quidam fallantur,⁷) quod de unitate totali per unitates partiales, et econtra syllogizant, we leave in its value! that is, that it is not worth a light one, except that he recognizes there that the bread is the corpse of Christ not otherwise, neither the dove the Holy Spirit. Now the dove was not the Holy Spirit at all; for it was not a natural dove either, but only a spectrum, an appearing figure, which was wonderfully created for the present action, 8) and after the action it left again. Therefore, the dove and the flame are not like the bread, which is a sacrament in the night meal, and an essentially natural bread; not miraculously created, like the dove. Neither is the dove, flame, and cloud a sacrament; for sacramenta are things half used of signs, 10) common, known, which are manifest to all men: so such miracles are unused, strange, unknowable things; therefore the arguing of miraculous signs to sacramental signs is an error, quia non sunt ejusdem speciei for they are not of one form nor kind. We have said enough in previous writings that miraculous signs are not of one kind with sacramental signs, but Luther and his followers do not want to see this. Oh God! Behold, how the good man would like to help himself! but it must be. 11) Either he must break, or we will chase him from this book, as we chased him from the previous one. And do not admit this to ourselves, but we will do it with the iron rod of God's word, with the sword that pierces limb and limb 12).

385 Consider also, pious princes, that he says: 1) "Even if their text were uncertain, it would still be safer if one were deceived by God 2) neither by a man" 2c. Here we see how the devil climbs up. Since Luther errs in the understanding of the words, then God shall understand him. And if he dazzles and seduces with brights and bounces 3) as [, as] I well realize, his own conscience tells him; so he makes him a secret exit here, through which he may flee. Namely this: 4) If I am deceived, then God has deceived me, because I have insisted on His word; but do not think that the pope 5) and all heretics could say thus: If I err in my power or opinion, God has deceived me, for it is written plainly: "What you bind" or discharge 2c., "that is bound" or discharged. Or it is clearly written: 6) "The Father is greater than I." For this reason, however, no one is excused; for the truth is presented to us enough, but we do not want to accept it. But if God rejects us altogether, and lets us fall into reprobum sensum, that is, into a wrong opinion, we must nevertheless point out. May the God of peace grant that we recognize and accept the truth so unanimously that we all give glory to God with one mouth and heart, amen!

If we should now reject Luther's erroneous understanding, let us first put Oecolampadius' short, but quite virtuous Christian answer; and then put the other part of our understanding of the words, with rejecting Luther's understanding; and lastly speak of his faith. And therefore go [listen], pious princes, while Oecolampadio is listening, so may I with the other two

[Johann Oecolampad's response to Martin Luther's Confession of the Supper of Christ.]

Johannes Oecolampadius Huldricio Zwinglio Grace and peace from Christ our Lord.

Here I send you, faithful brother and fellow servant in the word of the Lord, my distortion, which I have placed on Luther's confession of the Lord's Supper. You may append this to your responsibility, if it seems good to you, so that men may see 9) that there is no repugnant spirit in us, as Luther pretends, and yet the one in his most audible proof 10) is one, so that he may make our doctrine suspicious; although it is denounceable and he himself gives evidence that it is one opinion and only other words. Search in his book, in the letter s [at] the first [leaf]. 11) Now I have never contradicted you, nor have you opposed me; indeed, I have used your words myself, just as you are not ashamed of mine. Our listeners are also not so deaf that they would raise a chipping and splitting because of us in this.

Now that the little books are here, and our unanimity is sufficiently denounceable, I will not answer for the same, as well as for many other disgraceful words and mockery words; for whoever is well with these, he does not yet want the truth. I do not know how to edify anyone with this; if the truth is recognized, it is all accounted for with honor. In the meantime we are no better than our Master Christ was. It should be a small thing to us that he wants to teach us the puerile logicam, yes, it should be dear to us, because his companions have long reproached us, we need too much of them.

(3) That he scolds us fools, and is foolish in his language, is a responsibility of his, that others attribute so much malice to us. That his best words are: "Fools, boys, devils," and the like, should be a reminder to us of how silly it is for a person, whom wrath overcomes; are we yet the better nor the more wicked.

(4) But because many are angry and offended by this, we have no other way to turn it around than to excuse ourselves in the most chastening way for the sake of doctrine. The Lord wants to test how dear the truth is to everyone. I know of no trade that has so freely opened the secrecy of men's hearts, some of them glib, and some of them confessors of the truth, as the matter of the Sacrament.

5) God will not be angered by the blasphemy that he is committing against us, and against you in particular, the alloeosi. 1) I have not yet found anything different in you, except that you are confessing a one God and man. I have not yet found anything different in you, except that you confess one Christ, true God and man. One has soon forced words back and forth to turn one's doctrine upside down.

(6) But that we are called enemies of the sacraments, strikers or desecrators, we have hardly been accused of anything more unreasonable. For all our writing and teaching is directed toward keeping the sacraments, 2) what is proper to be kept of them, and that their proper honor be proven to them. Even if we do not act so carnally, so crudely, so capernaïtically about sacraments, we are not sacrament strikers for that reason. Some scold us, who do not know what we believe or teach; even if it would mean life to them, they would not say: what sacrament? why it is used? and how it should be used? Should we therefore be sacrament strikers, that we do not confess that the bread is essentially the body of Christ, then all popes must be sacrament strikers, yes, even the Lutherans themselves now fall away from it, and say: Under or in the bread is the body of Christ.

(7) If we are enemies of the sacraments because we say that the matter of the bread remains in its essence, then all Lutherans are also sacrament strikers. If we are sacrament abusers because we do not accept miraculous, unspeakable miraculous signs in the sacraments, St. Augustine was an arch enemy of the sacraments who wrote so publicly. If we have desecrated the sacraments by not administering them with great pomp, with much ceremony, and according to the commandment of useless human statutes, then Christ and his apostles are guilty of this, who was pleased with simplicity, if we believe and preach the word of faith, of which it is written in Romans 10, by which the sacraments are sanctified, and sacraments, if we teach them, are made invisible by visible things.

1) i.e. to move up, to impose.

Things; not to put hope in the elements, to make the likeness of faith in everything, to take the mind captive to the obedience of Christ, that the truth may be known when we compare spiritual things with spiritual.

8) How may we be sacramental strikers? If we took the promise from the words of the supper, and would not allow the bread to be a sacrament of the true body and blood of Christ, poured out for us, as some do, we would be suspicious. If we denied that Christ, the Son of God, did not have his power to work with the sacraments as with words, and did not also work miraculously, it would be no wonder that we were opposed.

9) But it does not have the opinion. We proclaim the mystery of faith with the sacraments. That which is given for revelation shall not be obscured to us: so also our adversaries must admit the sacramental union, and even put a figurative speech in words which they do not like to circumvent, though they stiffly deny it, and yet one grasps around and around them that they accept it.

(10) Also, if they say that the body of Christ is not as a body in the bread circumscripively or locally, but otherwise incomprehensibly, but which may be admitted to the body as little 3) as to the spirit flesh and bone: one should well think whether divine zeal, or brotherly love, or Christian discipline move them to let other insanity creep in, whether already some miss their grosser and proclaim us as the most harmful enemies of God. Being an Anabaptist is not so harmful to them; seven times it would be better to listen to Popes. Pope Nicolaus in his condemned verdict has held his own, but Zwingli and Oecolampad have eaten their livers; they should be shouted out like this. And yet, in all that those who write against us dab at us, they have not understood us in one thing, which is so very unpleasant.

O! if it were done as right, as it is not; and if it were well with our hearts, as good fug we had in many places: how would we thus pay them off with abundant measure, and be again for them? But to whom would it be useful? to ours? No; for they desire the truth. The opponents? No; they would be the more embittered. To matter itself? No; it would be the more obscured. Our desire for revenge? No, that shall not be; God is judge.

3) In the old edition: "may admit".

The best thing will be to answer in humility and bear the shame for a while. It has come to this in the world that one does not know who will be scolded or praised. For dishonorable men are set on high by flatterers, and innocent hearts are burdened with all manner of mischief; but the day of the Lord shall open it, and the children of light shall know who is in the truth, and shall not think less of us. What do we care about the judgment of the children of darkness? We know well in whom we have trusted; if he be with us, what can all flesh do against us? The truth is strong, it shall avenge itself on our enemies. Why should we lose our patience? Enough is enough, simple and true, to answer the shortest to the matter. God grant His grace that it may be done with fruit! Amen.

Here you have my list, but I order you to do what you think is useful in it. I know well that you alone will refute it all. But I have done my part, because I am now also so completely in the game. With that, God be commanded. From Basel, on the 10th day of July, Anno 1528.

Johannis Oekolampadii's Answer to the Confession of Mart. Luther, on the Lord's Supper.

1 Paul, the holy apostle, when he reproaches us with the controversy of words, which some suppose to be carried on by us, does not want us to be completely silent about it, or either not to explain the words of Scripture correctly or, if they are presented badly, not to punish them. Without doubt, however, he wants us, if we want to attain the truth, not to be divided about the words, even if they are not produced with the same wisdom, so that we do not puff ourselves up harmfully with art, but rather create piety in the love of our neighbor. This is what God wanted my adversaries to do in the matter of the Sacrament. For I would like to think that in many things we could be compared in one mind, if one wanted to take note of each other properly. Unfortunately, it has not been possible so far. Well then, I pray to the Lord that nothing will happen to me, and that their angry defiance may be stopped with a gentle answer.

2) First, so that I may be understood, 1) I insist on using the words of the evangelists "the is my body": this is a sign or meaning of my body, just in the sense in which it is commonly said: "The bread is a sacrament, or a holy sign of the body of Christ. From which speech no one who has had an understanding has yet been offended: for nothing has been taken away from the true body of Jesus Christ, that it is the true body; but it has been added to it, that it is signified and signified by the bread. And so the bread is a sign, but the true body of Christ is a signified thing. And as the bread is truly bread and a sign, so the true body of Christ is truly the true body together, and also signified.

3. this now takes D. Mart. Luthern, as if I were rhyming, and it rhymed as little, as if I were saying: Christ would be Belial; says: it could not and should not be, and is quite a wrong trope, in all languages uncommon 2c. To this I shall now answer these three pieces; [I] first, that the trope is customary; [II] afterwards, that it should and must be used in the interpretation of the words "this is my body"; [III] lastly, however, rejecting some of Luther's counter-accusations in the words of the Lord. Well, dear reader, you must not let yourself be misled by his mocking words and scolding words; they do not serve here. You will see that this interpretation of mine is not a matter of courage; it can and may well be without any distortion. But so that you may understand the matter, notice that the words we call figurative or "abominable words" he calls "renewed words" and "of a new interpretation," for the sake that they take on new interpretations. And those we call "natural" and "non-figurative" he calls "words of the old, or first, interpretation. There he sets such a division and rule: 2) "The words of the old or first interpretation show the thing that is the new likeness; and according to the new interpretation they show the new right thing, or being itself, as in this saying: 'I am the right vine.' Here the word 'vine' has become a trope or new word, which cannot interpret back the old vine, which is of the new likeness, but interprets for itself the right new vine itself, which is not a likeness. For Christ is not a likeness of a vine, but again the vine is a likeness of Christ" 2c. We want to examine this explanation and revelation of his, as much as it is useful here, whether it is thoroughly appropriate and sufficient in all figurative speeches in which figurative words are invented, or whether it is repugnant to us.

1) d. i. confirm.

/Signa trifariam dicuntur [i.e. that which is signified is spoken in a threefold manner].

The words are to be divided into two parts. He divides them into two parts. But we will divide them into three parts.

(5) First of all, the words of the signs, when spoken proprie, that is, actually and ohnfigürlich, indicate the things for themselves, as they are in their nature, without all attention, that they may be likeness. As when I say: The lamb has four feet, the hare has two long ears, I understand only the natural hare or lamb. These are words as Luther calls them, namely of the first and old interpretation.

(6) Secondly, words that signify their nature by themselves also carry with them the meaning and likeness of other things. They indicate themselves together with their meaning, thus: if I point to a lamb, and say, The lamb is the patient Christ, the natural lamb is not excluded, for I point to it; but with it I also show how it bears the likeness of the true Christ. Thus, when Christ took the bread and said, "This," he pointed to the bread, leaving bread in its nature, but with it he also wanted to show the likeness of the bread, how the bread had a likeness of his body. I call these words sacramental here for the sake of two interpretations, a new and an old interpretation.

7) Thirdly, words that drop the interpretation of the natural essence, and show a new essence, the likeness of which is invented in the old meaning of nature. As when one says: Christ is the Lamb of God. There one points to no lamb of the flock, but to the new essential, which is Christ Himself, who is figured and signified by the lamb of the flock. Luther calls this word renewed words, and the other interpretation; but we call them figurative words. This distinction will be necessary and useful.

Signata trifariam dicuntur [i.e. that which is signified is spoken in a threefold manner].

8. again, you may speak in three ways of that which may be figured or signified by another.

9. first, as it is in its essence, without any appearance of any likeness, there is no likeness or figure, and are words of the first meaning, as: The body of Christ is born of Mary.

(10) Secondly, something is called as it is in its nature, and as it is figured, as: The body of Christ is the paschal lamb; that is, the body is a body, but is figured or signified by the paschal lamb.

11) Thirdly, without interpretation to the natural, but to the new essence, taken from the likeness; as, so the teachers call the body of Christ at times the sacrament of the body, and for the sign, and not just the true body, as Augustine indicates in epistola ad Bonifacium.

If Luther omits the other part, et peccat in divisione insufficiente, that is, divides up what is to be divided, it is no wonder that he lacks his rule, when he says: All tropi in Scripture interpret the right new essence, and not the likeness of the same new essence. The reason why it is lacking is that when one points to things that bear likeness to them, that is, to sacramental ones, they are not excluded with their natural essence for the sake of interpretation, and the likeness to it is accepted; this I will clearly show and prove to you.

You speak of St. Peter's picture: St. Peter is colored yellow. There I gladly allow that the new and figurative word stands in a new essence, only for the painted St. Peter. But where you say: St. Peter is the St. Peter who preached the Gospel; then understand by St. Peter in subjecto, in the first word, not only in its new essence, as a painting, but also with its likeness, that it resembles the true St. Peter; and but the word St. Peter in praedicato, since it is mentioned for the second time, understands us the living St. Peter and not the painted one. But if this were not the case, it would be said that the painted St. Peter had preached; and one does not therefore drip back, as Luther mockingly says; but he took little notice of this, indeed, he omitted it altogether.

(14) Luther did not quite understand the opinion of my interpretation, or did not want to understand it. For he pretends that I say "body" should mean "sign of the body" in the saying "this is my body," when, if I had wanted to follow Scripture, I should rather negate the word "body" so that it means the true new body, to which the natural body of Christ would be a likeness. And as he says after many words, "Let this be said: 1) This is bread; as if here the body meant the bread, and not bread the body. With this he goes around, garnahe through his whole book. And his helpers have also done it, and have failed me against the world. Now it is not so for him; for I say, and have said it, that here the "bread" is a "body."

1) Marginal gloss: RtzZula in 6xpon6N(ii8 relative^).

Sign of the Body. For by "the body" I understand the true body of Christ, the Son of God, born of Mary of virgins; although it is true that the word "sign" in (the) interpretation falls on the body, as it happens in the relativis; but this does not make the true body of Christ a sign.

(15) Take an example: I say, Solomon is a son of David. The little word son refers to the little word David. Now therefore it is not thought that David is the son; but he is the father, and Solomon is the son. Otherwise, even in the Holy Trinity, one would mix the persons and make the Father the Son; and again. So also here I say: This is the sign of the body, so the word sign leans on the little word body; and therefore is not to be understood that the body is the sign, but it is the true body, which was given for us; but the bread is the sign.

(16) I would give you a thousand and a thousand examples, and all the languages that can do it. But let it be enough in one! Ezek, at the 4th it says: "O son of man, take a brick, lay it before thee, and set the city of Jerusalem thereon, and sausages 1) against her bulwark" 2c. But 2) in the 5th chapter he says: "This is Jerusalem, which I have set among the Gentiles, and in her surrounding countries, and she has resisted 3) my judgments more than the Gentiles" 2c. Here the thing can be seen. In the 4th chapter, Ezekiel wants the city of Jerusalem to be "torn down". Mark, the true city would not be torn down on a brick, and stand substantially on it; but the figure and likeness of a city, as the tropus in the third account is able. Afterwards in the 5th chapter he says: "This is Jerusalem (that is, the torn brick with the form and shape is Jerusalem), which I have set among the Gentiles." Then I wanted to hear how they interpreted this to me. Did they want to say: The cracked brick is essentially Jerusalem, which is the city of God: this is not; for it would not confess on any small brick. Or would they say: Jerusalem is the "renewed" word, as they call it; how would it then rhyme that the other Jerusalem, according to the renewed word, had angered God more, and had been set in the midst of the Gentiles; this would now be clumsy. Our interpretation, however, is the simplest and purest, that the Jerusalem of the brick is a meaning of the true Jerusalem; and therefore the true Jerusalem is not the figure, but the demolished Jerusalem on the stone, as such is achieved in the best possible way. 4)

17) Give examples from wherever you want 5), you will not lack them. So also the seed is a figure of the gospel; the lamb, the rock and Passover a figure of Christ; will be constant around and around; yes, also outside of Scripture, Sanct Peter, the painted one, is a figure and sign of the true one. Summa Summarum, Luther says what he wants, so it is clear that the first words in the speeches are the figure, but the epilogues are the figured ones, although in the interpretation they are based on what is figured. Therefore, they are vain and useless speeches, which he has poured out with great splendor: it is not possible.

18] The fact that Luther cites many examples is to be disregarded, because he turns them all unreasonably and without order, contrary to all logic. For it is to be interpreted in a far different way, if one puts the sign before it, and the renewed or figurative word after it; for if the sign is displaced, thus: If one says: Gospel is the seed, or: Christ is the rock; then it is proper to interpret it thus: The gospel is signified by the seed; Christ is signified by the rock. But if I preside over the rock, and say: The rock was Christ, I say rightly: The rock means Christ, the seed means the gospel. Here, 6) Luther's conversion or reversal in the ground is not meant. 7) Example: The ripe is a sign of the wine, that I wanted to burst on it, that the wine Hergegen is also a sign of the ripe. So Luther does to him; when we say: The rock is a sign or figure of Christ, he turns it around unfaithfully and says: Christ is a sign of the rock. It wants to suffer this reversal: The rock is a sign of Christ ergo the sign of Christ is the rock. This followed also: The lamb is a sign of Christ; reverse it, it reads: Christ is signified by the lamb. I may certainly not be surprised enough that the scholars dwell on such obvious things, and want to grieve and distress us with sophistry.

19) Luther also sets another rule: 8) "Where the little word 'is' is introduced in a speech, one is certainly speaking of the 'is' of the speech.

4) Maybe: eräuet?

5) We put it instead of "nümmen" (no longer) in the old edition, which does not fit here.

3) befzen - bark.

essence of the same thing, and not from its interpretation." But how does he prove this rule? Exactly with the previous unhelpful rules, by way of example. However, it should not be completely rejected. For just as he can have two meanings in every word, he should also be able to invent them here in the little word "is," thus: some things have their nature and essence in themselves in nature, of each of which it is rightly and well said "is essential. Some have their essence in part according to the calculation of reason, whether they are already quite nothing in nature, so that it comes about that one may also ascribe the "is" to the void 1) and say: nothing is useful; and all important things have their "is" "in their value," 2) therefore also the little word xxxx xxxxx and xxxx xxxxx.

id est, "with us", or "that is", is so much said, [it] wants to serve to interpretation, and is "one means is" also "one is", has also its essence after its kind.

(20) Now, as it is said in the above-mentioned things, that some things bear with them, and are clothed with the interpretation; so the interpretation, as things multiplied and mingled, is also a being to them. Just as one may ask a thing what it is according to its nature, so one may also ask what it is according to its meaning. One may ask in a common way: What is image? and answer: It is a uniformity; so uniformity is in itself a being. Thus the common name "essence" extends far, and the word "is. Therefore it is not necessary to ask two questions, one about the essence, what it is, and the other, what it means, as Luther says. There should be no answering where the time is not thus uselessly entangled. It may be that, 3) when one desired to know the nature of a thing and then its meaning, one asked two questions for the sake of distinction. But if the natural essence is denounceable, and the meaning is inquired: what is it out of the way, if one already inquired the meaning of the significant essence by the "is"? Therefore, I also contradict him in that, it could not be equally valid: This is St. Peter; and: means St. Peter.

21. Let us prove these things further with examples. One has made a triumphant fire; one asks: What is this? one answers him: It is a fire. With this he has not done enough for the questioner; for he knows this beforehand, and he will he hears something else, namely, what does it mean? he nevertheless asks: What is it? But if he is answered: It is a fire of joy; then he may well accept what it means. It is the same in the sacraments; one does not ask what bread is in substance, but in meaning. The disciples knew in the supper before that bread was bread, or even breaking bread; they were not to be taught that. But the significant essence was to be revealed to them, and [they] would not have known it either if it had not been interpreted to them by the words which give them such essence as it is ordained to be, that the bread is a sign of the body, and yet the body is understood to be the natural body of Christ. For the name "sign" is understood of the bread, although it is placed after the "is" to the "body".

(22) This would be a good answer to all the other gossip that Luther uses in the interpretation of Luke. For as I leave the blood in Matthew and Mark to be the true blood of Christ, so also in Luke and Paul; but that the word of interpretation stands before the word "new testament," namely, that the cup is a sign of the new testament: not that the new testament is the sign, but the cup; not the body the sign, but the bread. Therefore it must not be answered there, if he reproaches that 4) I am not confessed (confitens), although he gives me a suspicion that he has well recognized this interpretation and otherwise makes a good man out of me.

23 After this, whoever wants to see, may do so without complaint that I am not deceived in the saying of Tertulliani. He acts as if I understood Tertullianum de figura sermonis in Grammatica, which he has never guessed; even if I speak of figurative words back and forth, I do not say that Tertullianum points to it; for it is as much as "sign", as he himself gives to understand lib. 5. adversus Marcionem, where he calls a "sacrament" of bread and wine, which he called a "figure" before. Luther should also say at once: Sacramentum would be a figure in the Grammatica, so that one would see that it was mockery. He otherwise indicated enough, the "Zeichelei"; what would it need here the "essence"? Nor is it that Tertullianus has led me to speak thus of the Sacrament. But if I should thank a teacher on earth, for the sake of my understanding in this, then I would thank Augustino. But this does not serve here.

24 After this, Luther has other bad objections, which he brings forth with impudence and impudence, and would like to present them more graciously; but I think he thinks it suits him just fine. Let's put them after each other.

(25) The first: Where it is said that the Lord's bread and wine are set up for the remembrance of Christ's death alone, we have nothing of the text; we have enough in what we read: Take, eat, this do in remembrance of me! Or: what is the use of the text? May the death of the Lord be remembered (which is the main and some cause of the Lord's Supper) without such a text. 1) Answer. We say that in the supper there is not only remembrance and thanksgiving, but we should also praise and thank God in all places and at all times, as the Psalm says: "My soul, praise the Lord, and do not forget all His good deeds. In all the place of his glory praise the LORD." And again, "I will praise the LORD at all times." But this should also be a common thanksgiving, which is not commanded at all times, nor 2) with special ceremonies. For this reason a sacramental sign has been instituted for us, for the agreement of the people, in which it would be proclaimed to us in what and why we give thanks with one another, namely, we are thankful that we have been redeemed through the death of Christ, and that His merit is also granted to us. But this was to be commanded in an outward sign. But if the signs alone had been presented, and not interpreted, who would have told us wherein the thanksgiving was? Who would have told us what the bread meant, and what Christ meant by it? If Christ had not interpreted his action in words, how would we know that it was a sacrament? It is not valid to invent such necessary sacraments from one's own head; therefore such a text was necessary for us, since the sacrament was instituted and the command was given with a convenient interpretation.

26 Secondly, he asks: 3) Why Christ should teach the meaning (Luther mockingly calls it interpretation) just this once 4)? Answer: We do not say that Christ must do it, but that he should do it reasonably and wisely. For at that time the new ceremonies were to be instituted, since the old ones had now ceased; and since Christ was still here on earth in such a way that he would begin and end the new ceremonies.

than ours. And since they started, they should also be explained.

27 Thirdly, he asks: "What is the use of knowing that the bread means the body of the Lord? What good is such an allegory to faith, which even the wicked and devils could invent? What harm would it do if I never knew that the bread means Christ's body? We could have invented it from ourselves, especially since there is no analogia fidei. Answer: If Christ alone is the one whom God raised from the brethren [quem deus ex fratribus resuseitaturus erat] according to Genesis, 5) to renew the law, to change the ceremonies, it was also right for him to declare them. For even though others might have accepted such a likeness by his inspiration, one would not have been assured that this was his will and no other. But the allegories in the sacraments and in others have another form. The sacraments hold the secrecy, revealed by God alone to the true believers, the word of the cross, which is not recognized without benefit, not despised without harm. But if the devil already knew something, should Christ not teach it?

28) Now 6) Christ has included in this words of promise, as a core and heart of the sacraments. But who can give us promise in a sacrament but Christ alone? Here is the promise that Christ died for us and did enough for us, as it will follow afterwards, and has made this known to us as 7) well by signs than by words. Whoever then may say that the outward word is not useful, may also say that the interpretation of the sacraments is not useful. Whoever then may say that the words of promise do not lead to faith, and are unlike faith, may also say that the words of Christ fall short of the analogia fidei, and do not lead us to faith. Or, to recognize that Christ died for our sin and rose again is not the word of faith? One shall see, if God wills, who misses in the matter and words of the sacrament of faith. But Luther presents it worse and more bluntly, because 8) it is taught by us.

acted with hidden 1) words with his apostles? I will drop the Lutheran pebbles. Answer. It was little hidden to the apostles than that they were led by the paschal lamb into the memory of the execution from Egypt. The way of speaking was not unfamiliar to them; they knew that bread was bread. But they were also to learn what bread meant. Therefore Christ explained to them what he meant by the special ceremonies, after he had already drunk the last with them. 2) And what a difficulty was it for them to learn the meaning of bread. And what was the difficulty or the hardness of it, if he had told them before often the suffering with words, and now proclaims it with a sign and accompanying explanatory word? The Lutheran mind, which some dream here, that the bread should essentially be the true body of Christ or that he should be bodily in or under the bread, could not come into their minds; otherwise they would have let themselves notice it with the least, since they left nothing else unasked.

(30) Fifthly: Where is such equality in bread and wine, so that the bread means his body given for us, and that the wine means his blood poured out for us? He asks the question with much circumlocution, which I would not have used to him, who so far has so faithfully and Christianly pointed to the promises. Well, he denies the equivocation. But we want to show that with the help of God.

31. answer. There is a serene 3) likeness in nature and in Scripture; for bread and wine are created for food and drink, for the sustenance of life, and for the knowledge 4) and joy of the heart, as the 104th Psalm says, "That thou shouldest bring forth bread out of the ground; and wine maketh glad the heart of man, and the form thereof gloweth with oil; and bread strengtheneth the heart of man." But how the bread is to be eaten, we have also. As long as it is decided 5) before the servants, it will not feed, but it must be eaten, as the wise woman, Proverbior. 31: "Sre has given the food to her household." And the bread is divided and broken, that it may be sneezed upon. The grain also is ground and broken, that it may become meat. It is the same with wine: as long as it is in a barrel or in a large jug, it is not eaten.

drunk, but when it is poured or poured into the cups. And initially, as long as it is in the grapes and skins, it is not a drink; but when it is pressed and trodden in the winepresses or troughs, then it is poured out. No one can deny the parables, they are evident in nature.

32 Now let us see if they are also added to Christ. No one can deny that the body of Christ was ordained for us spiritually as food, and his blood as drink, if he reads the sixth chapter of John, where he calls his flesh bread and food, and his blood drink. This bread was for a time as much as decided 6), and was a bread of angels, unknown to men. But when Christ gave himself for us in death, then he became food for us; then the bread was broken, so that it might be distributed to us for food, as it was provided by the Father for eternity. Of this giving, the Lord Christ himself says, John 6: "The bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world." Is not this clear enough compared? For it is ever certain in the words that He asked Himself to be given in death as a sacrifice for the life of the world. This has never been denied by Luther in his writing or by any Christian until now. How often does the Holy Scripture tell us this, Rom. 8. chapter: "God did not spare His own Son, but for us all He gave Him up." Gal. 1: "He gave Himself for our sin," and therefore He became our food in the first place. When the grain of wheat rotted, it first brought forth fruit; and when he was lifted up, he drew all things to himself. If one does not want to recognize the parables, one will certainly not recognize any.

(33) I say the same of his blood. We cool and refresh our hearts with joy that our sins are forgiven us through Christ, as with a spiritual drink. And for this purpose the blood of Christ Jesus is ordained, by which also the covenant is secured, and with it he, a supreme priest, entered the holy place once to make atonement for the Father. Now as long as the blood was not poured out, not enough was done for sin; but at the trough [winepress] of the cross, the blood was poured out and poured in for us to drink. Is not this also a likeness? How can something similar be said, how the bread becomes edible and the wine drinkable?

Also the gospel there were no such clear words that such sacrifices should is like unto it, and therefore must not be cast into the field point to Christ. How was the Old Testament clearer? Now, by the husbandman, nor sowed, nor bear fruit. So here is with the help of the interpretation, it is a thousand times a characteristic of the bread, to be edible, and to be given clearer that Christ is sacrificed than it was before without and broken beforehand. In the body of Christ, again, it is the word. In addition, Christ himself is the light and the also "to be edible" and "to be given and broken" in its own truth, but his ceremonies are not, which in themselves way, namely, to be humbled to the uttermost. Oh, how this would be just as dark as those in the old law; but through bread is cut before us with thorns, cheek strokes, rods, the addition of the words of interpretation they are also and scourges, nails and spurs, so completely humiliated, clearer and point much more to Christ.

(39) Eighthly, Luther has an objection, how the breaking may not be compared to the death of Christ, or to crucifixion; for it is "teaching the unknowable through the unknowable. To this has already been answered. Because Christ 1) so clearly says that his blood is to be shed, it is good to know that breaking it in the body of Christ would cost life. It is also easy to understand how a body breaks' as we have a common saying: You must do this, and should you break or burst at it, that is, come to the last extremity; and therefore must not give pieces. But how can this be so strange to us, since we read in the 22nd Psalm: "I am poured out like water, my bones are broken, my heart is melted in my body like wax," and we also say: "The grain of wheat has decayed completely," and other such sayings.

40 The ninth: It is the same breaking, since he says: He took the bread and broke it, and: This is the body which is broken for you. Therefore crucifying may not be understood by this; for Christ did not catch himself, as he ought to have done, where breaking is so much as killing; for he took the bread himself, and broke it with his own hands.

41 Answer. That it is one word, no one may deny; but differently the bread breaks; and differently the body breaks, but still have their comparison among themselves, that they are broken to the benefit of 2) others, and in that it is the same. I still do not see that may prevent that the crucified may not be called "broken". If one let the broken body be only in the other number of the figured things, of which said above, then the force would be found fine, that the body has a breaking after tropical speech way; and we have not excluded the breaking of bread. I do not like to insist on my writing; but I have no doubt that the content of the word would not be unrecognized.

42) But that it is said: 4) "Christ broke the bread, but he did not catch himself and kill himself. Answer: How? if we open our eyes, do we not see that he gave himself up, sacrificed himself, and, being willing, gave up his spirit, humbled himself to the point of death, so that he might give himself to us, that we might receive him as food? That is why God the Father says in Zechariah [13:7]: "I

I will smite the shepherd," and Christ says, "He is the good shepherd, which setteth his soul for the sheep. [So, of course, he himself broke our bread; indeed, he gives it to us as well, as the heavenly Father, because they are under his control. Of course, it is not necessary for Christ to kill himself, so that the likeness may exist.

43) The tenth: "How can it be a parable, if there is not the main part of the parable, namely, that for us the bread may be broken and the wine poured out for salvation? That must also be there." Answer. But this is a new right, that the comparison must be in the highest. So be it! 5) Is not the likeness quite abundant, if the bread contains life, and man lives in the bread, and the wine restores the heart from fear; as we also have found life through the death of Christ, and peace, joy, rest, and rejoicing of our conscience and soul through his shedding of blood? Is the salvation of consciences derived from any other source than the forgiveness of sin and the knowledge of the covenant with God the Father in the blood of Christ Jesus? What is lacking there? We have in the antitype life and joy as the highest pieces, and is well abconterfeiet.

44. eleventh: "They also liked to say, John writes [Cap. 19, 36:] 'Let no bone be broken in him, that the scripture may be fulfilled.' Therefore the Scripture does not read that breaking should be rhymed with Christ dying." Response. It is not said 6) that Christ's leg was broken, but his death is nevertheless called breaking, since soul and body were separated, and the whole was divided, so that it might be shared with us in its entirety. For one must not be concerned about the name "breaking", since he calls himself a worm, and is called Medyko (xxxx) in Isaiah in the 53rd chapter [v. 5], that is, a crumbler than in a mortar, and that for the sake of our sin. And so, this likeness exists in all free, unweakened and constant.

(45) The twelfth: "Neither is the cup like unto the blood, that it should be poured out for sin. This has been answered enough. 7) It is inherent in nature and scripture, and is quite common, since one reads in Genesis chapter 49: "He shall wash his robe in the blood of wine. not only because of the color, but also because of the expression, that the juice in the grape is expressed in the same way as the blood that dwells in the veins. So also the prophet Isaiah in chapter 63, where he speaks of the shedding of the blood of the wicked; God compares Himself to one who treads the winepress alone, and says: "I have treaded them in my wrath, and trodden them down in my fury; so their blood is sprinkled upon my garments, and has defiled all my vesture." There the prophet compares shed blood with wine that has dried up, which ever has its likeness with the blood. Why then may the likeness not exist here? But see, 1) in one place the wine and the blood defile, in another place the wine cleanses; but the blood of the wicked defiles and makes unclean, for it is dead and died. Therefore the blood of the goats in the law could not cleanse. But Christ's blood, which is pure and living, washes and cleanses, where it is no more than sprinkled. Therefore the saying in Genesis 49 is to be understood that Christ washed his garment (that is, his spiritual body and church) from the impurities of sins with his precious blood, when John says: "His blood has washed us from our sins. [Revelation 1:5.]

46 Therefore, believers are called "sprinkled with his blood for sanctification," as the epistle to the Hebrews, Cap. 9:13, 14, powerfully indicates. But what is the forgiveness of sin but the washing away of stains and blemishes? And if the wine has a washing and cleansing power, it also has in it the likeness of the forgiveness of sins. Let no one be surprised, the Samaritan pours wine into the wounds of the wounded man at Jericho to cleanse them 2c. We also have baptism by fire; therefore in all things it is good to see that without all the mockery of Christ there are sufficient likenesses according to nature and Scripture.

47 And so the objections, however mockingly they are made, are sufficiently resolved. And now it is established that the tropus may persist here; so, too, God willing, the sacrament may well remain unchallenged.

The other part, that one must assume the tropus.

48. up to this point it has been shown that this way of interpreting ours is possible; Luther does not want to have enough of it, so it is also suggested to him.

1) Marginal gloss: l'r-rAnr lavat "t totzäat; sie et sa-r shows that it must be so for him, which up to now has also acted against him and only tremendously; but what he imposes against it, we also want to consider, and it is to be found null and void, as that which is now heard.

(49) Three rules (2) have occurred by which it should be proven that our understanding is created right. The first one is also Luther's: One should stick to the dry, clear words of the text and let them be valid, what they interpret according to their kind; and give them other interpretations, unless a public article of faith compels. The other I have set: Sacraments should be spoken of sacramentally. The third, which is ours, is: one should not accept anything against the articles of faith. Here, Luther intends to make us defenseless in all three rules; but you will see that he does not succeed.

50 The first rule does not serve him at all: for I have taught him that the words, "this is my body, which is given for you," are dark and not clear according to his! For I have not said badly that the text is not clear, but if one gives him such an understanding, as Luther, namely, that the natural bread is essentially the naturally invisible body of Christ, which is visibly presented for us. But my interpretation is: 3) This natural bread is a sign of the natural body of Christ, which is given for us; and this is clearer, where one looks at the purpose of the text. You may well see this from the same example as that in Ezekiel: "This is Jerusalem, which I have set among the Gentiles." It is a clear saying, but to whom? to him who knows how the Jerusalem that was torn down was a figure of the other Jerusalem on a brick. But if someone would be so last-headed 4) that he would think that the painted Jerusalem would be essentially the real true Jerusalem, then the right mind would not be clear to him. So also, those who know that here is a sacrament of the true body of Christ, the text is clear to them, and my interpretation is quite certain. But those who do not know that here is a sacrament of the natural body of Christ, to them this and other sayings are obscure, not only in that they do not believe it as it is in itself, but also what the true content of the words is; and Luther must not consider me so simple-minded as if I did not know how to distinguish between difficultatem intelligendi ih re, et difficultatem in- telligendi in vocabulis. For I say that also

This word will be incomprehensible to the best speakers and those who understand the language, because they take the bread as a sign of the body.

In the other part of his book, Luther argues: "If we had the choice, we would not want to make a clearer and 1) more comprehensible text, 2) and as one put it differently, one would want to break a hole in it in all ways. Response. Yes, of course, it is well put, and if I had the choice, I would not put it differently, because I would have to give some people an understanding. However, he does not fasten his mind on Luther, but on ours. For two things may be understood if one asks: What is that? or if one says: That is that; either what it is according to its "essence" or what it is according to its "meaning. Now if the essence of a thing can be announced, and one asks further, then it is a sign that it carries a meaning in it, which one desires to know. Or if one answers: this is it; one says, what it "signifies": When St. Peter, Acts 10, saw the face with the harness, like a large linen cloth full of all kinds of animals, and he heard: Arise, butcher and eat 2c. And when it was taken up again, he doubted with himself what it was. Here Peter had knowledge that the vision was a vision, as it seemed to him; but he was not ignorant of what it meant. There the Scripture says: He stumbled, or was troubled in it, what it would jochs 3) be? that is, what God meant by it. The same questions are also with Zachariah and other prophets, that they ask: "Who are ine?" They were well aware of what the visions were essentially; but they desired what was meant by them.

52 Now this also was in the supper. The disciples knew what bread was, or what the cup was, and what was in the cup; but what Christ meant by this they did not know until he gave them to understand, as he had done several times, when he took the children to him and put one in the midst of them; they knew that the child was a child, but by this he taught them something else. Now I do not say this to prove the tropum, but to show what diligence the Lord had in teaching his own. And the words are plainly spoken, and no man would speak them more plainly himself.

(53) If I gave a penny with my image on it and said, "Take it," I would give it to you.

have you my face; or: this is my face, keep it in my memory! if I already had a power to change my face into the coin, would one therefore also have to have a clear word that the coin was essentially my face, and not rather this be a clear word, 4) that it was an image and memorial sign? There would probably be other decent words spoken, which would not deny such presence.

But here one would like to say to me: Lug, drive 5) beautiful, learn Luther's opinion daß! He does not want to say that bread is thus essentially the body, as the Father and the Son have a natural unity in the Godhead: Neither does he want 6) that a personal being should be understood here, as God and man are one person in Christ, since one says: Man is God.

55. answer. I am at it, and have fought against the opposition; for some have been so stiff-necked, and have been allowed to say: "Let there be dry words; let all reason depart; let all things be possible to God; if the priest speaks the words, the bread is like the body of Christ, as born of Mary; Mary bore Christ once, we bring him every day from heaven in the bread. I did not want to remain silent about this, because I am allowed to preach; for it is not similar to faith that the Son of God took another creature into a person than the seed of Abrahah, therefore I am well satisfied in this. But if one wanted to insist on the dry words without distinction, then one would not want to silence such screamers for a long time. For the true and right essence 7) is that some things are either of one nature or one person. I cannot consider other unity to be self-consistent and quite essential. Whether the Spirit of Christ is already in the believers in Christ, yet they are not a natural Christ or God, notwithstanding that the Psalm says, "Ye are gods." But some may boast that bread is the natural body of Christ in such self-consistent essence. 7)

56. item: It is also not Luther's opinion that there is a real unity, as it is said of angels [Ps. 104, 4.]: "God makes his angels.

4) "be" put by us instead of: "be".

5) "Lug" - see to, notice. - In the old edition: "Lug fhar schon", which Walch explains by "d. i. siehe aufer". But we do not think it right to take "fhar" for "aufer". Cf. § 85 in this writing of Oecolampad, where the word "Fahr schön" is repeated.

to wind, and its dimers to flames of fire." And it is said of fire: this is an angel. Nor is it a formal or spiritual unity, as is said by the evangelists, that the Holy Spirit descended upon Christ in the form of a dove; for the Holy Spirit wished to manifest himself in such a form. Nevertheless, he does not want to have said that there is such a unity here; and yet it is said of the dove that it is the Holy Spirit, and the fire is the angels.

57 Answer. Here we would almost come to agreement, especially because it is said that the dove or the fiery tongues are the Holy Spirit. For the creature is not taken in one nature or person with God, only it has meant the Holy Spirit, and the Spirit has been no more agreed upon than other 1) creatures. So if one were to come here, 2) and speak of the bread in such a way that it is the body of Christ, it would by no means be against me. For I have reported this in my first letter. But that the sacramental agreement, like the real revelation of the angels in the fire, is not yet proven to me; because the angels made and held the fire anew. The bread is made before, and yet Christ does not work the bread in the believers' hearts. But Luther does not say the same.

Furthermore, I do not dislike the fact that Luther sets up a sacramental unification, and for the sake of this one should say "this is my body" and thus the two come into one being. He also gives such a rule to be spoken in all languages: "Where two different beings come into one being, one also includes such two beings in one speech; and as one looks at both beings, one also speaks of both with one speech"; and gives examples of all the unities now reported, so they are to be kept; also here in the "this is my body". And when they come together, they are called one being, even though each has its own being.

59. answer. I would also be satisfied, 3) because there is no way against me where Luther, with his strict refutation, does not obscure the name "sacrament" for us; for we must fear that he understands something else by sacramental unity, or sacramental essence. Does he want to understand it that sacrament means a sign of a holy thing, i.e., that in the case of a visible if matter is understood as something invisible next to it, it is not against us; then the being will be a significant being that takes on matter, because it carries a new meaning through the word. "For when the word becomes an element, it soon becomes a sacrament," as Augustine says. It is a "being" that receives the meaning, but not a self-perpetuating being, and are two different things. But if the thing has become a sacrament, it is a significant being in relation to the one part. So it is not wrong to say, "This is my body. And this is exactly what I said at the beginning in the first explanation. Why do we quarrel with such great harm to Christianity? Let us understand one another, for it is not a matter here of which one is considered the more learned; but that the miscarriages, of which there have been many in this sacrament, be stopped, is still a matter of daily concern.

60) But if Luther confesses the simple agreement, 4) then why did he fight so hard that the bread does not have the likeness of the body that is offered for us, and now says that it is a sacramental union? I cannot compare Luther in this, and must not accept him there, because he presents himself so ultimately before.

But now I want to have brought this by force, that the words, how dry they are, will not serve him from the essence, in their first interpretation without all tropes and figure in the speech. For he must assume synecdoche in the union; and where the same figure is, there is not exactly the dry letter. 5) He must nevertheless assume the synecdoche. He must nevertheless accept the synecdoches thus

He is the one who helps us to confirm our cause, no matter how much he fights against us with words. And so he helps us to confirm our cause, however hard he fights against us with words.

Luther thinks that his interpretation is all the more obscure if one must understand the invisible body in one place and the visible body in another. But I do not see that it makes him any clearer where one thing is, and one should understand two properties, and that without all explanation and proof.

63 Further, I am said to have missed him also in saying that it does not rhyme in the words of Luke or Paul, who add, "which is given or broken for you," for if the body, as Luther says, is invisible, it follows that when I say that it is also invisibly given and given, it is invisible.

would be broken. He considers a great insanity, quod pro qualiter, and compares this to the speech: Christ is invisible in heaven, who suffered visibly.

64. answer. Where we thought, what we acted, one would measure the thing soon. A long time ago he asked, 1) "one should bring whether Christ's body is already food, 2) that we also bring a likeness, in which he would be given for us". And now, if we show the likeness, he would gladly reject it in qualiter. But it will not help him, if the bread is a sacrament of the body of Christ, and Luther admits this in the meantime; even if we now argue this, and he does not deny it, as if it were none of his business, if the sacramental agreement should be indicated, namely: wherein the body of Christ is a bread, as it is distributed. And if the union and the essence stands on the likeness, the likeness shall not be restrained. For the very visible body then (while it was broken) it was a food. Now the sacraments are like the concreta, and hold in them substantiam and accidens, I must say, like a corrupt dialectic. They have a likeness as accidens in nature as a substance, and one asks not only who? or what? but also: how?

When I say: A charcoal burner who is black is a Moor, I mean: in that he is like a Moor) that he is black. Blackness is, after all, an accidental thing or accidens; as here "to give" and "to be broken" indicate the primary likeness, and "corpus" is in the likeness as substantia, and the "to be broken" -as accidens; so the quid and qualiter are found, and must be the likeness of nature and accident in a visible body. What would I be saying if I said: an invisible charcoal burner is a Moor?

(66) If I say of baptism that it is a sacrament of the dead and risen with Christ, may I not draw a quality from it? Luther's list does not rhyme at all: The invisible body of Christ is in heaven, and the visible one has died. For the speech is not heaped against the sacrament, 3) and it is without likeness; nor does it indicate to us the power of the sacrament. So our trope should and must consist of a clear understanding of the words.

The other rule I did not make up from my own head, but followed Augustine in it, and is this: That one speak of sacraments sacramentally. Luther does not like this rule either. Nevertheless, it is and remains certain and firm. But Luther has such an objection here.

68 To the first: "Dear, why are the other words not also taken figuratively, and does the trope alone go over the is, or body? Or where is the rule here that teaches us which words must not be taken figuratively? For on such words one would also like to take the words 'eat', 'such things do in remembrance of me'. Tropos watch, and say: 'Take' means: listen! 'Eat' means: believe! Such things do' means: to have in the heart" 2c.

Answer: 4) All speeches are to be accepted according to the occasion of the matter; one sees what is spoken for the sake of meaning or not. But Luther is more concerned with conundrums here than with fathoming the truth. I will answer him with an example: Somebody wanted to make a living lion out of a painted one; and I said: You shall speak of the painting as it is proper to speak of the painting. And another would begin to speak, saying: The painter has painted the color with the brush on the wall and told his disciples to do the same to him; and then he would come who before wanted to make a living lion out of the painted one, and would say: You told me to speak of the painting as of the painting; so I say, The painter is a sign of a painter, the paint is a sign of the paint, painting is a sign of the painting, the disciples are signs of the disciples 2c. Who would not see here that he was muthwilt and vexed the people? But if someone said that he did not know which was the true painter or the painted painter, or what was painted and what was not painted, who could be responsible for such a childish mind? Now every Christian knows well that bread is a sacrament, and is now interpreted that it is the body, that is, a memorial sign of the true body of Christ.

(70) In the same way a man would turn to it, if it were said to him, Believe the articles of faith, and put the mind into the obedience of Christ; in other things thou mayest keep thyself well without danger. Let him not speak such things: I do not know what the articles are, do I? Therefore, if we were not confessed [oovüttznt68 essinn] that bread was a sacrament, then perhaps this counter-

Throw a bill. But who says here: "to take" means: to hear? "Eat" means: believe? "Do such things" is: to have in the heart? "Dächtniß" is a crucifix; that he may draw such an interpretation? Now I have not spoken of all the surrounding words, but of sacramental ones, that is, "the bread"; although the word of the sign leans on the word body, as reported above.

On the other hand, he says: "God Himself should not be able to establish a sacrament in this way. For how can he speak of sacraments if all his words are to be understood differently than they are? If he speaks plainly of the manner of words, it is not a sacrament; for they are not tropi or figurative words. If he speaks figurative words, then one does not know what he says."

72 Answer: This two-horned dilemma does not sting or poke, and equally as little as if I were speaking: if one speaks only fragmented letters, then there is no meaning in them; for they are not whole words, but only letters. But if one speaks whole words, 1) one cannot understand them. So here 2) the words, when put together, give an indication of a sacrament. If I speak alone: "bread" or "body"; I do not come into the understanding of the sacrament. But if I link the different things together in speech, the figure soon carries itself. If I speak: I am buried; and say, Christ be my Lord; no one takes no figure from it. But if I join the simple words together, and say, I am buried with Christ, a figure is immediately found in the words. And if I say, Bread is of wheat; the body of Christ, born of Mary, is crucified, I have not yet the sacrament. But put the simple words together, bread is the body, and they bring a sacrament.

(73) Further, the other part of his argument is also of no use, when he says: But if God speaks figurative words, they are not understood. Answer: Yes, if figurative words were unrecognized words; but they are simple intelligible words, which by the addition take on something, by which they are figurative and are recognized; and are therefore simple in themselves, but have become figurative by the addition.

The third: "When Moses instituted the paschal lamb, which is a figure of Christ, he did not need a figurative word, but plain, simple words, as they were in common usage; and all the figures of the Old Testament are spoken in dry, clear, simple words, and there is not one thing in them all that is spoken figuratively."

75 Answer: It is right, 3) that clear and simple words are taken as well, as composition of a word of good recognizable letters should happen. But in clear words also a figurative speech may arise. As in the word: It is the passover, the overtaking of the Lord. Whether this word contains nothing figurative, I will let Luther judge for himself. He will certainly say that it is a renewed word, and of the other meaning. Also, as stated above, such an interpretation has been taken from all words and invented in them. But that the paschal lamb is a figure of Christ, 4) was then not known to all the ancients, namely, if they were not further taught by the Spirit of God, as also other figures were hidden from them. For the common people, as the children, only the history and the letter was brought forward, from which they may not have learned so much. Just as the children, who already know how to read Latin, do not know what is said in German, so they read like beginners; the Christians who follow [read it] as it has been further interpreted. 5) For John says, "Take the history and the letter alone, from which they cannot read so much. For John says, "Behold, this is the Lamb of God!" Paul says, "Christ is our Passover!" Peter says, "We are redeemed with the precious blood of Christ, as of an innocent and unspotted Lamb." Now if Moses had interpreted this to the ancients to Christ, and said, The lamb is Christ, which is without blemish, that is, without sin; this ye shall eat, that is, ye shall believe in him; there would be vain figure, the lamb a figure of Christ, the blemishes a figure of sin 2c. What then is this contrary to my given rule, as Luther says? Whoever wants to, may well see whether I speak with difference or not.

The fourth concern is that "if Christ is also called a sacrament in Scripture, 1 Tim. 3, it may come to be read that Christ is God, that it may be said that Christ is a signification of God.

Answer: There is no need for concern, because 6) Christ (as he may be called a sacrament or mystery) and the sacraments are so far apart. In addition, the place 1 Tim. 3.

has a different meaning, because that is why Christ is called a sacramental sign.

78 Luther says to the fifth: "The sacrament or story should be a sign or likeness of another thing. But the words should not be interpreted in any other way than they are.

79) Answer: This is Luther's legend; and he wants that one believes him, God gives! what he says. Where is it written that the words in the sacraments should not be interpreted differently, neither they run? If I say: I baptize you in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit, does baptizing here mean nothing else, neither dipping in water in the name of the Father? so would baptism be with all physicians, stigners and salmoners, 1) who often dip something in wine or water and changed matter in the holy three names. But baptize here means nothing else, neither: I mark you, who are a member of the church of God Father, Son and Holy Spirit, with the signs of his children and members of his church. If one says to a judge, when he is put to the sword, Take it, and put it to you; this is the authority, that you should punish all the disobedient. Behold! how the sword is so comely a sign of violence, yea, a sign of violence, because the sword is needed in violence. So Luther makes rules where he has no Scripture anywhere, and accordingly he builds and insists on them.

80) But what does Luther mean by allowing it to be a sacrament and saying: It is supposed to model something, namely the unity of the Christians in one spiritual body of Christ through one Spirit? 2c. But why does he not confess here that it is a sign of the body of Christ given for us? If he does not confess it, how does it become a sacramental revelation, on which his praedicatione identica stands? This meaning is to precede, so that it may ground the other; the merit of the suffering of Jesus Christ is commanded to us more highly than that we should bear an abhorrence of it. This suffering, and the likeness of its fruit, are taught by the words and also by the signs; and there is no confusion among us.

Of the saying: "The rock was Christ", and of the circumcision, and of the paschal lamb, Luther must not give me anything. Read what I have written about them in my answers; they will probably remain unpunished for untruth.

The third rule is that no new doctrine should be accepted contrary to the similarity of faith. It should be enough for peace, that no one should condemn us, because the righteous Christians have never rejected our doctrine as contrary to some article of faith, yet their opinion is introduced alongside these articles of undoubted faith. How earnestly was the Concilio Niceno (which is the oldest and, in terms of doctrine, accepted by all Christians without contradiction) concerned that 3) all the necessary articles of our faith should be brought together, and that henceforth no other should be added to them! Therefore, since Nestorius then began to teach his heresy, and the churches of Rome, Alexandria, and Hierosolymitana became divided in one part, and Antioch and Constantinople in the other, they disputed with great hardening, so that even in the Concilio at Ephesus they parted without an end. 4) For both parties claimed (as will be noted from their epistles) that the other party wanted to impose something further on the Christians to believe than was understood at Nicaea in the Symbolo; and finally the unity of the world in faith was restored by the means alone, 5) by the ten- and hundred-year-old bishop Acacium of Berea, that both parts were content from the interpretation of Athanasii: as he, Athanasius, in his epistle to Epicteto, which still exists, explained what was done at Nicaea. And so Nestorius was found to have made an addition, and was expelled from the Church as a heretic, and became a good peace.

But if in the articles of faith these articles of the sacrament, that the bread is essentially the body of Christ (that is, that the essential should be contrary to the significant essence), are not mentioned in the articles of the old faith, how can we allow a new article to be imposed upon us, against which other articles of faith would have to bow down and resign from the simple mind? since this article of the sacrament does not want to refrain from the other articles 6)? With this, the peace of the church will never be planted. Now, if one were to remain with the rigid words and exclude figurative speech, then one would have to take issue with other articles. So initially, 7) that the Son of God is not

From which words I understand that he wheat; where it is otherwise urged to set the word wants to speak 3) that the Body of Christ is not bodily in "essential" against the word "sacramental," the mind is the Sacrament. Answer: We also say this. So far, not caught up in the servitude of Christ through the faith however, it has not been explained to us in this way, but of the incarnation of the Son of God. And since all other it has been argued as if the body of Christ were also in interpretations are in conflict with some articles of faith, the bread, and it has been badly answered that one and this ours is least opposed to such true incarnation, should not ask how or when. That is why I gladly accept not only is the trope possible, but it must and should be it; I also know that it has been taught in this way in the accepted. The two things are strictly contrary to each schools up to now.

other: the Son of God alone has assumed humanity; and: 88. but this will also go far: for if Christ has a true body, he has not only assumed it, but also the bread.

Now, praise be to God! Luther confesses that it is still natural nor personal agreement, and thus falls from the dry ohnfigürlichen words, and confesses that it is there a true body; and if it is thus in heaven, it is not on earth. For Synecdoche, that is, one may say: "This is the body" is the space, although it is not a body in itself, is a so much: "in which is the body"; or "under which", or "with [which] is the body of Christ. But who has read that the Scripture ever spoke thus? It does not say: The dove is the Holy Spirit, the fire is the angel, so that it, with the way of speaking, might be compared to our present words. 1) And D. M[artinus] also confesses this: That such real or formal unity is not found here in the Sacrament. If it is not found, they will not proclaim the words. Well then, he must produce a single example of his opinion to prove it, since we may have innumerable similar examples. But let it also be taught that the body of Christ is not "in," or "with," or "under the bread," in the sense commonly given.

Here one would like to warn me, however, and say: Drive nicely, and hear Luther's opinion thoroughly! Perhaps you will be of the same opinion if you do not agree with words at once.

First, Luther himself does not want the body of Christ in the sacrament to be circumscriptive, or localiter, that is, understandably, so that the place and the body therein rhyme with each other. Or circumscriptively, that he takes and gives according to his measure.

87. he also says at the sheet [or bow] s

where it is 4) bodily as one body, it will also have its space; and if one space is not more than one space, neither will the body be more than in one place, if it is otherwise a true body; and if it is thus in heaven, it is not on earth. For the space, although it is not a body in itself, is a remeasurement of the body in the body, or also of the other touching body, as, the wine in the jug may be added the remeasurement from the outside or the jug from the inside. Now this is such a quality that if a body did not have such respect, it would not be a true body. 5) And if God had the quality of a body, it would not be a true body. And if God took this property from a body, it would have to be a different creature than a body. For a body is not without its greatness, a greatness not without measure; and where the body is as a body, it has its greatness, whether in the subtlest or in the quickest way. For God created all things in number, measure and weight; the measure gives the physical things time, place, size.

From this I take: 6) although a body would be as subtle as the most subtle sun glass 7), nevertheless it has its measure, which will not be in many places, or one thing would have to be two. It has also here not one form, but with other qualities, that now and then the body is deadly, afterwards it is not deadly; that now it is not subtle nor flexible to the spirit, and afterwards it becomes so quick and flexible, and thus a spiritual body, which can penetrate all things. The fact that it is not clear now and becomes clear later does not take anything away from the truth of the body; it is still the true body. But to be a body without

1) So put by us instead of: "so that, it would like to be compared with the way of speaking, our present words".

If the body has no weight or measure in it, it will not be a true body. The fact that the body is without weight and conduct does not take anything away from the truth of the body, but that a body is without measure is not, as little as a white man is without whiteness.

Therefore also the bodies as bodies, where they are in a place, so they are not in a place like the angels or devils, have also another way to penetrate. The 1) Angels and devils must not be in a place, because they are not bodies, they may have been beings before the creation of the world as well as to this day. How much more is God not conceived in a place! But the bodies are not created with their quality. So also, where the bodies are as bodies, whether they are already not comprehended by us, thus follows that the lack in us; nevertheless they are there as comprehensible in themselves with their measure, their ubi and place touching.

91) Even if we say that Christ's body passed subtly through the stone or door, and therefore do not want to have it denied or denied, he still did not pass through the door like an angel or a devil, but as a body, which certainly had its measure, however small it may be thought to be. Nothing is pressed so tight and full, it may be firmer; if it is firmer, it still has something thin 3) or gap; if it has something thin, it may give space to subtle penetrating things. If now Luther wants to say that the body is in the bread and not bodily, then it is also not spiritually in it as a spirit; for it is not a spirit, neither 4) which has no flesh and leg; it follows then that it has its space.

Here I must also answer for the fact that Luther reproaches me for having said that there was another way that Christ entered through the closed door, but that he must have two bodies and that they were in one place. He mockingly asks how it happened, and whether the body in the bread might not also have subtlety.

Answer: However, 5) I would like to say: the text in the evangelist would not be able to; because it is badly written: "When the doors were closed because of fear of the Jews"; and it is not written: through the closed door. The little word by is not in the text; the one who gave his glass 6) to the disciples

He would also like to join them through the door and in other ways. But I have gladly praised the glory of the body of Christ, and have spoken like St. Augustine, who writes in the book de agone Christiano, Cap. 24, thus: "Let it not grieve us that it is written, how, when the doors were opened, Christ suddenly appeared to the disciples, that we should therefore deny that the body was human, because we see that he entered through the opened doors contrary to the nature of that body. All things are possible to God; for it is evident that he also walked on the water against the nature of the body, and not only did he, the Lord, walk before the suffering, but he also made Peter walk on it. For if before the suffering he might have made the body appear as the sun-glass, why not also after the suffering at a momentary time he might have made it subtle, so that it might have entered by a determined door?"

These are St. Augustine's words, which indicate the subtlety that does not take away the space of the body, and does not make two bodies in one place. Now such subtlety truly lets the body be one body, 7) and shows how it is spiritual, that is, subject to the spirit. But to be without a place, without a space in the world, does not indicate a true body, but rather to be a man without a soul.

95 But if he asks whether Christ did not also know the way into the bread, he must not answer. If he were in the bread, he would have his place and place in it, and not outside; so he would not be in two places. Therefore to speak, if one remains on the speech. If Christ is conceivable or circumscriptive in heaven, then he is not in the bread, which some also want to have for the sake of such a given likeness, because the corpse has passed through the stone and through the grave.

Secondly, Luther admits that the body of Christ is definite, that is, incomprehensible and without fence in the Sacrament. Answer: The way to be in a bodily thing is measured out to the spirits, 8) not to the bodies. He will also not like to teach it, as much as he always brings parables to it. The angels, if they are not corporeal, are not to be measured to any body, but they show their presence. For if they have not an infinite power, because they are creatures, they are not in all places at all times, nor are they in all places at all times.

7) "his" is used by us instead of: be.

8) Marginal gloss: [^]NMIU8 non in multis loois äsüntlivs.

not in many places, for they are sent out. Unless God commanded and made it in their nature. Therefore, if they are in heaven, that is, in the highest place, they are not also in the lowest. Not seeing that they see the face of the Father in heaven; for two places are not thereby assigned to them.

But that our bodies will penetrate the bodies, as well as the angels, has a much different form; for the bodies will then be obedient to the Spirit, and also all the bodily creatures to man, so that with men, for their benefit, they will be renewed, Rom. 8. Therefore it does not serve, indeed, would freely bring us a Marcionian and fantastic body, which we do not accept. Christian faith holds that we will be resurrected in the body, but in a spiritual one, not that the body will become a spirit. 1) Oh no! for otherwise Christ would have risen in vain; but that the body should obey the Spirit. Now, a body without a bodily dimension, what difference has it from a spirit? Therefore, it is not reason that prevents us from following Luther, but faith that we will be resurrected in a true body.

Here, when I think about the parables 2) that Luther has set, they do not want to coincide with those that teach experience in the natural arts. He says: Of the vision, as it moves through air, light or water and is, and neither takes space nor gives it. But experience 3) teaches us otherwise than that something goes out of our eyes to the visible thing, but the visible image, which manifolds itself until it comes to our face, by convenient means; and the visible image is also no body, because it has no dimension. Similarly, 4) when a sound travels through water, board, and wind, 5) it is much different, because it serves that there is one body in many places. The sound is not called a body, the breath also, and the moving air from the mouth does not reach so far, but diversifies until it touches, receives one air from the other; just as a stone, thrown into a well, makes a whirl, so there is also a diversity; of this I let the physicos speak. So much is said now that all parables are worthless. For if we were to understand the through-

If we were to compare the course of a glorified body with such inconsistent things, we would find no consolation. If we ever fathom the thing, neither in the essence, nor in the manner of the effect, is there found a fair likeness; if we do not see the things that are before us and are earthly, what might we say of the things that are far off and heavenly?

99. Thirdly, Luther says: "If Christ is God and man, and the two natures are one person, so that the same person cannot be separated, it follows that he is and may be repletive, that is, in a supernatural way, everywhere, and that everything is fully Christ through and through, also according to humanity; not circumscriptive in the previous way, but according to the supernatural divine way; and if you pointed out a place where God would be and not man, then the person would already be separated; for I with truth could say: Here is God, who is not nor became man: then the person would already be separated; for I with the truth could say: Here is God, who is not man nor became man. 7)

Answer: That two natures are one person, which are inseparable, the Christian faith holds. But this is not separated because human nature does not have the measure of divine nature, or because divine nature takes the measure of human nature, although both are measured out to the single person. So we say: Christ was mortal; and: Christ suffered; the measure of the Godhead is: to be present around and around, and in no place enclosed or encompassed; the measure of the body is: to be and to be comprehended in One place. The measure of the Godhead is: to make all things alive; the measure of the body is: to have its life from God; and although the body is not incomprehensible to us in all places, yet it is God's own body, the incomprehensible and present in all places; this does not divide the unity of the person in any way. The measure of God's attribute is also to be above time and motion, yet from Him is time and all motion; but the measure of the body is to be found under time and motion; and though He is not apart from time, yet He is assumed to be God's own body, the unchangeable, and from eternity; and therefore there is no separation; and because He is God's own body. Where Christ is spoken of, after he is only 9)

If the body is taken, it is not said that Christ is without a body. God, who has a body, works in hell, and yet is not included in it, so his body is not in it; for the place of the body is not there, although his divine power is really present. And does it not follow: Here is God, who is not man; for God is no less man, if he does not in such a supernatural way make the body permeate all things; and so the body in its measure has a stately place and is not comprehended. For this the supernatural way has to be in, with effect and presence in all places, 1) and in addition in none may be circumscribed with comprehensible way. But this is not at all in the measure of the body. If therefore I say, Christ is in the assembly of two or three, gathered together in his name, whether in the church, he is truly there; and if therefore he hath not left the body, which hath its place in heaven, he is undivided, and is indeed wholly there.

Luther says of me: I have written before that Christ is placed in heaven according to the Godhead, and on earth according to the body alone; and he adds: If Christ is One Person in the Godhead and humanity, then humanity must be on earth and in heaven at the same time; for to be One Person in God is more than in heaven. And further says: this is also not true that Christ was then in heaven; where was he after the Godhead, since he was in his mother's womb? Was he not personally and essentially also after the Godhead in the womb on earth?

102 Answer: My words might have been more faithfully applied, for I say thus: Then at that time she (the person I understand) alone was in heaven according to the Godhead, but the body was on earth. I did not deny that the Godhead was not also on earth, but that the body of Christ was not in heaven, which I also say, because it was on earth. This therefore takes nothing away from Christ, that he is inseparable in heaven and on earth, completely in heaven and completely on earth. And how did Luther mean that the Godhead was not in heaven? "Is not heaven the chair of GOD, and the earth his footstool?" Is not in heaven his chief activity? Does not Isaiah [Cap. 64, 1.] say, "Oh that thou wouldest break through the heavens"? In the acceptance of mankind, God descended, and yet did not leave His place. For he remained what he was. 2) That he also speaks:

3) Luther himself knows well that the kingdom of heaven is not always taken in one mind in Scripture. Where he does not admit Christ more than others, 4) who teach and live rightly and are in heaven, it is small, for the sake of the matter, that he says: He is in heaven. Why does he not say more than that he is a LORD of hosts and king of angels in heaven, but a good shepherd of Israel on earth? is one person.

In sum: God is called to be in heaven, since his primary work is shown; and that he descended from heaven, if he, regardless of all his divine power, thus deeply humbles himself and becomes man. But what is this consequence: It is much more to be agreed to be God than to be in heaven; therefore shall mankind be equal with God in heaven? Where I said: it is much more to be created in the image of God, than to receive no bodily food; therefore we are not allowed any bodily food: so I would be despised for such a consequence. For (as it is said), if Christ took mankind unto Himself, He did not take from it its measure; that it might be a true mankind, and that we might hold Him for our brother; to which also all faith urges. In whom Christ is given the name above all names, that he is God and man, and true God and man. Take away his omnipotence and supreme wisdom, and he is not true God. If you take away his limbs and his state, he is not a true man.

104) Item, if I have put to cheerful mind a likeness, which he rejects, and must be foolish to him. 5) Now it is not mine, but Augustini de agone christiano o. 25. says: "We should not hear those who deny, 6) that our Lord did not raise his body with him in heaven"; and thereby reports: "No one ascends in heaven, but he who descends from heaven; and say: the body did not descend from heaven, so it could not ascend. For they do not understand that the body could not have ascended into heaven, but the body did not ascend. But he was lifted up into heaven, when he that ascended lifted him up. And that I may give an example, if a man came down from the mountain, and when he came down, he clothed himself, and so clothed he went up again, would we ever say, No man ascends, but he that descended?"

and took no account of the garment which he takes up with him; but we took account of him that is clothed, and say that he ascended clothed. These are St. Augustine's words; but if I speak them in his opinion, it must be a fool's land. Although Luther says: God does not depart from heaven like this. But he should talame 1) well know what likeness would be right; but he brings quite inconsistent likenesses, all the way from images to bodily things, or from spiritual to bodily things; and from God's power he falls in, and thus should be unpunishable, and not allowed to answer for anything else?

Among all of these, Luther insists: "One should prove that God has no other way possible for One Body to be in two parts, and that He has a clear saying.

Answer: But if it is not similar to faith, to take away from the body of Christ the measure of a true body, to introduce it into the world without space and place. If, then, it is necessary to prove that it is not possible for God, then every heretic would like to have a misunderstanding of a sentence, so that he should be taught that it is not possible for God. We should look at the simplicity of faith, and judge accordingly, stay with it, follow no path of reason here, but know moderately. 3)

107) It should also be said that 4) St. Stephen saw Christ in one face. The evangelist says [Apost. 7, 55]: "Since he was full of the Holy Spirit", therefore a good indication of how he saw Christ. In the 6th chapter [v. 15] it says how those who were sitting in the council saw him; therefore it can be assumed that he could not have seen the visible heaven in the council house with them; therefore it also says afterwards: "and they rushed at him with one accord" [Apost. 7, 56]. It seems that "where" he had seen the face. This and other things to confirm our case are in the book de cognitione beatae vitae, without needing to go into detail here. Here it is said enough that the body of Christ is at once in one place, like a body circumspective. The other two ways do not address the body, therefore also the places of the Scriptures, so attracted by us, as that Christ has left the world, still stand stiff and unchanged.

108) A useless evasion is sought in Luke, since he says: "I said these things while I was still with you," and yet at the same time I was with them. As if Christ were with us, and not with us. And does not the evangelist say that at one time Christ was in two ways. For before he was with them visibly and passibly, but now, when he spoke, he was passively. Nor does it indicate that he was in two places at one time. This would perhaps have more credit, since he says: "Take note! I am with you until the end of the world" [Matth. 28, 20]; but I do not think that Luther would attribute this to bodily attendance. For Christ, who dwells with his church, is therefore separated from his body in heaven. Now let us continue!

109) Since Luther says in the previous letter against the enthusiasts in letter H [leaf] 2: 5) "Christ is there for you when he adds his word, and binds himself with it, and says, Here you shall find me, 2c. which he does in the Lord's Supper, and says, This is my body. Against this I have given the two sayings, that Matt. 24 [v. 23] says, that Christ is yet to be sought here or there; and the other, John 4 [v. 21], that the time is coming that he will be worshipped in this place or in other places. These sayings are presented by me in another form, as they are now already put on by Luther; they penetrate harder than one assumes them; because according to their legend, when the words are spoken, he binds himself with them, yes, so is the body under the bread. This should now be a certainty, as if God had decreed it. And when Luther does this, he now throws it wide open and says: "Who binds Christ in special places? Aren't the enthusiasts themselves the ones who put Christ in heaven in a special place and force us to say, "Here is Christ"? Note Luthern on the bolt. 6) We also confess that Christ is around and about, but that he has taken his body to heaven, and we do not give it a special place outside of Scripture. What then does he impose on us?

110) But 7) when Christ says: "here and there", he points to the places on earth, as the halls and deserts; 8) and against this he emphasizes how Christ will come from heaven, where we also point.

8) i.e. "chamber and desert" according to Matt. 24, 26. - "lifts" - holds, compares.

But Luther perhaps thinks that this text should not be understood from the future to the judgment. But now we will interpret according to faith: venturus est iudicare vivos et mortuos, "From then on he is to judge the living and the dead. What is wrong there? Certainly nothing. It does not mean "to bind"; we do not need that word either. And even if we instruct the simple and the children, 1) that they should worship God, and say: Our Father, who art in the heavens! even if they do not understand the spiritual heavens, we do not therefore bind God to a place, if we desire the heart of man to be lifted up, and tell them that they should call upon Him, and be joined to Him with their hearts, who created the heavens and the earth, so that they may lift up their minds over the heavens and the earth; this, of course, does not mean binding to a place.

He further challenges us, saying, "How do they themselves direct people to the gospel and to the neighbor? Is not the neighbor and the gospel in separate places on earth? Is not Christ in the believers?"

112) Answer: Yes, we know that the gospel is the power of God, and the believer is a temple of Christ; but we do not bind Christ with it, nor do we point to it as being in the place of his body, as [those] who put Christ's body there essentially. 2) We do not know that the gospel is the power of God, and the believer is a temple of Christ.

It seems that Luther admits us one thing when he says: "just as if we were saying that he is bodily or visibly in the sacrament".

Answer: Praise be to God! We know well that they do not say that he is visible in the sacrament; but they have left me under the delusion that he is bodily present in the sacramental bread, and is taken with the mouth; as he so rightly gives to Pope Nicolao. Now I accept this: If the body is not bodily present, then it is also not present except in a sign; where its body is, there it must also be bodily. Ah! that one would have spoken like this at the beginning and would have persisted in it! So is he; why do we torment one another, and hinder other people?

Luther teaches us how to understand in two ways 3) "here and there", that is, loco et more loci, that is, first essentially; that he is to be found essentially, and presently. We must allow them that. Secondly, needusualiter]; that is, that he keeps himself of the same place, as one who has citizenship in a place, and one who is otherwise there.

Answer: We know this well, and we also call God to honor "here and there", where He makes Himself known to us; but not "bindingly", that you should return to this or that place, but seek Him in heaven. And [it] does not want the place of Matthew [Cap. 24, 23. 26.] to indicate that the kingdom of God does not come with an outward gesture or visitation, as St. Lucas says in the 17th Cap. [v. 20, 21]; for he writes just at the 21st cap. [v. 8] also writes this saying, so that it may be known that he is speaking of a different future. Well then, if the body is held up in worship and not led up to heaven, then one misses the place and the custom of the place; one not only follows false prophets, but one also thinks that he has gone astray in elements 4).

The saying of John 4 [v. 21, 23] about worship is interpreted in the most inappropriate way by Luther, which I would never have thought. Now this is 5) my understanding, that Christ wants to say, that instead of the old law the law of the spirit should come. And we know that in the old law God chose special places where he wanted to be found. Now, however, he is again to be joined to this word and appointed in the sacrament, and to be sought in a special place here on earth, as you say; is it not judaized [judaizatum], and acted like the old law in worship? Certainly, if our hearts are now renewed in the truth by the Holy Spirit, we will undoubtedly know how to seek and find Him, yes, even without altars, images, elements, flesh, bread, wine, and without all creatures; nevertheless, has it ever been said of the worshippers even there. If GOD is humbled to find His body in one place: Ei! so [they] also lead to worship Him! Seeing no more than comparing new and old law, the interpretation of the saying becomes clear, and shall become even clearer in what follows, if God wills it!

118) We also have the saying of John 6: "Flesh is of no use," interpreted according to the instruction of faith; namely, that the flesh of Christ was not ordained by God to be eaten carnally, but rather spiritually through faith; so that we believe that God so loved the world that He did not spare His only begotten Son, but gave Him to death, so that if one believed in Him, life, which is enough here. Contradictory is it not, that the flesh of Christ is ordained to be eaten carnally, even with faith; and that it is not ordained to that end. 1) And because it is not ordained, it is not profitable therein. But whereunto it is ordained, the whole chapter sheweth us; and if the Scripture be explained according to all the circumstances of the proceeding and following, it ought to be deemed ohndienstlich to consult the true mind, as we have done?

But Luther splashes in, and 2) brings a rhyming gloss, as if the disciples were scolded for their lack of understanding, since he says: "Flesh is not useful" is spoken in such a way: Ah! coarse heads will not do it. One may well make a side argument, but this is the core and marrow of the whole interpretation. It says of "being of no use" (namely, to make alive), and also of "to make alive". So it may be understood from the word "to make alive" what kind of meaning there is.' The quality of bread is to make alive, which is the quality of God, who gives the true bread of heaven, and that we might eat it, he took the flesh to himself, and thus became our food when it was given to us. The common spirit or spiritual mind does not give life, but the Spirit of Christ gives life. If he would let it be a common rule, it would have a better form, and still nothing would be taken from the flesh of Christ. For though it be like unto the flesh of the first Adam before he sinned, yet is it not profitable to eat. That we have life is not because Christ is God and man, that is, because the living Spirit is in him, as he truly is, but because he is communicated to us. The communication takes place, as and when God wills, through the intercession of Christ and the paternal procession; but ordinarily and commonly through the Word and the means of writing. The reception of these sacraments 3) first of all shows that a person has attained life by faith in Christ, or that he will eat the bread without distinction.

120 Now I have explained the meaning of the words by a pretty simile Augustini, which disclaims

1) The text seems to be corrupted here. The sentence might have read something like this: "It is incontrovertible that it is not contrary to one another that the flesh of Christ is ordained to be eaten spiritually with faith, and that it is not ordained to be eaten carnally. And because," etc.

2) Marginal gloss:

Luther to me. I say no more about this, except that I ask that my likeness and his be read against each other with equal judgment; so let it be found as it may. It is not necessary to repeat them: He who has faith knows well that he obtains life from God through the Spirit who gives faith, and not from the carnal (as some say) supper; there is more thanksgiving for the graces obtained than for those not yet obtained, although God also often works miraculously at the same time through His Word.

(121) So then, the tropus which we have indicated is also according to Scripture, and is free in the text, and has no deficiency anywhere; it is clearer than others; it is around and around according to Scripture, allows the sacrament to remain sacrament, has for help the articles of faith, the sayings also, "that Christ has gone to heaven", and "the flesh is of no use". These all give us tremendous support, and refute all other interpretations; so now also the saying "this is my body" should and must be interpreted in such a way that we recognize that this bread is a sacrament of the body of Christ, given for us.

The third part. Rejection of several counterstatements.

If these pieces were understood correctly, there should not be much further response to the objection that Luther raises against us in the other part; for he does not want to understand us correctly anywhere, and he shields us from how we can accept their understanding, as if it were according to the words, and we should bring another, better text 2c. Now they themselves will not be able to stay on the words, and must accept a synecdoche; and where it is seen in the light, it is not against us. We also find their words, as "essential," "invisible," "under," "with," and "in the bread," of no account in the word of the Lord. If they once deviate from mere words to figurative speeches, it is not that one should blame God afterwards, if one does not want to measure the matter accurately. But these and others, which are spoken according to the flesh and the course of the world, I leave aside. The cause to doubt, where they themselves want to, shall be put away from them; and so that I do not answer in a way of dispute, I will put it in question one after the other.

The first question: How is it that all evangelists are so unanimous? where some tropus would be in this, would have admittedly some with a

4) "their" put by us instead of: their.

What is the meaning of the first letter, that another text might have been, as they do in other things, where one puts what the other omits? Answer: So 1) Lucas and Paul add: "which is given or broken for you"; and so of the cup, and the testament beforehand, so it is said, that they allow the synecdoche in many ways: how is it then that they lay the blame on the evangelists? that shall be found afterwards.

The other. If Christ had drunk the last drink before, as it is written in Marco and Luca, it follows that there will be no more bad bread and wine. Answer. We do not deny this: for sacramental bread is not bad bread, and the worthy partaking is, according to the old law, kept after Easter, even after the body's need, but in gratitude to the highest goodness, feasting on heavenly food. We do not ignore the works, as we are wrongly reproached.

125 Thirdly. Why did the Lord say, "I will drink no more of the fruit of the vine," and not say, "I will not drink of the wine"? Because it is to be understood that one should look for something higher, and without doubt the drink in the Lord's Supper does not come from the vine. If then it is not the fruit of the vine, it is certainly the blood of Christ. Answer. Christ has given leave with the whole speech 2) of this bodily need, and now calls to another meal; and the wine is nevertheless wine, as Luther himself confesses. But when one does sacrament, one is not with one another for the sake of bodily need. We are not interested in the grapevine, where only the heavenly drink is palatable to us in our hearts; therefore the wine must not be essentially blood, nor the blood bodily present in the bread, as some say.

126 Fourthly. Why else do both Lucas and Paul put before the cup this word: "the same also the cup after supper", or: "after they had eaten at night", because that he would now speak of another drink? Answer. As reported above, it is not against us, it does not help the adversaries.

127 Fifthly. If the evangelists are not against each other, and Lucas says: "This cup is the New Testament in my blood", he does not want to say differently than Matthew and Marcus, that this is his blood; one should not understand it so roughly, as if the cup was in the blood.

Like a peasant in boots. Answer. Certainly the evangelists are one; but because St. Lucas, as Luther himself says, writes more neatly than the others, even more accurately: so one takes the clear understanding from Lucas more cheaply; and is not to be understood as if the cup stood in the wine like a peasant in boots. But neither is it to be understood as if the wine were essentially blood, and the cup were therefore the New Testament, that the blood of Christ was in it. It is too far-fetched to conclude that the cup is the blood of the New Testament and the New Testament is in the blood.

128 To the sixth. Lucas speaks of the blood of which Matthew and Marcus speak; and according to Oecolampad, body and blood are signs in the Lord's Supper, and are called body-signs and blood-signs; so in Lucas, blood must also be called blood-signs, and Lucas' text must therefore be held according to Oecolampad's opinion: This cup is a new testament in my blood-sign, namely in the bad wine. Thus the new testament becomes no more than a drink of wine; or a drink of wine is so strong that it makes this cup a new testament. Response. It is true that Lucas and other evangelists speak of the same blood, namely the true blood of Christ; but I do not say that body and blood are signs: but bread and wine, although, because it is a figurative speech, the tropus and the interpretation falls on the word "blood" in Matthew and Mark, as is said above. And Luther does not want to notice the logic. Whether one says that Christ is a son of Mary; one does not want to say that Mary is a son, but Christ. Also when I say: The wine is a sign of the blood, I do not want to say: The blood is a sign; but this is added to the wine, that it is a sign. Therefore, my interpretation will remain the same with Luke: The cup is a sign of the new testament in the true blood of Christ, and the other consequences and misfortunes are all of no concern to me.

129 To the seventh. If Oecolampad does not want to put the tropus on the blood, but on the new testament, why does he not make it all a sign and a vain tropos and thus says: This sign of the cup is a sign of the new testament, in the sign of my blood? Who gives cause why one word, and not the other also, takes the tropus? Answer. If one speaks of signs, one should not make a sign out of the signs, and thus speak of the sign, so that it is recognized as a sign. So

Nor shall I say here, a sign of the cup; for then the cup would not be the sign, but the sign. And if I say, The cup is a sign of the new testament; then the cup is the sign, and not the testament nor the blood, and they are not the less in their natural nature.

130 To the eighth. Why does Oecolampad not do the same in Matthew and Mark? Turn where you will; if blood is a tropus in Matthew and Mark, it is also in Luke; and if it is not in Luke, it is also not in Matthew and Mark. Response. Yes, it is so. I ever confess that in all the evangelists the blood is the true blood of Christ, and also the body; but in one place the tropus reaches the word "blood," in the other it does not. I could give many such examples. I say, "Christ is a Son of Mary." There the little word "son" stands on "Mary", and is otherwise attached to Christ. In another speech: "Christ is a son of the heavenly Father, who chose Mariam, Christo to be a mother." See, there the word "Son" does not reach "Mariam". Item, one says: "the seed rst a figure of the Word of God," or: "the seed is a figure of the preaching of the Word of God." There it is well to see that neither the word of God nor the preaching are the figure, but the seed. And the little word "figure" 1) refers to the "word" in one place, and not in the other.

131. to the ninth. So Oecolampad says: "This cup is a sign of the new testament in my blood; confesses [that] Christ's right blood is in the cup, and creates no more, than that this cup is a sign of the new testament: so it would be no more, because: the cup is with Christ's blood a figure of the new testament; and therefore Christ's blood must not give a right new testament, and be no better than the paschal lamb." Response. I do not therefore confess that the blood is in the cup; but that by the blood the new testament is sealed, and is signified in this. Therefore the consequences and consequent are useless; for I do not pass 2) the antecedens or first speech. But if the blood were so, and the Scriptures were able, without doubt this and other things might follow. But Paul to the Hebrews clearly indicates what the blood sealed the testament.

132. to the tenth. Where is any example that the New Testament should be a tropus? Answer. It does not need to be; for I but do not say that it is a tropus, although the word "sign" falls on it. 3) The wine is accepted as a sign, therefore we call it a sacrament. But testament stands here in its value; it is signified by the sign. Therefore, one may still speak of the new testament, and it still remains the gospel; it does not need the care of all, and neither blood nor testament will here be figurative for itself; although the word testament serves another, and carries the tropum on it.

133 Eleventh. One may point to the cup and say, "this is the New Testament," that is, Christ's blood; just as the bodily flame of fire is a spiritual thing, that is, the angel, and the dove is called the Holy Spirit. Therefore, whoever drinks of this cup truly drinks the true blood of Christ and the forgiveness of sins, or the Spirit of Christ, which are received in and with the cup; and will not receive here a living figure or sign of the New Testament, for that was due to the Jews in the Old Law. Response. That 4) I have confessed in my first writing out, that I like to understand, "this is my body," as the dove is said to be the Holy Ghost. For it was not essentially the Spirit, but a creature created, that it should mean that the Holy Spirit dwelt in Christ; for thus also this bread signifies to us the true body of Christ. Now he who saw the dove did not see the Holy Spirit, but by a figurative speech, because it signifies the Holy Spirit, because the sign and the signified are understood together. Such speech is called synecdoche, I call it sacramental in the place, and I would not like to have it cut off. It is also not the first chip in it. Therefore, it does not follow that the blood of Christ, the forgiveness of sins, is drunk from it, only as far as it signifies; and therefore it does not have to be bodily present or bodily received, as will follow from the interpretation of the blood.

134. to the twelfth. "Where already Oecolampad gladly sought a remedy and placed the text thus: This cup is a sign of the new testament in my blood; that not the blood should belong to the cup, but to the testament, on this opinion: The new testament is in the blood of Christ, and exists through it; and not thus, that the cup is a sign and figure through the blood of Christ, thus: This cup is a sign of the new testament; but the New Testament is in the blood of Christ. Where he thus says, he well knows that such a text cannot be here; for a Greek article should be here, but it is not there, but the text hangs together as if it were one inseparable word." Response. So Luther knows well that I put it thus, as he says; what has he frightened us so long? 1) Yes, it is not to be called a makeshift, but the quite full interpretation, and is therefore not needh of a new Greek article. 2) There is a word that goes with it, namely the little word "new"; for if it is a testament, and that is renewed, not with the blood of oxen, but with the blood of Christ. Erasmus interprets it in this way, although he otherwise does not agree with me on this and several other points. Namely, he says in annotationibus super Lucam: "As the Old Testament is confirmed and consecrated, since the people were sprinkled with the blood of oxen; so Christ by his blood has sanctified the New Testament for us, which the epistle gives to the Hebrews. Now he has enough understanding of the Greek language, and has seen that this article is not needed. Such speech, who would search there, he would find much; as, Marci at the 9th chapter: "until they see the kingdom of God come to be in power", εως αν ιδωσι την βασιλειαν του &εοϋ &ληλυ&υϊαν ιν δυνάμει. It also says not την &ληλυ&υϊαν or την έν δυνάμει. Around here If it is completely a forgiven counterproposal, and if there is nevertheless the arrest, then he wants to direct it with omission of an article, and misses there as well as in other pieces.

135. to the thirteenth. Lucas with One Word beats the gushers all to heaps. Response. Yes, with 3) one word he certainly gives to understand that a tropus is to be assumed in the speech. For one may not deny that the testament is confirmed by death only in the death of the testator, and the highest priest goes with the blood into the sanctuary. Therefore here is not the confirmation of the testament; but at the cross, there is the forgiveness of sin. Here is the proclamation, in faith is the acceptance, the bestowal of the merit is of the Spirit of Christ. Now here is the preaching of the testament, this cup and the supper, and the covenant is not set in it; so it follows that the cup is a sign of the covenant or testament, and is not the testament itself. Yes, whoever wants to go worthily to the sacrament, shall have already the faith that his sins are forgiven, and thus give thanks to the congregation with the sacrament. And so then, as it stands here with the testament, why does one object in the other similar places? and now also say like Luther: "As the cup is a sign of the testament, so also is the bread a sign of the body, and the wine a sign of the blood." For the evangelists must read the same.

136 To the fourteenth. What good would it do if their text could stand? With the sign and interpretation, they may not indicate a title of sameness. Answer. The parable of breaking and pouring is sufficiently indicated above, and if not, Luther gives it to us now.

137 To the fifteenth. May the pouring out in the evangelists and the breaking in Paul not give the same meaning, serving the body of Christ; but rather they find said about the administration of the sacrament. Answer: If one may see clearly 4) how Luther writhes, and how he would like to, where he only wants to; so one sees it there. Above he rejects the likeness where the blood is poured out; and here it is so clear that he cannot deny it; and if the shedding of the blood goes to him, the breaking goes to the body, although he wants the breaking of the body and the shedding of the blood over the table, which is much clearer on the cross. But here he can freely admit the synecdoche in public, and yet it is an eternal cry that the words are to be acted without all figure. Well then! Praise be to God! Here he confesses that because of sacramental unity (which is also of two things, if not bodily with each other) that may be said of one which is done in the other. Why then did he mock my rule above, that one should and may speak of sacraments sacramentally? So he says: "Because cup and blood and new testament are one sacramental being, for the sake of such unity the cup is poured out, but only the blood is poured out per synecdoche; and this is right and enough answered." But why should this not also apply to us when the bread is broken and distributed, the wine poured out and presented? Why not also, for the sake of sacramental unity, may their signs be added, whether they are not yet poured out and broken, but by the signs it be known that they are once broken and poured out for our benefit? And I do not see that we have any disadvantage, whether already the breaking of the bread and the giving of the wine in the supper; because their likeness will be attained at the cross of Christ.

The words here are meant to serve this purpose. It is clearly stated, for the great comfort of the faithful, "who was given for you," that is, for your salvation, for your life. And it is a wonder that Luther 1) desires to put such a comforting saying there, as if it were much more than for your eyes, when Marcus and Matthew also say: "for you and for much"; admittedly before their eyes such did not happen. How then will such things turn out? Against Carlstadt, it might well be that Christ sat there with the body that was given for us; and it is still fitting that Christ in heaven, who died for us. Now he would like "to be given for us, and to be poured out to atone for our sins" to belong only to the supper; would to God that he would consider the sacraments properly for once!

138. to the sixteenth. But how, if the word "my" is placed after the word "that" in St. Paul, and not after the word "body"; for he says from word to word: 2) "This is my body"?

Response. This changes nothing at all in the mind. It does as much; 3) nor do I find any reason why it should serve to strengthen their opinion, since the word "my" would follow it, as in other evangelists. But this is the difference of the obliquus ἐμοῦ, retaining its accent, which is reckoned against another, which in other evangelists is not thus clearly held forth; so the opinion is that this bread is the sign of my body, and of no other. It is I who truly redeem you, and no other, therefore I also die for you, and even with my body itself. For at one time [i.e. in ancient times] there was a night feast, where it was signified and proclaimed by the paschal lamb, how the blood of the paschal lamb had protected the children of Israel from death, and it might also be said sacramentally in truth: This is the lamb that redeemed the children of Israel. But if Christ now gives this leave, he wills that one now wait for higher good from him. For notice, if the eaten paschal lamb did not have power in him to redeem those who follow; for they would be redeemed: so also our sins are already forgiven us through the suffering of Christ. But in order that no one should take offense at the great letter "my, mine", he should take another example against it. If God pointed to the seed of the field, as he did here to the bread, and said, "This is the seed of the field.

is just my word; therefore the word would not be present among the seed or in the seed. But we would like to make a distinction between the word of Moses and the law, or the Pharisees, which may also be signified by a seed. But this seed is my word, means my word, and no other. And yet this is not detrimental to sacramental unity.

139) The seventeenth. Scripture does not suffer Christ's death to be signified by the breaking of bread; 4) therefore it is not a likeness; and though the bread has a likeness to that on the cross, yet it has no likeness to the body as in the supper.

Answer. The body is not so present in the evening meal that it must be distributed with the bread. It is enough for the sacramental distribution that the heavenly Father assigns to his elect the merit of Christ's suffering; and that the faithful recognize through the sacrament that such merit has been set before them and has already been imparted to them, for which reason they also give thanks. Luther and every orthodox believer should take pleasure in this.

140 To the eighteenth. St. Paul puts the word "is" after "blood," and says: "This cup, the new testament, is in my blood." This, then, is to be understood: This cup, being a new testament, is the same in Christ's blood.

Answer. We have been asked in what the likeness is, that the cup of blood and a testament is sacramental. We have indicated that the blood on the cross is hoped for us. This sufficient indication is also here, if the cup is called a new testament, precisely in that Christ's blood is poured out. For thus in his blood, and in no other, was it established, and the "is" truly serves on the little word "new," as said above in St. Lucas; wherefore also in Matthew and Marco it is called the blood of the testament; not the testament, which would be established there in the first place, but it is ordained that we might be redeemed by it on the cross.

141. on the nineteenth. It has never been read that "will" should mean "a sign of the will".

Answer. This is sufficiently answered before that we let "testament" remain testament. But bread and wine are signs.

142 To the twentieth. Because one calls the cup, the wine is understood by it, and one makes a new unity, if they are nevertheless two different natures; so one would also let cheaply be called the wine.

The cup is called a testament because it is not only a cup, but also a sacramental being with the testament and blood of Christ.

Answer. Sacramental unity 1) we have never punished; but if we want to remain in it, we must be the most fearful the world has ever borne. But that we should take the signs for what they signify would be a pitiful servitude to our souls. By the grace of God, we are well aware of how we should keep our minds free in this. We see and perceive outward things, but remember ourselves that we recognize 2) the inward and invisible things, that is, the things that are signified, as sacramental unity requires; and no one has ever heard of us otherwise.

143. to the twenty-first. How might bad wine interpret such great things, as it could hardly denote all the figures of the Old Testament?

Answer. But this is still more wonderful, that a word of two, three, or four letters, as, On [xx], God, or Adonai, should signify and signify to us him whom all men's and angels' tongues cannot utter; and in him the likeness has none, but such alone is ordained for it. Now the wine is ordained for this, and a very good likeness, by which divine grace is commanded us, of which above said sufficiently.

144. twenty-second. It is a miraculous sign that Christ's body and blood are in the sacrament, and it is not visibly there; but it is enough for us that we feel it by word and faith.

Answer. 3) Our opponents say that there are many great miraculous signs. But St. Augustine, who has read and considered the evangelists and the words "this is my body" no less than they, contradicts them. For he makes a clear distinction: "For there is a great difference between the deeds of angels and those of men. The deeds of angels we are to wonder at and understand; but the deeds of men we alone are to understand"; and he speaks there of the sacraments; read him, whoever will, on the third de Trinitate, oap. 10 Some years ago he gave me cause to ponder this further. How then do they say that it should be felt with faith alone? But with what faith they feel such things, true believers know well how to distinguish. On such faith Christ has did not build his church. But this is the useful faith that Christ died, as such is signified and proclaimed in the Sacrament.

145 The twenty-third. Even though your sign is not visible, even though you see the cup, you do not see that it is a sign of the blood of Christ, but you must speak it with words and believe it in your hearts, because it is not painted on the cup. Why is it also not believed that the miraculous signs take place with the body of Christ? So, I think, they want to talk to us.

Answer. The cup and the bread are painted by the Word of Good, first of all, if they have the quality of the Word in themselves. But now that his body is without place [sine mansions local], or in many places, and especially 4) visible and invisible: how can it be believed without God's word? But the words "this is my body" do not bring such things with them, and yet the sacrament, as far as it concerns outward admonition, is no less powerful if it does not have the concept as if it had it. The dove, meaning the Holy Spirit, the flame of fire in which the angel appeared, were without doubt outwardly miraculous works, even visible; Christ was also born miraculously. Now these things are signs of some invisible natures. But here it is not necessary to be something outwardly miraculous, for bread is natural through the Word; when it becomes significant, it has already become a sacrament. It is very different from the signs prepared by angels. "Angelic deeds have wonder, because they are unknown to us; but here," says St. Augustine, "things are known to us, and therefore without wonder; but the things which some pretend to us were less known than angelic things."

146. Twenty-fourth. Who can deny that in the Lord's Supper there is forgiveness of sin, since the New Testament is there, and not the sign of the New Testament, as Lucas and Paul say?

Answer: 5) The New Testament is accomplished on the cross. We have this covenant where we believe; it is not denied that there is forgiveness of sin outside the sacraments. Therefore it is not denied badly there. But that the cup is a sign of the testament, and not the testament itself, I take from the fact that it was once assured and fulfilled on the cross. But that it is given through the word, that is,

I take care that no sane person contradicts it. And likewise, if one accepts with faith the proclamation of how Christ has done enough for us on the cross, who would deny that there is forgiveness of sin? But this we could not and may not ascribe to any element as working or bestowing. Oh no! for it belongs to God alone. But it is attributed to them as proclaiming. Otherwise the sacraments would be more powerful than the saints of God themselves, to whom such is not bestowed.

147 The twenty-fifth. Whosoever shall confess that he hath the signs of the new testament, confesseth that he hath not the new testament; he also hath denied Christ: for Christians shall have the new testament in them without figure or sign.

Answer. The Christian signs and ceremonies differ from the ceremonies of the old: the ceremonies of the old law meant that salvation was to come; but ours mean that it has already come. Therefore we may say with truth: Which Christian receives worthily the signs of the new testament, who testifies that he has the new testament, and that Christ has forgiven him his sin. But if in the reception of the sacraments we would receive the forgiveness of sins more than we would give thanks that they are forgiven us, it would be evident that we do not have the new testament, nor the forgiveness of sins.

148. To the twenty-sixth. Without the words, the cup would be nothing; without the bread and cup, the body of Christ would not be there; without the body and blood of Christ, the New Testament would not be there; without the New Testament, forgiveness of sin would not be there. Behold, all these things are 1) sufficient for us in the words of the Lord's Supper, and we grasp it with faith.

Answer. We understand well the heaped sylogismum 2); if we break it down, we find good sense. It is true that words make the bread and the cup signs of the body and blood of Christ; but words alone have in their power that they proclaim and signify; this they now give to the sacraments also, and no more than they have. But further, that they have given the presence of the body and blood to them, is not proved. Then sylogism goes off the track, and becomes brittle; for the blood of Christ truly gives the new testament, and for ever pardon of sins and life; but the outward words do not give it, but they proclaim it. Therefore conclude

1) In the original: reichet.

They have it in them no other way than that they show such great grace. The sacraments also do this; the faith that grasps such a gift, even as in the outward admonition the inward master instructs. And therefore, when we consider what is in the power of the words, we find how much is given to the sacraments, and will be more for us than against us.

149. twenty-seventh. May not the body in the bread be understood as Paul says: "As often as you eat the bread", as one understands by the cup the wine in the cup, as Paul says: "As often as you drink the cup"?

Answer. It was said before about the content; I gladly allow that this bread introduces us to the contemplation of that which is signified by it, and according to sacramental unity, which is there in meaning. But one looks for a reverse way. One does not drink cups, but wine from cups. Again, it is in sacraments: Bread is eaten; but this, if the bread contains sacramental meaning, is not eaten bodily at all, but is grasped with faith. Therefore they are quite different synecdochae, continens pro contento, and contentum pro continente. Rather, as Paul says so beautifully, we should consider how we are to know that which is sacramentally apprehended in the bread, namely, when he says, "proclaim the death of the Lord!" which proclamation flows from faith and gratitude; and this is the content of the sacraments, that through them one proclaims how grace is communicated to us. Paul put the sign and the signified together so that the interpretation would be clearer; but here Luther may well jump, however verbose he otherwise is.

150. to the twenty-eighth St. Paul does not say: if you drink of the sign of the body and blood. Response. He says it, because the bread and the cup are the signs, although he does not express it in words. And that he would have them for this, he adds, "Proclaim the death of the Lord."

151. twenty-ninth. If it should not apply to us, if we say: St. Paul does not say: As often as you eat of the sign of the body; because ex puris negativis nihil sequitur: then you also have no reason, if you say: Paul calls this bread, and not the body of Christ, therefore it is bread alone. 3) Answer. We want to have from the words that it is true bread; and for what it is to be used, we show from the following and preceding words, which naturally explain the matter. And is nothing from negativis; although Luther knows well, if a thing is not in the

3) Marginal gloss: I'uous a neMti vis.

Scripture says that one may well argue a negaUvig. We are not to know more than God has given us to understand through His Word.

152. to the thirtieth. The words "this" and "this" are certain pointers that one should go back to the previous words, so it will be just as much: He that eateth of this body, and drinketh of this blood. Answer. Yes, the words are certain pointers that it is no longer a common bread, but the bread of the Lord, yes, the sacramental bread, which means the body for us; this is what the little words mean. Yes, where Luther had his mind, it would certainly have his opinion. But we have also seen the text, and our interpretation is in accordance with faith. Therefore he does not judge anything by the large letters; and indeed, since the natural interpretation is given here, we are right to consider how he understands each one, and now our interpretation is not ours, but Paul's own, where it is considered otherwise.

153 Thirty-first. Why does not St. Paul say: He is guilty of the bread or of the sign of the body of Christ who eats this bread unworthily? The text forces that this sin is the unworthy eating; and yet they pretend that it is vain bread which they eat; so he must be guilty of that which he eats. Answer. If the bread is a sign of the body of Christ, then he is guilty of the body who does not eat the sign. One would not sin against bread if it were not a sacrament of the body of Christ, because they have been drawn into one sacramental union; not that they are therefore with one another, but that here is the image of the body in the bread; although Luther denied this, it is nevertheless well established. Therefore Paul knows well how to distinguish between bread and body, he also knows how to reconcile them and put them together. He does not say "eat the body. For no one may eat the body unworthily, but unfortunately many eat the sacrament and sign of the body unworthily. But if the bread is not a sign of the true body of Christ, but of the spiritual body, then one is not guilty of the true body of Christ, but of that of which this bread is a sacrament. Now it is proved that the bread and the wine are signs of the body of Christ, and that with certain proofs; and not only is this proved, but also the counteropinion is rejected, and that mightily.

154. to the thirty-second. So Oecolampad hie in this place lets body be called the true right body, so they must also in the text of the Lord's Supper not be a tropus. Response. As here the True body is meant to us, therefore also in the text of the supper, although the tropus of the word "bread" falls on the word "body", but this takes nothing away from the true body. Therefore one cannot make me his such conclusion]; He who dishonors the bread dishonors the sign of the body, that is, the bread; but both such^: He who dishonors the sign of the body, that is, the bread, dishonors the body. Much less will follow the contradictoria and other inconvenientia that Luther heaps.

155. thirty-third. St. Paul does not say, "Whoever eats this bread unworthily is guilty of Christ, as he is guilty of the king who mocks the king's image;" but St. Paul says, "That the guilt may be done in the pieces of Christ, to which the bread and wine should be like or a sign. Thus Oecolampad's similitude will be thus: He who dishonors the nose of the king's image dishonors the king's nose. Answer: 1) If those who crucified Christ in the flesh, as guilty of his body and blood, have sinned against the whole of Christ, it is not wrong to say that those who eat the bread unworthily sin in Christ. For those who reject the supreme goodness of the body and blood of Christ, and hold themselves against the bread as if it were common bread, and do not pass from the visible to the invisible things, must ever despise Christ. What honor has the king's nose against the image? It is more apparent that it is an image of a king than that it has such and such a nose. In the sacrament, however, the body and blood have also earned much against us, hence the interpretation.

156 To the thirty-fourth. Who will believe that to distinguish Christ's body is nothing, but to distinguish Christ Himself in His signs? Answer. I do not say that the body of Christ here is anything different from the true body; and I say in answer to the opinion: 2) He does not distinguish Christ's body who does not think more of Christ, who suffered for him, than of another man. And we say that if an unrecognized Heinz or Kunz dies, it is not the less or the more; but the death of the body of Christ should be so highly esteemed, that we should also hold in the highest esteem everything that belongs to Christ.

and fed his poor, performed his ceremonies with due fear of God. But if we do not love our neighbor, who is redeemed by the blood of Christ, the ceremonies are not in true thanksgiving. If we do not need faith and love toward our neighbor, there is certainly no distinction of the body of Christ, and without doubt one eats and drinks the judgment, because one may show that Christ has suffered for him, and one also wants to be grateful for the suffering of Christ; but one receives the sacraments not the less in contempt of the neighbor. Thus the Corinthians did not distinguish the sacrament, not in whether blood and flesh were essentially present, for St. Paul did not punish them for this. But if this had been their sin, Paul would not have left it undisclosed, in which they did not examine themselves and distinguish the body. The true test is that we believe that Christ has taken away our sin by the shedding of his blood, and so redeems us. But we invent in ourselves a thankful spirit, so that we not only are not ashamed to confess it, but are also ready to serve our neighbor and consider him a brother. But to believe that the body of Christ is bodily present in the bread is contrary to the likeness of faith. Christ did not put anything on the same faith, but on the faith that he has redeemed us and is the Son of God.

157 To the thirty-fifth. St. Paul alternates finely, one thing after another; now he calls it bread and a cup, and then body and blood; and then again bread and a cup, and then again body and blood; so that he may make us certain that this sacrament is not just bread and wine. Answer: Of course, there is a nice variation here, and it is easy to see how Paul speaks with such great modesty, so that he does not lead anyone astray. He gives the outward things to bread and wine, as eating and drinking, and leads us on with them, so that we do not forget the good deeds of Christ, which they mean, as: proclaiming death, not debasing it, appearing with ingratitude; examining ourselves beforehand, what confidence we have in Christ and our neighbor, and what higher things we think of the true body of Christ. And do not serve a little bit for the consecration, as one pretends; but around and around the worthiness of the sacrament is diligently commanded to us.

158. to the thirty-sixth. Where in the words, "The bread which we break, is it not the communion of the body of Christ?" there would be figurative speech, according to Oecolampad's opinion.

the] text: The bread that we break is a communion of bread, which is a sign of the body of Christ; and would be so much: bread is a communion of bread. Answer: 1) Not so! O Luther! nowhere do you want to understand me rightly; for I leave the true body of Christ in the four sayings; although the little word "figure" falls on it in the interpretation, therefore this does not follow it. Likewise, as you show me, I also do not say that there is a figurative fellowship; but the breaking of bread bears 2) a figure on it, as the cup bears a figure of the testament; and would not have to speak thus, if the trope were to exist. Enough has been said about this to the intelligent. And this is the opinion: the very breaking of bread signifies to us how we have a true fellowship in the one common true body of Christ, who was given to us in common and shared with us all by divine grace, if he died for our sake. Therefore we are also an hereditary people of Christ; and none of the things that Luther pretends follow.

159 To the thirty-seventh. So the breaking of bread is a fellowship in which the wicked also have a part, and not only the good; for Judas also was in the supper (now the wicked may not have a spiritual fellowship, but they must have a bodily one): 4) then they must have a part in the body, which is distributed to them in the breaking of bread; for if it is distributed to them, it is also there. Answer: Yes, the breaking of bread is a sign of communion, not communion itself. How? if poor people bear a sign of the cross, that alms should be given to them as the needy, it is said: bearing the sign of the cross is not a fellowship of alms? and is the bearing not the fellowship for itself, but means that those who bear it 5) have a society and fellowship of alms. The sign should be accepted only by the needy, and not by the unworthy. Now at times among the multitude of not the least unworthy run, they also bear the sign, and when they come to the beggar, he tells them: Is not the sign of the cross a fellowship of almsgiving? and then punishes those who so insolently may bear the sign of the fellowship to which they do not belong. So Paul punishes even then the false ones who received the sacraments, as if they also had fellowship in the true body of Christ; that through faith they had obtained forgiveness of sin and grace in his death, and thus had Christ as their own.

160 This fellowship is truly for the good alone. John describes such fellowship in the first epistle, saying, "Let our fellowship be with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ;" and then, "If we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship among us, and his blood purifies us from all sin. There he indicates how we have fellowship. But of others he says: "They went out from us, but they were not of us"; they walk among us, and bear the signs, and also want to be believers, but they are true Judas. They received the sacraments, but the body in no way, neither spiritually, nor bodily; although they sin in [the] true body of Christ, whose sacrament they act with such unbelief and ingratitude in such unmercifulness. In this also the Corinthians might well be punished for their discord, and yet still have fellowship with the Gentiles. Dear, could not the societies have a sign among themselves, so that in one or the other they have true fellowship? unless their true bodily [being (?)] is in the sign of fellowship. Therefore it is a bodily fellowship, which has Christ and Christ's body as its own, beforehand, as he gave it in the cross. But do not therefore need the presence of the body of Christ bodily in the bread; for to speak of it sacramentally would not be against me. For the sake of signs and names the wicked are also called for a time, [that they] are in the kingdom of heaven, as also many evangelical parables and examples indicate.

Now the following words of Paul explain our matter sufficiently. He, Paul, says: "Look at Israel according to the flesh! Are not all those who eat the sacrifices a fellowship of the altar?" [1 Cor. 10, 18.] That is, a sign that they commonly have righteousness with one another to the altar in sacrifices and serve the altar, belong to priests and God's people. Neither should anyone mingle with them, for as they carried righteousness to the altar. 1) But if a hidden Gentile had eaten with the Jews, he would have been respected, he would have had fellowship, but he had none. So also the false Christians are respected, they have well fellowship in the blood, in the testament, in pardon.

1) i.e. had a right to the altar.

of sin outwardly; but they are nothing but pure glorifiers. 2) If then Luther would have it that the ungodly may also receive the true body, because it says, "This is my body," let us prove by the same consequence that they also have the new testament, and thus the unworthy and ungodly would have their sins forgiven if they received the sacraments. Yes, if you say, They are unbelievers, therefore it is not a new testament to them; let it also be said, They are unbelievers, therefore the bread is not the body to them; so it would be found that the consequence in the word is nothing at all.

162. thirty-eighth. If one wanted to speak of spiritual communion, it would not be necessary to call the two pieces the body and blood of Christ, but it would be enough to call them Christ. Why should he speak so differently of the body and the blood, and put two communions together, as two different communions, since neither is the other? And if the spiritual communion is not more than one, then the communion of the body of Christ is not the communion of the blood of Christ; again.

Answer: We, who are bodily, are a bodily company, having spiritual fellowship in spiritual goods. We are assured of this through the body and blood of Christ in his passion; and therefore, if we have received spiritual goods through the body and blood, the signs of the body and blood are convenient signs of such fellowship; and though Christ has instituted more signs than baptism, yet it would be no more than one fellowship. For in baptism it is also signified that we are purchased by the blood of Christ; and those who are baptized are already with us in fellowship, and alone is the fellowship thereafter accepted in other signs anew. Luther could well see that the devil's fellowship and the fellowship of the devil's table are one thing: he should also be able to recognize that one fellowship is the fellowship with Christ and the fellowship of the Lord's table, which holds in it both bread and wine, that is, signs of the body and blood, and proclaims that both good deeds are bestowed upon us. And is not the devil therefore definitely appointed to be at the table. What do you want to enforce here?

Now, praise be to God, we have seen Luther's reasons, and the longer we look at them, the more flawed they are; but he has not caught us untruthfully in one piece. But how he

A healthy heart can see well for itself. He does not want to allow a trope, and yet he allows it, because he does not like the synecdoche, but how he presents it does not want to be in accordance with the faith. If, however, he wants to speak of sacramental unity in a Christian way and has a desire for peace, there is no need at all for this quibbling; for thus we would soon become one in truth. The mere words are by no means worth the struggle, if one has attained the truth; may God, the gracious Father, from day to day, in this and all other things, abundantly impart and increase them to us, so that we may have full knowledge of Christ! Amen, Anno MDXXVIII.

The second part of Zwingli's answer.

387 Now that you, pious princes, have considered Oecolampadi's answer, which would truly be sufficient for every quiet, chaste, true Christian, who should not look at the many, but at the power of the words, I again humbly ask you to hear the remaining two parts with the same seriousness.

388. As in our first part Luther's contested comments, of which he would have done well to omit the major part, have been answered (indeed also with more words and action, neither of which we would like to have done- but have ever had to run the colored reasons over the face with a wet sponge, so that the ruddy beauty would be accepted, and the rather weak color would be seen, so that no one would take the sick opinion to marriage under the appearance of the healthy one), 1) so it is now up to us to present our opinion and understanding of the words of the Lord's Supper.

389. We thus point out, as often before, that the one faith and trust in God first forces us to notice that we should not understand the words of the supper bodily. For faith, which is trust in the only God, is the only rest of the soul, the certainty and firmness by which we see that there is no good, no truth, no righteousness, neither the only highest good, God; that there is nothing at all certain in which one can exist unconfidently, neither He; that the soul finds rest in no creature, but only in the Creator. If then the substance and essence of faith is such light, certainty and rest, and if faith does not come from any creature but from the one Holy Spirit, the Creator and Life of all things, then it is certain that our faith (I mean the right, essential, true, living faith, since man is the Creator of all things) is the only faith that is true.

1) These brackets are set by us.

knows that he is a child of God) does not come from any creature, does not consist in any mere creature, is in none undoubtedly calm and sure, is strengthened with no creature if he is weak; for even the miraculous signs may not make the right spiritual faith, but the spiritual faith makes one recognize the miraculous signs to be God's work; or else the children of Israel would have been supremely faithful in the desert and at the daily miraculous signs of Christ.

390 All of which is clearly learned from Paul Rom. 8, 24. and Hebr. 11, 1. where he says in one place: "With hope we are healed, but the hope that is seen is not a hope." By "see" he means to have everything bodily, and wants to say that the only hope and trust is the salvation of the soul; for if a man had the Lord Christ as his own, he would not be healed or calm in conscience, for faith alone must make him calm. Simon the special sieche 2) did not have Christ in the flesh, neither Magdalene, because he was his guest and ate his food; he was in his house 2c. But Magdalene had him for salvation, because she recognized him to be the living Son of God and the animator of the soul. Now if the presence of the body created or made faith, Simon would have been more faithful neither the sinner. But the sinner has him alive in her heart through the light and certainty of faith; therefore he was salvific to her, and not because she understood him bodily, watered and dried him. Simon had it so much as his own, as a guest of the host or moderator 3) is, bodily in his food 2c., but has it not in faith; therefore he had it not at all wholesome. Therefore the good of faith may not come from any bodily having or possession.

In another place [Hebr. 11, 1.] he says: Faith is a substance (here the word xxx<r-7-as-ec, which is interpreted in "person", of which enough was said above) of the things which one hopes for, and a certainty of the things which one does not see. A substance he calls faith, that is, the essential, certain, certain and constant confidence that man has in the things that we hope for but are invisible. These words are also misused by our opponents, who drag the description of faith as if we should believe things that are not visible, and want to make do with it in this matter. We

2) i.e. lepers.

3) Maßherrn ----- Tischherrn. Cf. Mitmaßen ----- Tischgenossen, Col. 1250, § 46.

Let us therefore believe that flesh and blood are here, if they be invisible; for faith is of invisible things. From what argument or reason we would be compelled to believe that neither rose nor flew, 1) as it is said, because the same will not happen.

392 But the error comes from the fact that they do not decide between faith, which is a slacking (listening), obeying and admitting or slacking, and faith, which is undoubted trust. For if they saw the difference clearly, they would know that here Paul does not say that the delusion, obeying or forbearing 2) is a substance of things hoped for. For so faith is taken for an indulgence of the things which we hear. As if we believe that the great Caliph of Waldach is more powerful than the Pope. Here faith is nothing else at all, neither with lightening nor slackening, so be it; but that in this something comforting, peace, or security of salvation is born for us in our sea, that is not. But faith 3) is taken here in the description for the essence, security and power of the soul, since it leaves itself undoubted in the invisible things, as in the things to which it is united, and which may give it united (unios) salvation. Thus the body of Christ is to be eaten bodily in the bread, not the opposite (obssotum) or goal to which faith looks; for it looks only to that which is the origin of all creatures, which cannot be seen with any bodily eye; therefore it must be attained only with the sure eye of conscience, and this is faith, the essential consolation, the substance of trust in God.

393 When they say, "Faith is the thing to be hoped for, and therefore it is necessary to hope and believe that the body of Christ is there, so it is there," you see, pious princes, that they go back and forth in the word faith; and since faith is described as confidence, they make out the faith that is abated or healed. For in our souls there is no comfort in believing that we shall be eaten bodily in the bread of Christ's body; for if that had been the case, Abraham could not have been saved, for he never believed that, but all his confidence was in the one Lord and Creator of all things; so also is the substance of our faith.

394 Secondly, they do not see what is called "invisible things" in Hebr. 11:1. Namely, the and visible things are taken in common for all created; 4) as Rom. 1: "His invisible things are learned by the creature of the world"; Baruch 3, 38: "He is therefore seen on earth", "to see" is taken for being sensitive, bodily. And "to feel" 5) is not taken for feeling of the flesh alone, but for "to become aware of all the sensations of the body", of seeing, hearing, grasping, tasting, smelling 2c. So now faith is united in him who has not been perceived nor recognized with any bodily sensation, but the unified mind, the unified spirit, the unified soul perceives him with understanding and trust. Therefore, faith cannot stand in any creature, but in the one invisible God. Thus it is contrary to faith to be pointed to a visible thing, that is, to one creature as one creature. For that we are pointed to Christ signifies that he is God and man; but to his mere humanity no one is to be pointed, as he himself says, "He that trusteth in me, trusteth not in me," that is, he is not to trust in me as long as I am a man 2c. So also is an open error which every believer feels in his essential substantial faith, in that they say, The bodily food of Christ put away sin, put away the soul 2c.

This is now the first vein from which the well-grown faith speaks: 6) Well then! I find that my one food and comfort is the one God; and the God has taken my nature and weakness to Himself, that He might kill those in Himself; 7) so all my confidence is ever in Him alone. Now what would it be for me to eat the corpse in the flesh? The soul does not eat flesh, so the body does not like human flesh. If I now know God and the good deed that he has shown me, by which he made me his child, I have enough of it 2c. In this you see, pious princes, that faith does not suffer to be directed to a creature, much less to be directed to eat something for the indulgence of sin. Of this the pious Silesians wrote more abundantly, whose writing I have read in the midst of 8), and found it more Christian and more thorough neither everything that Luther has ever written in this matter. Must also, whether God wills! come to the day, so that one can see, whether they speak as he said on them. In short, the faith that can go unhealed 1) (and is not otherwise not a faith), seeks in Christ Jesus after his death and resurrection nothing more in his flesh than is sufficiently indicated above from Paul and Augustine; or, if it were bodily in bread, we would also seek bodily health nothing less in bodily touching, neither even the sick woman [Matt. 9]. We would also like to argue in Luther's way: To make the soul healthy is greater than to make the body healthy. So then Christ cleanses the soul with the bodily food of his body; much more would he make the bodies healthy with it. But Summa Summarum: all the oath of Christ's humanity is gone, and [we] know nothing more of it; but our [nostratium, ours] substantial faith stands in the one bodily crucified, not bodily eaten, God.

The other vein that brings us to realize that the words of the supper may not be understood bodily is the resistance of God's Word. For we must never be of the same mind as those who use to cry out: God has said: "This is my corpse", so it must be so for him. Yes, indeed, it is so', but not so, as our erroneous mind means, but so, as Christ means. Accordingly, they cry out as if all the words that are against them are not God's word. And if I cry out as loud: "The flesh is not useful at all", they are also God's word, and must be true as those: "This is my corpse," they do the same as that painter, who in all his works said most of all about Saint Christoffel; he could not paint anyone else so well. So they don't give notice of the words and senses that are against them, but say: "It says, 'This is my body: This is my body. Keep ye simple words, and if ye be deceived at once, [it is] wyer, 2) ye are deceived of GOD neither of men." Nice thing! If they do not like to keep the understanding, they teach that one should keep the misunderstood words; and if one is deceived by them with their misunderstanding, then one should put it on God. But we should be of such a mind that if untruth, even the devil himself, presents God's word to us in a false understanding, we should not accept it in this way, but should set the counter-scriptures against it, just as Christ himself did, and thus weigh out the right understanding.

- 1) Heblinge--Gängelbänder; hence "unheblingen"-- without gears.
2) "wyer" probably stands for "weger" i.e. better.

397. If then faith and Scripture, that is, the spirit and the letter, may not suffer the words to be understood bodily, of which Luther so cruelly cries: "We shall prove that the words may not be understood in this way; although we have done this before and now superfluously: Let us take the words of Luke, and with the words of the other evangelists, so that all believers may see that we spare Luther a great deal, that we are not as seriously responsible for the vain, inept chatter that he is carrying on as another Egg, Struß, 3) or Faber Wohl would be. For if his calumnias, alenfences and intercourse were to be honored, it would be bad for his name. May God give him back his face! Amen.

398 Lucas 32: "He took the bread, praising God, broke it and gave it to them, saying." With the words Lucā lighten Matthew, Marcus and Paul. It is said enough above of ευλογησας and εύχαριστήσας, that they speak for "GOtt.

praise" and "give thanks", not for "bless" hie stand.

This is my body, which is given for you. Before these words Matthew, Mark, Paul, "Take, eat!" Of which Luther also has much trouble; but we do not deny it, but know that one truly takes and eats what he gives. But what does he give? "His body" (says Luther); for he says on it, "This is my body." So we ask: whether they ate the body that sat there, or the body that was declared." If they ate the one that was sitting there, then the natural body was sitting there, which truly has flesh, blood and bones; so they had to eat it only spiritually: or if they ate it bodily, then they had to eat it naturally; but this is inhuman to hear, and even Luther does not indulge in it. But if they have eaten him only spiritually, that is, if they have been thankful that he has given up the body in death, then there must be no more quarreling; for we have now often enough shown that we have the body of Christ most precious in the supper, namely, that we consider his death and therefore give thanks; that is the noble thing to do here. If, then, he is also in our supper, then all the cleavage is gone; but if they have eaten the body that was declared, then Christ's body was declared at one time, and not declared, which is quite contrary to God's word. Joh. 7: "Jesus was not yet declared. This is also publicly Marcionic. Or else he has been declared at one time.

once had two bodies. All of which is contested before.

In previous writings, we have also sufficiently indicated how the word "this" is properly used to refer to the bread or to the entire feast of thanksgiving. 1) For if it points to the bread, then the bread is taken as a part of the sign or sacrament of the evening meal for the whole thanksgiving, as Acts 3, 42. 46. the breaking of bread is taken for bread, cup and thanksgiving. And this does not prevent the drink from being called the blood; for since it is a part of the sacrament, the sacrament is called something of both parts, but something of the one alone, as is proved above.

401 And so it is understood from the two points that nothing else is shown here, neither that this feast is his body, that is, a sign, a signification, a thanksgiving, a memorial, a renewal of the body of Christ; that is, that he has taken true body and soul to himself, suffered death, and thus redeemed us. For as it is certain that the apostles did not eat the natural body; neither did they eat the body declared, as has been heard enough; neither did they eat anything else, neither the true body in the spirit, that is, first of all, believing that the true Son of God became true man and flesh, or body, for our sake, and therefore would suffer death for us; and [thirdly] that with it he willed to institute the thanksgiving of good works. And so the bread and the wine are called the body and the blood, because the two measures 2) are carried around in thanksgiving for His whole incarnation and all that He suffered in it.

402. also the flesh of Christ is not taken only in one place 3) for his incarnation and deeds therein carried. John 1: "The Word became flesh and dwelt among us." Behold! "Becoming flesh" for becoming man; and "walking among us in the flesh" for having been truly human among us and having been killed, as also Isaiah 53. said before. Item, Hebr. 5: "Which in the time of his flesh offered up supplication and grace 2c." But here flesh is taken for the change of his humanity.

403 Therefore thanksgiving 4) is called his body and blood, that we have eaten his flesh spiritually in our hearts.

If we have learned the divine mercy in his incarnation and death, and have surrendered ourselves to it with faith, and therefore, out of joy and delight in the rest we receive from faith, run to, praise and give thanks for the unrequited goodness and friendship. It is also not a matter of saying: The bread or supper means the body of Christ, it renews, it remembers; or it is said: It is a meaning, a renewal, a remembrance 2c. as is indicated above enough.

404. "Who is given for you." Here Luther comes forth not only with foolish coarseness, but also with sacrilegious traffic and blasphemy, and says first that "for you" is as much as "before you"; which error is explained above. Then he says that "to give" is taken to mean to present, to present, to present. And when St. Paul presses him with the word "broken," when he says, "This is my body that is broken for you," Luther strikes it hard with a mallet, and says, "to break" means to break before, yes, also to break before. I worried for a while that he would also say to the full how great a mock 5) Christ had made. What does it seem to us, pious princes, that Luther takes the precious payment that the Son of God has set forth for us and makes bread out of it. He takes the precious crime and death of his humanity, and makes of it presenting bread, crumbs, morsels and clods; with what Scripture? With none; with what teachers, if there were any of the old ones, yes, even of the Papists? With áúróç Burkart it was called.

405 What does sacrilege mean, if it is not a lavish sacrilege? must I ever say. Should one also deal with the holy words of God in this way? The high humility and mercy of God lies in the fact that He gave Himself in death for us, so Luther (regardless of God, His holy word, violation of all believers' consciences) may, without Scripture and predecessor, make "given for you" into "offered before you," regardless of the fact that Gal. 1 says, "He gave Himself for our sin." Must withholding 6) also mean: has offered himself for our sins; and Titum 2: "Who gave himself for us," Rom. 4: "He is given for our sin," Rom. 8: "He gave him for us all," Eph. 5: "He gave himself for us a sacrifice and a host before God," now means "to give" to offer and to prepare; and is "to offer" oneself: so it follows that Luther's Vorbrocken or night meal was also a sacrifice.

406 But I must ask one thing here: If Luther says, "dargeben" is taken for darbierten and brocken, what do we think of in our supper? If he says, "The death of the Lord, mortem DOMINI adnunciabit," then we say no; for according to his interpretation of the words, one must think of the preliminary bread, for there is nothing at all about death in Matthew and Mark, yes, also in Luke and Paul, before the words, "Do this in remembrance of me," if giving and breaking are to be taken for offering and preliminary bread, not for dying and paying. Such a beautiful thing follows from Luther's taapen, 1) where he finds a hole through which he can escape.

But someone might say that Luther only indicates it as a court right; 2) and says, "someone might interpret and preserve it in this way, even though he does not want to lie mightily about it. To this we say, [first:] that he [consider] what this word is, since one allows it to be well kept and preserved. [Secondly, that he should consider what Luther indicates with many useless words, that the breaking of bread or crumbs is one thing with the breaking of the cross; all of which we gladly, to spare, skip. But surely, if the breaking of the bread is one thing with the dying on the cross, and if the dying is a sacrifice, then the breaking of the bread is also a sacrifice. The bread must also be crucified, juxta vanitatem, quae Marcionem deceret apud Tertullianum, lib. 4. adversus Marcion..., and all the teaching of Luther falls back, so the supper becomes a sacrifice. Now I have reported this to him in the hope that he would consider it, but it has not helped.

408 Third, let us hear Luther himself, whether he relies on this explanation or not. Luther in the large B in the third panel: 3) "Who is broken for you. "We have said much about this above, that the Scriptures cannot suffer, that breaking should be called Christ's suffering. The enthusiasts may say it, as they say other things, but never prove it" 2c.

Behold, pious princes, this is the fine court law that Luther has made above! If it belonged to the market of Zurzach, there it is valid: "Shit on whoever you like! Here he leaves it free, and does not want to think that "to give" should be interpreted as presenting bread. Here he says: "Let not the Scripture suffer that 'breaking' Christ's body should be interpreted as 'giving'.

den hot". But the book is nothing at all different, because so pretty look and found.

But we know that this supper is a thanksgiving and praise of the body of Christ, who was given to us by the Father, who was given "for us" by the Father, who alone became for us in death the sacrifice that took away our sin. And this is: to be given for us, to be broken for us. It is also indicated above that "to break" is taken to mean to kill and to slay.

411, "Do these things in remembrance of me. What one should do in memory of Christ is indicated many times above.

412 "The like also the drink" 2c. With these words, Luther acts as if matter were about to melt away from him, but he does not need it.

413. "This is the drink of a new testament in my blood, which is poured out for you. Here we first want to show what miserable fog Luther has raised, 4) so that he might bring darkness into the light, and then [we want to] chase away the error and bring the truth in again.

414 First, he teaches that the cup or chalice is often used for drinking; we admit this to him.

415. secondly, that the potion is the new testament; and if it is the new testament, it is the remission of sin; and makes this shake 5) arguimentum de primo ad ultimum:

416 Luther in capital C on the first tablet. 6) "Without bread and cup, the body and blood of Christ would not be there; without the body and blood of Christ, the New Testament would not be there; without the New Testament, forgiveness of sins would not be there; without forgiveness of sins, life and blessedness would not be there. Thus the words first of all comprehend the bread and the cup of the sacrament; the bread and the cup comprehend the body and blood of Christ; the body and blood of Christ comprehend the new testament; the new testament comprehends forgiveness of sins; forgiveness of sins comprehends eternal life and blessedness" 2c.

417) Thirdly, he brings us a beautiful trick, an old priest taught him, 7) when he says that the word "which" does not refer to the blood, but to the drink, thus: "Which drink is poured out for you, that is, poured out before you; for fundere also means to pour out," he says.

Now we want to go behind them with the wind that blows wherever it wants, and disperse the mists with the fair wind suäiüos borea over the Lombard 1) [Ge]birge, so that the bright beautiful truth may be seen again.

419: That the drink is not the will, but only a drink of the will, we want to prove 2).

First, we ask Luther how many New Testaments are. If I think well, he cannot say more than one thing. So I ask: What is the testament? But he must say, Jeremiah on the 31st and Hebrews on the 8th is determined, namely, the forgiven 3) remission of sin. How can the potion be the testament? Potion and remission of sin are two different things. Yes, the body and blood of Christ and the remission of sin are two different things. Luther may say that the drink is the remission of sin, but he cannot; or else he would have to let the drink be a sacrifice; for where there is remission of sin, there must be sacrifice, Heb. 5 and 8 and Ephes. 5. Now if the drink is the remission of sin and the testament, it must also be a sacrifice.

421 Secondly: If in the drink there is remission of sin, and in death also remission of sin; so in two unequal things there is remission of sin, in death and in drink; the one is altogether bitter, the other altogether light.

422 Thirdly, the remission of sin will be in a mere creature, and will not pardon the one divine grace.

423. probation. The drink is a louder creature than Luther himself recognizes, it is wine in substance; he wanted to say that wine and bread would also be united in the person of the Son of God: then he would have assumed people, seeds 4) and wine, and not only the lineage of Abraham. Now if it is a righteous creature, it is not the remission of sin; nor is it the testament; for even the natural body of Christ is not the remission of sin; or else God might have redeemed us with a creature, and might not have sent his Son. So then Christ himself, if he were only a pure man, would not be the remission of sin; much less might the drink, which is a pure creature, be the remission of sin. But where someone wanted to say: The bread and drink is Christ himself, therefore it is remission of sin; he knows not what he saith. For Christ's being may not include anything in it, neither God nor man; and not God, man, wine and bread. But if anyone should say that the drink is called a testament because the blood of Christ is in it, he recognizes that it is only "called" a testament, and not "is. Otherwise the bodily blood cannot be there either.

424. Now we want to indicate with scripture that [the] sign of the will is called testament.

425 First, in the Old Testament, in the first book of Moses at the 17th, the circumcision is called the covenant, and soon after that the covenant sign. Now the sign and the signified cannot be one thing, though they come to have one name. Thus it is also evident that circumcision alone was a sign of the covenant, since God bound Himself to be their God, and that they, His people, would possess the land of Canaan. So also the drink of the supper alone is a sign of the covenant that God has made anew with us, the remission of sin.

426 In the New Testament Matthew and Marcus have the words of the drink thus: "This is my blood, which is the blood of the new testament. Behold, pious princes, how the two also call the bodily blood of Christ, which they themselves shed, not the testament, but the blood of the testament; that is, the blood, that the testament, that is, the forgiven remission of sins, might be conquered, as Rom. 3. says: "We are forgiven [i.e., made free], being made righteous by His grace, through the redemption that was perfected in Christ JEsu, whom God ordained to be a propitiation, through faith, with His blood." And Col. 1: "GOD by the blood of His cross, 5) through Him hath perfected all things that are in heaven and on earth. "2c. Heb. 9.: "Christ entered once into the holy place with His own blood, and thereby obtained eternal redemption."

Watch, pious princes! Is not also in Luther's shake the redemption the testament? Yes. And if the blood is not the testament nor the redemption, but the value and cost, so that the redemption has come over: so also the drink is not the redemption or testament; for it is so far behind the blood, that by the drink redemption and remission of sin is not conquered, as has been heard enough, but has come about by the blood. Now the blood is not the testament, but

4) "Kernels" here will probably stand for "grains" from which the bread is baked.

That, so that the will is purchased; just as the twenty florins are not the horse, but that, so that the horse is purchased and made single-handed. Now nothing at all came over with the drink, or else the redemption would have been accomplished in the evening, and would have been accomplished with the drinking of the disciples, and not with the suffering of Christ, which has not yet happened, and therefore has not yet worked. Therefore, the longer it is, the more distant it is that the drink is the testament.

Thus Luther's chain or shackle falls to the ground. For the words do not grasp the bread and wine in such a way that they become anything other than a sacrament, that is, sign. Bread and wine do not contain the body and blood of Christ in any other way than as any sign contains the signified; this can be meant by the sign, since the sign is not present. Body and blood do not grasp the testament differently, neither every purchased thing is grasped by the money, so that it is purchased; that is: that with it the redemption is conquered, and that they are not the testament or indulgence of sin. For that which is conquered, and that which is conquered, are never the same thing. Now the indulgence of sin and redemption is that which is conquered, and the blood that which is conquered; the redemption is the testament; the blood [is that] that the testament may be conquered: so they may never be One 2c.

But Luther would have to bring a new word "grasp", that he would show to the simple with "grasp", as if the words thus "grasped" would bring with them the body and blood of Christ, and speaks well: 2) "grasp the words to the sacrament", but the simple do not know that "grasp to the sacrament" alone is so much: to fast or make to a sign.

But that Luther would not want to say: we are even throwing him away, so we also want to hear his words, but since he, forgetting himself, publicly renounces, 3) that in the blood the testament consists; so it can never be the testament itself. Luther in the great B 4) at [the] 7th tablet: "For Christ's blood is not the figurative testament or the old testament blood, but the new, which consists in his blood" 2c.

These are Luther's words. Now the existing and that in which a thing consists are not one, therefore the drink cannot be the testament, even if the drink would be the blood of Christ, for the testament consists in the blood; and if the blood is [that] in which the testament consists, the testament and the blood may not be One Thing; much less the drink, which is not shed for us; or else it would be included in the Unity of the Person of the Son of God, which is not at all as heard.

432 Now it is on the "which". The good pastor who taught Luther has not forgotten much of the tropes when he applies "which" to the cup or drink: "Which drink is poured out for you. For it is sufficiently shown that Luther's opinion, together with his crowd, is erroneous, since they suppose that pouring into cups or drinking takes away sin. For if this were so, then either the wine would be in the unity of the person, or else a more pure creature would take away the sin; of which there may be neither [i.e. neither of the two].

433 But the good old priest should learn that τὸ ὑπερ ὁμῶν ἐχχυνόμενον exallage [enallage] est, nominativi pro dativo, ἀντὶ τοῦ ὑπερ ὁμῶν ἐχχυνομένου. Id quod nullo negotio apud Matthaeum et Marcum videtur, qui ambo sic habent : τοῦτο ἐστὶ τὸ αἷμα μου, τὸ τῆς χαύνης δια- Ἀ-ήλης, τὸ περὶ πολλῶν ἐχχυνόμενον. Hic videmus τοῦτο, hoc, demonstrare poculum,; sequentem vero articulum „τό" insignem reddere sanguinem; et sequentes omnes articulos eundem sanguinem demonstrare, non poculum. Atque hujusmodi exallagae celeberrimae sunt cum apud Paulum, tum apud LXX. 2 Cor. 6.; συνιστῶντες ἑαυτοὺς ὡς θεοῦ διάχονοι - ἀντὶ: διοτ χάνους. Ezechielis 23. caput apud LXX ne expedies quidem citra exallages beneficium ; hujus tropi ita omnia sunt referta, ut nusquam non inveniantur.

434 But I must again refer to Luther, who droned on about the words: "The flesh is not useful" as long as one might leave the articles out and say: "Flesh is not useful", since he nevertheless misleads. But now he speaks:

Luther in the capital C on [the] 4th panel: 5) "If they now followed such two pointers" 2c.

Here, behold, pious princes! he instructs us that we should look at the articles, that is, pointers (we called them pointers before). Well then, let's bring out all of Matthes' and Marcus' pointers, so that he can see where the "which" goes. So they speak:

"This is the blood of mine, which is the 6) blood of the new testament is, which blood (sn! vim po "trerui rü, of enirn potest intenäem in öeafür the crowd is shed."

436 Here Luther would like to learn by the power of the little pointers in Matthew and Marcus where the little word "which", or "that", or "so" pointed to in Lucas; namely, to the blood, not to the drink. "Which blood is shed for you."

437 We want to overturn all this with a few words against the erroneous calculation that Luther makes last and teaches how we should meet, and bring forth the unanimity of the evangelists. So Matthew and Marcus (ob- mittam enim yáp apud Matth.) speak thus, "This is the blood of mine"; but so Lucas speaks, "In the blood of mine." Now no one is so unintelligent as not to perceive the difference 1) between "being himself" and "being in another." Soinan says: "The gentlemen of the council have given four jugs of wine to our dear citizens of Costenz, you can see that the jugs are called "the wine", but they are not, but they are what the wine is presented in. And even though it is called that, it is not understood by anyone that the jars are the wine. Now when Matthew and Marcus say, "This is the blood of me," they do not mean to say that the cup or the drink is the blood; but that it is the friendly brotherly cup, which is offered round about in the supper to commemorate the blood of Christ; as that to whom the pitcher is called. Therefore Lucas, who wrote after both of them, does the same to him as one who says, "They give you only the wine with the jugs, and do not give you the jugs;" and says, "The drink is a true sign of the new testament, which new testament is established and conquered in the blood of Christ;" as if he said, "The drink is not the blood, but a sign of the blood, in which the new testament is conquered. So it can be announced that Lucas with the word "in the blood of mine" wanted to make it obvious that this drink is not the blood, but a festive sign of the blood, in which the testament is won and conquered.

438) But here, Luther protectively 2) opposes the previous "which" and says: "Oh! what they would give to have the article there! But it is not there." So it seems that Lucas has from word to word: This 3) potion there, the New Testament, with the blood of me: and 4) the words might well be interpreted in this way:

Luther at [bow] 2 on the 6th panel. 5) "And so that we may avoid all confusion, I interpret the text of Luca in the clearest and shortest way: 'This cup is the New Testament in my blood.'"

439 Behold! how Luther makes himself clear. Just like everywhere else. Why does he not bring out what the "in my blood" serves? If he wants to say that the cup is in the blood of Christ, he is not speaking correctly; for according to his meaning, the blood must be in the cup, and not the cup in the blood. So he comes to the aid of the matter nicely, and rages once and for all and says:

Luther fnn sheet 2 on the 5th panel: 6) "From this it follows that coarse Hempel are, who want to conclude from the words Lucä: it must be the cup in the blood 2c., as a farmer in boots, or meat in the pots is."

440 Behold, pious princes! what an unfaithful interpreter we have! how licht he presents us, 7) because we know little. If we reproach them with the "in the blood of me," we do it only so that they may understand correctly that "in the blood of me" is as much possible as "through the blood of me," for the New Testament has been conquered. Thus Luther makes a long Perlament, 8) and finally arrives at the point that he speaks:

Luther there: 9) "This cup is the New Testament in the blood of Christ, that is, through the blood, or, for the sake of the blood" 2c.

441 Thus Luther goes on, and yet rings the matter now and then, that he, ex instrumen- talibus locutionibus causales, makes "through the blood" as much as "for the sake of the blood. Thus, "The cup is the new testament because the blood is in it." Is not this an impotent babble, when one sounds for a long time and does not answer, but only at the last falls again into that which is thrown at him? We say, then, "The new testament is in my blood," by which we see that he means to say, K1V6 xa?' Errt'He^<"v, 81V6 xa?' ex^er^i'-

[That the new testament is in his blood, that is, is conquered with and through his blood; and that the testament exists in the blood, and not the blood in the testament. Thus Luther says: the drink is the new testament, therefore the blood is in it. And it does not say that the blood is in the testament, that is, in the cup, as Luther speaks; but the testament is in the blood. Is it not a pity to speak with such frankness?

Verkehrniß and Alenfanz act? He would like to say, it would be ἀλλογενή, Testamentum in sanguine, pro, sanguis in testamento, hoc est, in poculo. Poculum enim apud eum et testamentum eadem res sunt....

But to them [i.e. away] with the mists! we have publicly learned that the drink is not the testament, and that the blood is not the testament, but that in and with which the testament is conquered. And is such a speech: "The new testament in my blood", as, so Paul speaks, Rom. 4: "And he took the sign of circumcision, a seal 1) of the piety of faith" 2c. Here Paul does not have the adjective "one", but simply: "He took the sign of circumcision, a seal of the piety of faith" 2c. Still we see that this little word "one" is added in our language, yes, it requires it; and if we add it immediately, we may then explain it further, thus: Which circumcision is a seal 2c. Ea enim vis est epitheti. And is of the speeches innumerable. Right there it says from word to word: "Where the law is not, nor transgression." Here, ΜΜπει-, "there is," is lacking, and if one interprets it into German, one must speak thus: "Where the law is not, there is also no transgression."

443) So Luther butchers himself here for the sake of Homer's lice, because the words "the New Testament in my blood" may not come right in our language to be clear, because thus: The New Testament, which is in my blood. We have also indicated above in the matter: "The flesh is not useful", that in the saying: "How can he give us his flesh to eat?" the word "his" is added, even though it is not written in John 2c. But all this becomes even clearer when we reconcile the other words of the evangelists.

Matthew and Mark say, "This is the blood of mine, which is the blood of the new testament. But Lucas says, "This drink is the new testament." Now the evangelists are one, although one speaks in recto, the other in genitivo. And whoever wants to complain would like to say: The Holy Spirit is not the same, or forgetful. For as Matthew and Marcus speak that the blood is a blood of the New Testament, so Lucas is contrary to them at the first appearance, for he calls the drink the testament itself, cum articulo x. Now, as before "blood itself" and "in blood" are contrary to each other, if one did not want to let up the tropos, so here also "the testament itself to be" and "only the blood of the testament to be" contrary to each other, as far as the king himself and the captain of the king, through whom he overcomes the enemy and wins the victory. The testament itself, and that, so that the testament is overcome, are also against each other. But as we have seen enough before, by all the Scriptures, that the blood is that which gives the victory over sin, death and the devil: it is evident that it is not the testament, victory or fruit of suffering; but it is the captain who gives the victory to the heavenly Father; it is the tree from which we have gathered the fruit of the remission of sin. And in short! with his death and blood is born to us life and purity.

445. 4) It will now have to be argued that, as in the words: "This is my blood" (when Matthaüs and Marcus speak) Lucas has performed the tropum, 5) that this potion is the new testament, that is, a sacrament of the new testament, which new testament is conquered with the blood of Christ: thus also again Matthaüs and Marcus perform the tropum, which Lucas does, since he calls the potion the testament in the blood of Christ. i. exponant, in conjunctivo, thus; That this potion, which here barks Christ, is a sacrament of the blood of Christ; which blood of Christ is the blood, so that the testament is conquered.

446 And this comes from the causes: Since Lucas saw that Matthesen and Marxen's word "this is my blood" might be understood enthusiastically, he detached the tropum, and reversed blood itself into "being in the blood", that is, being won and conquered with the blood. 6) And again, since he saw that they both also called the blood not the testament, but the blood so that the testament is conquered. And again, since he saw that they both also did not call the blood itself the testament, but the blood, so that the testament is conquered, he was not afraid to also call the cup of the supper the testament tropical, since the clarity was well found in the previous two, since the blood itself was also not called the testament, but only the blood of the testament.

447. therefore also Oecolampadius ring has to answer, since Luther alenfanzet him with the words "in my blood" thus: 7) "it must be

The drink is the new testament in the sign of my blood. And therefore he 1) sputters out at him, who may hear that the new testament is a drink of wine. And the angry man does not see that "in my blood" in Luke is not tropus, but open, a simple clear speech; but in Mattyesen and Marxen "this is my blood" is tropus; just as again "of the new testament" in Matthew and Marcus is not tropus, but "the new testament" in Lucas is tropus.

But here he speaks against it; Luther in the great D in the first tablet: 2) "For it will not suffer itself in any way that Paul should use one word over one thing or matter, and in one speech, differently and otherwise, as a two-faced and cunning deceiver" 2c.

449. And after that he speaks thus: Luther in the large F at [the] second tablet: 3) "The words are to be understood as they read: 'This is my body, this is my blood', that I know for certain. For if they were tropus, they would have to be tropus in all places where the Lord's Supper is spoken of."

Behold, here, pious princes! but we have once: Burkart has called it. He prescribes a rule: "Where the same words are used in one thing, they are definitely tropus: and concludes from this that the words: "This is my body" 2c. are to be understood as they are; and proves it strongly, and says: "This I know for certain. Is not this a thing to which the pious Saxons ought to be justified? how, if we also would know it? shall he alone know it? I will say it: He cannot protect the rule with any word of God, for the contradiction is found publicly; therefore he knows it the same as the violinist, who does one stroke above himself, the other with himself, and does not remain on one at all. So what Luther says in the book is thus, or not.

But we want to hear another. Joh. 3. is taken in One Matter, in One Speech and Teaching πνεῦμα, Spirit, for wind and the Holy Spirit. Joh. 4. Christ says to the Samaritan woman: "Give me to drink!" and afterwards need drink for believe. Joh. 6: "You seek me, because you have eaten of the bread", and after that he calls himself by the name "bread"; and by the word "eat" he understands to believe. John 8: "The servant does not always remain in the house, but the Son always 4) remains in the house." Here he speaks de conditione ΜΜΠΕΙ, from own people and servants, also from the free children. From that time he speaks, on top of it: "If then the Son shall redeem you, ye shall be free indeed." Here he speaks of the only free Son of God, of himself. In Romans 3, Paul takes circumcision for the whole Jewish people; soon after in chapter 4, in One Matter and One Speech, he takes it for the sign that is done to the body. Rom. 6: "We all that are baptized into Christ are baptized into his death." Here the first baptism is "visible sacramental baptism," but the other is "spiritual baptism," that is, dying to the world and living to God.

What shall I draw out many examples? The Scriptures are so full of such changes of words that, as often as one goes from a physical to a spiritual, or from a high 5) to a low, or from a low 6) to a high, or from used speech to simple, or from simple to tropical 7) and used, or from otherwise understood 8) to lightly understood, or from lightly understood to otherwise understood; and, in short! from figurative 9) speech to plain, or from plain to figurative: thus one needs all the same words, which, however, have different and different understanding. But Luther "knows it for certain.

453. So we have now, pious princes, that the bread, 10) which signifies Christ, is the sacramental body of Christ, that is, the sign of his body, the true essential one, which he gave in death for us; just as one speaks: This is the Cocles who held up the bridge of the Tiber to the enemies; but showing his image, this is only a carved or hewn Cocles; and but the true Cocles held up the bridge of the Tiber, not the carved one; and that the drink, the cup, is the sacramental blood of Christ, that is, a sign and signification of the true blood of Christ, with which blood the testament of the forgiven remission of sin is conquered; wherefore also this cup is called the testament, yet also only sacramental, that is, signifies and signifies the testament. I want to force this sense from Luther.

piece than from the cup: "This is my blood." 2c.

455 A sacramental being is not the right being, but nothing else, neither a sign nor meaning of the other right being; enough has been said about this, and Luther does not like it either. Thus it follows that whoever calls a thing a sacrament wants to say that it is only a sign, and not the real thing that it signifies; for no one calls the real thing an image or sign. No one says: The right itself king is a sign of the king. But as soon as one says, This is a sign or image of the king, one understands that it is not the right king. So whoever says, This is a sacrament of the blood of Christ, says, This is only a sign of the true blood, and not the true blood. Now Luther calls it a sacrament, so he calls it differently only a sign of the true and not the true. Do you say, "Why does Luther act so cruelly? Do you call yourselves Tutists, Tuteleians, sign lyres 2c.? [I answer: It is the hand of God; and it is to be feared that he has transgressed, that God will thus let him fall; for such an iniquitous figuring 1) and fiddling that he does is known even to the wicked; nor does he think that it is not seen, and therefore is not ashamed. God better it!

456 Now it is in the saying of Paul, 1 Cor. 10: "The cup of thanksgiving." Luther, however, makes blessing of it; and may not, however, offer it with One Word; but all Christians from the apostles have called it Eucharistian [εὐχαριστία, that is, thanksgiving, instead of Eulogias [εὐλογία]. But Burkart must have his own way. In which saying Luther lets himself in so darkly that those who read it at once see very soon that it does not consist with himself. Therefore, let us make our meaning firm, and thus conclude the other part.

457 In the eighth chapter, Paul spoke much against those who ate things sacrificed to idols with the idolaters, and fought against them in love, that, though it was proper for them to eat things sacrificed to idols, yet they should refrain from doing so, if they saw that many brethren were angry because of it; for love also refrains from things that are proper. But Paul does not here refrain from saying that it is proper to eat things sacrificed to idols, as some have written, but he only says that even though it is proper, they should spare the weak brethren out of love. And therefore here again he comes to the same matter and wants to show that it is not proper to eat things sacrificed to idols, and he does this very strongly. All those who are in one sacrifice, in one

If the body appeared at a feast or ceremony, it would be one body, company, and congregation with all the members of the same feast, sacrifice, or ceremony.

When the brethren of Corinth appeared in the supper of thanksgiving, they undoubtedly became One Church, One Society, One Church, and One Body with the brethren of the Christian faith; therefore it should not befit them to eat with the idolaters in their sacrifices, for they would also become members of their Body, that is, of the Church and Society of devils. This should never be, that those who want to be seen [members] of the church of God with the company of His table, also become company of the devils. This is the summare argu- ment. We have already sufficiently fixed this place in other writings. Luther also did not like anything against it, 2) but he is fumbling around behind the bridge; therefore, we will now point out the reasons.

459. "The cup of thanksgiving, that we may give thanks, or, if we give thanks, is it not the company or congregation of the blood of Christ?" Here Luther makes fellowship and sharing out of the word, but without Scripture. But Andreas Althainer indicated at Bern at the disputation a xxxxxxxx, that is, community, in the second [Epistel to the] Corinthians, in the 8th chapter: "The Macedonians have exhorted us excellently that we take this gift and fellowship of serving the pious Christians" 2c. Here the good man defied, the whole world would not want to contradict, because that κοινωνία must mean fellowship and sharing: so it must also be taken here, 2 Cor. at the 10th chapter. Here we see that the good man did not know that this word stands in many other places even on our sense; and therefore 3) he fell silent, since Oecolampadius took κοινωνία from 1 John 1 for the fourth time, taken for fellowship, as also the Latin interpres has interpreted, and saw there that he could not stand with the account: fellowship is taken for sharing in one place, so it is also taken for sharing in 1 Cor. 10. And therefore we will first show some places in Scripture where it is taken publicly for community and society, and then show that 2 Corinthians 8 is also taken in this way.

460. 1 Cor. 1 thus says: "Faithful and true is God, by whom you were called into society (hic habet antiquus interpres societatem;

1) i.e. rub back and forth.

2) i.e. capable.

3) "verstumt" put by us instead of: "erhummet", which is probably a misprint, instead of: "erstummet".

Erasmus consortium) of his Son JEsu Christ our Lord." To Galatians on the other: "They offered me and Barnaban the right hands, to a sign of society", χοινωνία? Here the old interpreter and Erasmus: societatis, of society. Phil. 1: "I give thanks to GOD" 2c., and that you have come into the church or society of the Gospel. Here Erasmus has *communione*m, not communicationem. And 1 John 1. says χοινωνία for the fourth time for company. Acts 2. is also taken xocrEca thus: "They always clung to the apostles' teaching, to the church, and to the breaking of bread" 2c. Accordingly, if one considers the saying 2 Cor. 8 [v. 4], it also has its meaning from the church, because the Macedonians recognized the Christians at Jerusalem as their fellow churches and fellows; therefore they shared with them what they had as common property. So Heb. 13 and Phil. 4.

But putting all this aside, Paul sets himself forth to speak of the church, that we are the church of the blood of Christ, and not the church of idols, saying, "For we the multitude find one bread and one body." Here you see, pious princes! abersmals] the causalem "for," which little word is a sign ἰπεξηγη- σεως, id est, expositionis, of interpreting and explaining what he understood before by the words church or company, and body and blood, and says, For we the multitude οἰπολλοί. 1) Behold! that which before he called the church or company, he now calls the multitude or the company, that it may be understood that he did not speak of dividing the blood of Christ, but of the church, that we, the Christian multitude, are church and company, the church of the blood and corpse of Christ; therefore it is not fitting for us, by the corpse, to be company and church of idols.

462 He also says that we are one bread and one body. Now who will not see that he does not say here of the dividing of the body of Christ, when he makes the bread of which he said "us", "we are the same bread"? If then we are the same bread, how can we be divided? or, do we also eat one another? Therefore the meaning is this: that the drink of thanksgiving is the congregation of the blood of Christ, that is, whoever shares in thanksgiving 2) with the cup is [a member of] the company of the blood of Christ. And if we break the bread, we are the church or congregation of the body of Christ. For we,

we, the multitude, that is, the whole church are One Bread and One Body.

Behold! how he goes from the true corpse, also from the sacramental corpse, to the allegorical, that is, differently understood corpse, namely, to "us". And not only shows how we are the church of the blood and body of Christ, but also why we are: namely, "because we all 3) (Behold! now he calls the church and the multitude "all", who are companions or brethren in the supper) partake of one bread with one another." Now we have publicly that all the quackery about the sharing of the body of Christ is fog; for Paul says "that we" then, that we share of One Bread with one another, "are one church of the body of Christ," not that we share the body of Christ with one another, which he should have said in προσπαυδοῦσαι, that is, in indicating the cause.

464 And this he makes clear only when he subsequently teaches by example how Jews and Gentiles recognize that those who eat of a sacrifice are companions of the altar, of which they eat; χοινωνοί, companions, co-adherents, co-participants. 4) Now if anyone eats of the sacrifice of the altar of the idols, that is, of the devils, as the 5) is also a companion and joint-liability of the devils. Therefore he tells them out, "they may not drink the cup of the Lord, and the cup of the devils." Luther and the Old Testament should have learned from Paul's words: "I do not want you to be devils' fellows", that here are taken for fellows, companions and brothers, not for those who have eaten the devil. And if they had seen this peel⁶, they would also have seen that xm'ia, congregation or company, does not mean to divide out in the place; for the devil is not divided out to eat; so also χοινωνία here is not called the dividing out of the body of Christ in the eating of the bread and drink, but those who here are fellow-measurers 6) in the sacrament and sign of the body and blood of Christ, are not to become fellow-measurers, fellows, fellows, nor fellow-servants of the heathen and idolaters in their obligatory and communal sacrifices or ceremonies.

465 But as Luther would say here: One knows well that one does not eat the devil, but the devil is taken here for the sacrifice of the devils. So learn also that here one does not eat the body of Christ, but the sacrament or zeiof the body of Christ. And thereby the eater becomes a fellow member of the church of Christ, if he eats it with right faith; otherwise he appears only as a fellow member, but is not, but becomes guilty of the true body and blood of Christ, and of the mystical, that is, of the spiritual body and blood, 2c. of which enough has been said above. So much for the other part.

The third part.

If I, pious princes, also speak something into Luther's faith, I will undoubtedly be scolded. For one may say: Why is Luther's freedom judged by your conscience? 1 Cor. 10, you attack Luther for the sake of something external. Now freedom is where the spirit of God is. 1) If Luther undoubtedly has God's Spirit, as you yourself confess, then you should leave him unjudged. Let him know that this and other sayings, which may thus be drawn out against us, are for us. For our freedom is judged by Luther, and not only that, but all our faith, mind, understanding, doctrine and life; yes, we are the most evil heretics in his book, therefore we are not at all willing to judge him with this, but to punish that which is not conformed to the truth, and to confront him where he teaches wrong while we live. To this end, no one can boast of the freedom of the spirit who wants to do or teach contrary to God's word. We also owe it to our conscience to warn where error wants to grow. Now Luther did not have enough to pour out the clumsy error with even clumsier writing: he first had to introduce more error and suspicion in his confession. And the greatest thing of all is to make a desperate protestation or testimony. Therefore, we should go out to meet him, and open the pus that lies at the bottom of the flesh. Nevertheless, we will keep Christian discipline, since he does not keep pagan or Turkish discipline against us.

467 When he indicates the unity of the divine essence and the unity of the persons, he should not have taken the Roman church as a witness, because as far as he has often exclaimed about it 2) it does not believe that there is neither one nor more gods, but is even godless [dei expers]. And I believe, whoever has a right true faith, sees that the Roman church never had true Christian faith, since the splendor of the papal primacy is to arise. I know well what the Roman Church, which has faith, holds; but it must not be attracted here. If he now presents the Milesians 3) as witnesses in such a glorious matter, it tastes like 4) something that I want to give you, pious princes, and all believers to consider.

468] On the other hand. Since he says: "He believes that Mary, the holy virgin, is a true mother, not only of the man Christ, but also of the Son of God," 2c., 5) I also believe this; however, Luther should have explained himself greatly in the words, as he then also rightly recognizes against his will, as we indicated at the end of the first part, namely: "that Mary is called the mother of God because she gave birth to him who is God and man; but his divine nature cannot be born except from the one Father. I indicate, pious princes, for this reason alone, that in our kind 6) there are also some priests who say at the pulpits in the Papal churches: "Who would be God if Mary had not given birth? Therefore she is mighty over God Himself", thus inverting the honor of the Creator into the honor of the created. But Luther should still leave the little nail behind him, so that the simple ones would learn to recognize the difference of the two natures in Christ the less.

469 Thirdly. Since he speaks "as Christ ascended to heaven," 2c., we also believe that under the name of Christ he lets the human nature remain in its characteristic; for it is fitting for Christ to be on earth, in heaven and under the earth, but only according to the One nature; as has been heard enough.

The fourth. We do not disagree about original sin, but Luther and his crowd do not want the words that we say, because Burkart did not speak them. And this is recently the summa, which we prove in the booklet de peccato originali: "that original sin is not a sin of its own nor a guilt, but a prest, 7) which attaches to us from Adam's sin." Are not against that someone calls the prest sin 2c.

471 The fifth. Since he speaks of the orders ordinibus, the Christian stands, he needs words, which, if not properly judged, may mislead the simple-minded. Luther: "But what is in God's 472 Here I ask Luthern what he understands by this sacrament. To the fourth: Eat the godless clergy, and speech: "What is contained in God's word"? If he means receive the bodily body of Christ; why then do they not that everything of which God's bodily or written word become holy, when he first said: "What God's word fasts, speaks is holy, then Judas, Pilate, Caiphaz and Lucifer that is all holy" ? Now I ask him: Does the Word fast the are also holy; but if he understands what his eternal word, body of Christ here? Without doubt he will soon say yes. that is, his eternal, inexpressible wisdom, will and power, Why does it not make the harrowers and workers holy? preserves, then it is not true; for even the devil is 474. to the seventh, he thus says, 4) Luther: "In the preserved in it and lives together with all the godless, but church is the gospel, baptism, the sacrament of the altar, they are not holy. He then wants to take "holy" pro 5) in which forgiveness of sins is offered, fetched and sacrosancto, for unchangeable; so the word "fast" is not received" 2c. Of the gospel we are one, that in the same allowed, but one is used to speak thus in the case: forgiveness of sins is promised, and given to him who Everything that God calls, recognizes, speaks or wills, believes and trusts in it. But if Luther believes that that must be; or what God orders, that must proceed. forgiveness of sins is given in baptism or in the sacrament of the altar, I ask him: whether forgiveness of sins is also What God ordains, no one shall break. God orders the magistrate, therefore he may not depart; therefore he is given in the sacrament of the altar to him who does not believe? Says he, Yea, then the word of Christ, "He that holy, although the persons of the magistrate are ungodly. trusteth in me hath everlasting life," and, "He that But Luther comes up with the word "fast" for and for, so believeth shall be preserved; and he that believeth not that one may become obsessed with it 2) and learn that God's bodily or outwardly spoken word is able to sanctify something, God gives whoever speaks it; and then the pabstry is helped along with him. For the words "this is my body" bring the body of Christ from heaven, even if his drunken sheriff with the red pants spoke them at the beer soup 2c. Should one also look for sinister words, since one wants to explain the faith clearly?

473. to the sixth. He now believes what he never believed before, nor in this book, namely: 3) "That those who pass and receive the Sacrament eat and drink the body of Christ in bread and wine orally, even though they do not have faith." For he has previously taught publicly, even within the four years, that only the faithful eat the body of Christ. But the insecurity of the rich oppresses him, so now he preaches another way. On the other hand, he also denied in this book that he had never taught that the body of Christ was in the bread. And here he says, "The body and blood of Christ in the bread." Thirdly, he recognized above "that oral eating must be understood sacramentally," that is, that the sign is eaten which for its meaning is called the body of Christ. But here he also says that the body save. For this sacrament alone brings the believer show (I say with reluctance); if I have now taught rightly in remission of sin, so forgiveness is with the believer alone; it, why does he say: "I have never taught a piece rightly" for faith alone knows it, and [does] this sacrament nothing ?

476 Luther speaks of purgatory in the eighth place: "I know that there is a purgatory, but there is nothing to be taught about it in the church, nor is there anything to be done about it with writings or vigils. Haec ille. Here I would like to hear from Luther: why his purgatory is not to be taught in the church? If he knows anything, then do as the most unfaithful shipmen do, who, when they come ashore, warn those traveling from land that they should palate themselves 2) as Tullius says: Ah! Dear, show us the "Scyllam!" If he does not, I will not only say that he is doing like the wicked boys who tell their companions about birds' nests, but since they do not know any, only that they bring their conscious nests from the companions, but I will say: May God's spirit not suffer that one sees the harm of his neighbor and does not warn; and if the prophet knows that the sword is coming and does not warn, then the blood of the bystanders is sought from his hands.

477 But all disgrace put aside, so we want to extinguish Luther's purgatory with one word, whether it would go Nobis house 3) whether the ridge together. Joh. am 5.: "I tell you amen, amen, that whoever hears my word, and trusts in him who sent me, has eternal life, and comes into no judgment, punishment, nor court (judicium Dstfo hebraico idiotismo), but has already passed from death into life." If Luther does not believe the word, then luge what kind of faith he has. But since he says: others have attacked the article, I ask him: who was the first to attack it at this time? If 5) he affirms the truth, he must attack Zwingli.

479 To the tenth. Luther says: 6) "I keep images, bells, chasuble, church decorations, altars, lights and the like free. Whoever wants to, may leave it" 2c. Behold, pious princes, how our adversary, the devil, deals with us! Images are forbidden and rejected in so many ways in the New and Old Testaments that no believer can despise God's word in such a way that he can count it free; and Luther puts them under bells and lights. What does he take God's word for? Yes, he says:

Luther there: "Although I consider images from Scripture and from good histories to be almost useful, they are free and arbitrary" 2c. I ask Luther here, from which Scripture the images may be proven useful? From holy? so he says to God and all His servants in heaven and earth, which is not; for neither God nor they have never let up nor tolerated the images with a single word; but have always forbidden them to the highest and also stormed them. One knows well that we speak of the venerated images. Or from pagan history? He has not read them very much. I was very sorry. He can boast little from them. From Christian histories? that is, from the histories where the learned fantasists have expanded good and evil (Luther understands me well, which I mean), false and invented things into a harbor cheese 7)? So God forgive Luther! Does he have no other judgment in reading, than that he also does not see in the same, which of revered images reads, which does not; which would come from the mad head of the fantasist, which from an understanding loving mind of truth? For I will say it freely: Where have we a history writer since the apostles' times, whom we now present to a wise pagan?

Keeping the vestments and the altar is the same as if the children of Israel had left the altars of their idols standing, since they no longer sacrificed to them. He who teaches to keep the chasubles 8) and the gilded tables, teaches the pope to wait until his kingdom may arise again. I understand church adornment to be the delicious ornamentation of the sanctuary. Is of one value with the images, but so much more evil that they look more public on the Gutzel 9).

Whoever lets the stork nests stay, they will truly come back.

482 It is wicked to be rapacious and warlike: but it would be better, pious princes! you would do them all harm, 1) neither that they should provoke the enemy to rise up again. He that taketh his wife in whoredom with strange keys, garments, and jewels, and leaveth them unto her, teacheth her to go on whoring. Thus idolatry is made by the holy prophets an adulterous wife; and if one keeps the idols that have been set up for worship, one does likewise, as if we might not otherwise be drawn enough from God by the impotent power of the flesh, but we must also have a suit that draws us from God.

But that is all. Luther leaves a pretty sign, by which one sees that he does not speak out of spirit or faith, but out of quarrel, and says: "For I do not hold with the iconoclasts. Here we say that we truly do not keep it with them either. But since one may do so with order and with peace of mind, one should not regard Luther's word as chiding us iconoclasts. What does not give his deed is ghosts, enthusiasts, iconoclasts. We should put new wine into new wineskins, not into old ones, and we should guard ourselves against all evil. If we do not defend the venerated images, the vestments and altars, why do we want to keep them, if we, born again through the gospel, want to be a new people? Some churches have a hundred altars; if they no longer want to have mass, what are the sacrilegious piles of stones for? Yes, bells and lights, if they come in hope of a good work, as especially the lights are dangerous, should also be left alone 2c.

484 To the eleventh. Enough has been said above about the danger he puts all his writings in, if he refers or testifies only to those that have gone out from him [for] four or five years. However, I would also like to turn back from these same Lutherans, if I were as distressed about him as he is about us, and not only that, but also indicate from this that he is against the greenhorns, who stand out so freshly, and yet know nothing at all, except that they, put off on Luther's teaching, insist and heresy. They also deal with practicalities, which I know well to write now and then through their town clerks. One understands well what Sprengler 2) Works them drive. The pious cities like to incite against their preachers, and they against each other. Ask the honorable councilors at V. [Ulm], A. [Augsburg] and M. [Memmingen], what and who writes to them, without which I do not know. Now asking 3) [them] God almost, that he gives them right understanding, or else they become desolate to shame! For even Luther must be overcome, and that [i.e. if] he were equal to a hundred thousand; quia omnium potentissima veritas, for truth is above all power.

In the twelfth place, Luther testifies: 4) "if he would say something else out of the necessity of death, then he wants to have it known that it is wrong and inspired by the devil.

486 I will prove that this is an open despair. First, it is a despair of the thing. For if he trusted to maintain the matter with Scripture, he would defy the same, and [not] 5) take the matter upon himself so dear. Nevertheless, I must also draw us out. Where, then, has our one ever stood up, or thought so much of himself, as to defy? But this is the cause, that we stand on the firm living ground, which no one can take away from us, nor with any tempest can we win. But it also serves ad invidiam et odium to make us hateful, that we bring the stern, dear man to what we have truly thought him to be all along. But I hear well that we should spare his untruthfulness, and let our God with His Word be the hindrance 6) so that we do not make Luther restless in his sweet sleep. Let no one be sorry for us!

Accordingly, it is a despairing of himself. For, without one seeing from the words that he is afraid of him [i.e. himself] behind the matter, I will prove that it is a desperate presumption, thus: Paul writes 1 Cor. 13: X parte⁷) cognoscimus, et ex parte prophetamus, we increase in knowledge and prophecy. So Luther thinks that he may neither become more learned nor more enlightened, but that where he would otherwise have learned, the devil would have given it to him: so he does not see his way to God to teach him further; and that is despair. For

1) Love alone is never lacking; but prophecy, that is, the revelation of truth, tongues and knowledge are lacking, that is, they never become so perfect that he who has them neither lacks nor lacks anything. So if there has never been a prophet who has not increased for and for, a man who understands tongues, a scholar: why did Luther dare to say that 2) he would not become more learned and knowledgeable in this matter? Is it because of God that he does not take care of him, that he does not greatly enlighten him, which I do not hope he would ever have despaired of. If it is because of him that he thinks himself to be nothing at all that he does not know most perfectly, it is an ungodly presumption, and therefore despair.

But if anyone should say: Now you also hold yourselves in such a way that you think you are sure of the matter, we say yes; but that we are going to be reported, that is not. But Luther now recognizes that it is the sacramental body of Christ, and has never been so close to it before. If he has now increased in knowledge, why does he reject it again? Because that is out. He recognizes, like Berengarius, that the body of Christ is sacramental. Now so wind and turn as he will, so it will go with him, like the jay in the glue, 3) the more he cries out, is weighed [i.e. moves] and wriggles, the more he sticks. So we have promised Luther that we will drive him more and more to the angle, so that he must deny himself God's right and sound knowledge; or else he must deny this error. I also reckon that he will forgive himself for writing more, so that he will see that we are victorious over him, however much he writes. But not we; he who makes himself victorious in us.

489 And this is the most blessed thing, that he confesses his faith, like that priest, who, after he had reproached the sheep, ends thus: "Behold! if you do not change, and I also, then we will become of the devil together; God help you and me Father, Son and Holy Spirit! So Luther also ends here, and says: 4) "Where I would say otherwise, I will herewith publicly confess. that it is wrong and that the devil has introduced it.

be given to me. For this help me my Lord and Savior Jesus Christ! That book he began with the devil, this one he ends with him. So God decrees that if we want to be wise without His word, we will become fools.

490 Thus we who have enough of the twelve pieces of the Christian faith 5) and who also believe without doubt, have found twelve pieces in Luther's faith, some of which are incompetent, some of which are not faithfully presented from the essay, some of which are wrong, and some of which are even contrary to God's Word and the true Christian faith.

491 Still thus we recognize that commonly the very highest ingenia have fallen into something like quarrelsome correctness 6). How did Cicero attack Sallustium beyond measure? Hieronymus Augustinum enough rough angeschnerzt, 7) and, which we should never forget, Paul Barnabam, Acts 15, 37-39, by John Marcus? Since truly the noblest harness and weapons. For why should John Marcus not have gone with them again in the business of the gospel? for he never denied himself of it, even though he had gone from Pamphylia to Jerusalem, Acts 13:13. 13, 13. Here Barnabas (even an uncontested, serious, but also mild, chaste Christian and apostle, that I often regret that we no longer have his writings and stories) was right about it, and Paul was wrong. Although God ordered it for more growth of the Gospel. Still, even though they were so quarrelsome that they departed from one another, they became one again; for Paul answered him quite honorably, 1 Corinthians 9, that it was laid to their charge that they led their wives with them, which Paul wrote long after the quarrel.

492 So then, our humble request to Luther, by the spirit in which we all live, in which he preached the gospel when we believed; by the same spirit in which we too will be found on the last day, have preached: let him remember that he is not above error, just as Paul in the heat was too much of a ruler 8) who nevertheless either compares or surpasses all the apostles in doctrine and holiness. We know the manly and chivalrous standing out that Luther did against the papacy, since no one was allowed to dare to do so. We know, however, that he, too, although

"I beg of all pious hearts who would bear me witness and plead for me that I may stand firm in such faith and resolve my end; for (since God is for) whether I would say otherwise out of temptation and mortal need, it shall be nothing and I want to have it publicly confessed herewith" 2c.

God will! recognize that his doctrine and knowledge exist to a fair degree; and will perceive that the devil does not seduce him with arrogance. God has given him spirit of power enough; only he does not turn the power to his glory; so we will surely become one in all things. May the true God grant us this! Amen.

493. Therefore, pious princes, let our writings be read in God's name by people whom your wisdom knows well how to humble, whose minds and aspirations are captive to the obedience of God; for all those who want to preserve flesh and blood here with their own sincerity are captives of the flesh and the letter, even though it alienates them; And want to put on us as if we were of natural account and nature of the flesh against the bodily-fleshly presence, which is truly not; for if so, we would not have come to hold the opposites before those who have had much higher reason before us, neither we; for the opinion against which we fight has always been contrary to human reason. But is this not only carnal, but something more wicked, to hold the misunderstood letter so ludicrously that one does not want to hear clearer Scripture? We do not mean to reject the letter, but to hold it in high esteem; but for the sake of right understanding, otherwise the letter is not only useless, but also harmful.

494 But on our side is the faith, the Scriptures, the custom of the first Christians, the custom of the earliest Christians, the mind of the Elders teachers. Although in this the chattering parakeets 1) are so blind that they do not see that the ancients, in calling this sacrament the body of Christ and a sacrifice, always lead such a form with words and senses that one can see that they have talked and understood after Christ in the same way as we teach. Now, in a few days, an impatient job has defiled the booklet Päscasii, which is entirely with us, with his annotations. The good man does not understand what the old custom is, but where he sees that the pious Pascasius speaks of the bodily meal, that he only understands the visible supper and sacrament, and then speaks of the right spiritual meal again in such a way that one can see that he only lived for a sign 2); so this polite chancellor is here, and adds: Caute legas, one should read it carefully. For this they do not look at the time; for among the ancients it was often said: We eat the true body of Christ, for: We eat the sacrament of the true body; therefore the Marcionites attributed to him a spiritual, not a true body. Then Porphyrius also mocked them, saying that Christians eat their God, which was not the opinion of the ancients. We have all the similarities of the Easter lamb in type and words. Therefore, for God's sake, do not take anything for evil. May He preserve you together with your territories! Amen. Given in Zurich at the end of August, in the year 1528.

sent by Christ together with the other disciples to proclaim his future and to confirm it with miraculous signs performed in the name of Christ: so a devout Christian might be driven into error and despondency in many ways, as now some famous and highly learned preachers of the holy gospel have so greatly offended error.

*This writing appeared in 1526 in a single edition under the title: "Wider den unmilden Irrthum Meister Ulrich Zwinglens, so er verneinet die wahrhaftige Gegenwärtigkeit des allerheiligsten Leibes und Blutes Christi im Sacrament". It was completed, as Walch indicates, in June 1526. We give the text according to Walch's old edition.

The fact that many heartfelt, faithful disciples and lovers of God's Word are also grieved by the fact that they doubt not a little who should be believed, if each part uses evangelical doctrine and Word.

But let every devout Christian heart be comforted and rejoice in God, for in this sharp and most dangerous challenge to our true faith, we sense the truth in its own way, bright and clear; our thoughts and attention must be focused on it alone, and we must by no means cling to the ministers as if they would no longer want to fall away from the truth they have recognized and often preached, as is evident not only from the examples of Solomon and Judas that have just been given. But the light of the whole Gospel takes the heart of the faithful from all creatures, even from the ministers of the Word, and teaches to adhere to the Word in faith alone. That is why Christ warns us so highly and faithfully in the Gospel of Matthew 7 and 24 that we should pay constant attention to the false teachers with the utmost diligence, because they would also break out with their teachings so subtly and quickly that even the elect (where possible) would finally be deceived.

3) There is truly no more swift, healing 1) and harmful seduction to be expected, than that which, alas! Now, through those whom we have considered to be the most knowledgeable in evangelical preaching, many thousands of simple Christians are being led astray by these unholy seducers, who are giving us the pure body and blood of Christ in his delightful and joyful presence in the sacrament, 2) and are giving us only dry bread and sour wine; For if they would prosper in such a way that we would let fall the mighty words of Christ, opened in his supper, then it would soon be over for the whole of Christ and the outward word of God. How unfortunate! Some apparently now also deny Christ's innocent humanity, and ascribe sin to our faithful Redeemer according to his human nature 3); only that they do not have to confess the Body and Blood of Christ in the Sacrament; that will also soon come to pass. Therefore, we are assured in the Word, as the true evangelical teaching is now being attacked by us everywhere (as Christ said), that our preaching flows from God and not from human speech 4).

1) In the old edition: "heler" i.e. more complete.

2) i.e. to snatch.

3) In the old edition: "feinde", which, however, Walch has already explained with "sin".

4) In the original: Derme Rätte.

4) It has not happened differently since the first proclamation of the true gospel; so the false prophets, besides the tyrannical persecution of the world, have always intruded with false doctrine and pretense of holiness, that 5) Paul complains the most almost in all epistles, especially to the Romans at the end, in both epistles to the Corinthians, also to the Galatians, to Timothy and everywhere. Also Lucas writes of him Apost, at 20. For this John [in] his first epistle at the other [Cap., v. 18. 19.] says: "There are now many unbelievers who have gone out from us, because they were not of us; for since they would have been of us, they should have remained with us." O! how is it already 6) in the day, in what spirit those have preached and written, who a year 7) ago recently so clearly preached and described the presence of the most holy body and blood of our Savior Christ in the Sacrament, also the abuses in this wonderful Sacrament so even as damnable blasphemy, therefore denounced, that the holy body and precious blood of Christ should be present, [not] 8) tract and used differently, than Christ himself has taught, acted, and prescribed. Also, the same preachers have understood themselves in writing and orally 9) before everyone, that they have used nothing in this true doctrine except what the pure unfailing eternal Word of God is able to do.

Now that the believers, by God's grace, have partly beaten back the old errors, and with great joy and devotion receive the body and blood of the Lord under both forms from such delicious preachers, oh! how unashamedly they now fall, the preachers, from such Christian doctrine, which in particular doubt has never been attractive to them from the heart! Therefore, without faith and God, their ministry must be recognized; for they boast that some years ago, even while they were preaching the gospel, they knew well that there was nothing in the sacrament but bread and wine.

Alas! the harmful preachers! Woe, woe to the perilous times! they must ever confess that they have deceived so many thousands of souls with doctrine which they themselves did not believe nor believe to be righteous.

5) Set by us instead of: that.

6) Maybe: beautiful.

7) This probably refers to the Swabian preachers and the Sungramma Suevicum, No. 14 in this volume.

8) The context seems to us to require a "not".

9) Perhaps: "versähen" d. i. known.

10) i.e. harmful. Zwingli makes fun of this expression "harmful" in his answer § 6.

have. Oh God! How do you find such thoughtless Christians, who listen to or believe in such windpipes! Indeed, if it were a matter of a little temporal good, such a two-year-old would be rejected after his divided speech. But such preachers are high, seeming, and sweet words; misuse for this purpose the precious languages, Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, which, as the noble gifts of God, should be used only to honor and praise God, and serve truth, not error. Read of such prudence the prophet Isaiah 33 and St. Paul 1 Cor. 1, also Christ in Evangelio Matthäi 11. Thus 1) they open the mouths of the simple, and especially of the forward, and turn white into black; and what was yes with them today is no tomorrow.

(7) Because their words, which tickle the ears, seem so adorned, and because they are respected as spiritual people, and because the gospel of Jesus and the cross sound in their mouths for and for, they have a special holy spirit, which must also confirm quite repugnant things to them. They also create new, unknown names for themselves, as if they were not of common German birth; they also give one another the high titles that belong to Christ alone according to his divine nature. From this it is easy to determine whether they truly preach or write from the faith of the simple, humble Lord Christ; for he says to the like of them on the 5th of John: "How can you believe, who receive praise from one another, and do not seek the true praise, which is from God alone? Namely, they have set themselves apart from the number of those who, unwavering, according to the calling of God to evangelical preaching, persevere in God's word, and with the eternal truth, the Son of God; [to whom] in their preaching Yes is Yes, and not Yes is No, therefore they cheerfully agree with St. Paulo, 2 Cor. 1, may give thanks to the faithful GOD, that their preaching, [God's] word, has been Yes, and not No, with all the hearers; for Paul also says from GOD to Galatians on 1: "If we also, or an angel from heaven, should preach unto you otherwise than we have preached unto you; let it be accursed."

(8) Therefore, the pious, steadfast Christians should not be frightened, for we easily find that with such strange preachers the angel Satan has disguised himself as if he were an angel of light; and let us all praise God that we now know that we have attained the right word of God, true understanding, even without ceasing.

1) In the old edition: spreissen.

Ask God to protect and keep His little new army from such sharp-witted preachers, according to His divine promise Luc. 12.

For the devout, simple Christians who are eager to learn and do the will of the Father in evangelical doctrine alone are assured that they can know which doctrine is from God or from men, John 7.

The living Word of God must therefore be attacked on both sides in the most severe way, according to its inevitable nature: by tyrants with the sword; by false preachers with a wrong interpretation of the Scriptures and fraudulent pretenses of fabricated holiness.

(11) And if the much-thought-of apostate brethren want to say that they have so long behaved the truth concerning the sacrament to the weak for good, they may not at all embellish it. For God does not want His children to be brought up with lies, but with unconfessed truth. The holy apostles also by no means falsified the truth for the sake of the weak, but only allowed some of the old holy ceremonies, and 2) taught that they were not necessary for salvation. For in such a hurry at the beginning of Christianity, it could not be understood by everyone that the ceremonies were all only figures of the future Savior; therefore, the weak should be allowed for a time, out of love, to make use of such old divine ordinances.

(12) It does not follow, however, that one merely gives bread and wine to the faithful for the blood and body of Christ, and teaches and preaches the same out of a false heart and a deceived mouth, as if Christ's body and blood were truly present; and then runs back with a thousandfold indignation, and opens the false deceptive mind, and excuses themselves with it, that they have lied for the sake of the weak, and deceived so many thousands of people.

(13) Indeed, more wicked preachers have never come into the world; but hereafter, in a short time, their foolishness shall come to light more clearly, through me and many others, with the help of God.

14. half a year ago I took up the pen to warn the pious believers against this miserable error; thus have

2) Here we have deleted the word "not" because it does not fit into the context. However, this word was undoubtedly in the original edition, which Zwingli makes good use of in his answer (No. 26, § 35 s.). It is obviously either a typographical error or a printing error.

Some pious Christian brothers turned me away, thinking (as I fully respect) whether perhaps these unstable teachers would quickly recognize their error themselves and come to the truth.

(15) I also thought myself that they would easily reintroduce the antagonism with flowery words. For some of the same new prophets, with their own handwriting, have eagerly urged me not to write anything against them, as the spirit of such people is unsecured and not comforted in themselves. But, alas, while we have been silent, they have spread their poison with Latin and German books everywhere.

16 For this reason, I, nor any pious servant of the Word, have the right to remain silent any longer; we want, then, along with the ingratitude of God's grace, also to make ourselves suspect of error. Now that [1] the Serene Principality, the Margraviate of Baden, out of God's great mercy, is still preserved from such damned error; [2] and I in Baden, a poor and industrious drener, am required to teach God's word in a Christian and peaceful manner (as I also trust God) according to God's action; [3] I also oppose and resist the said error without ceasing. I am also eager and happy to oppose and resist the said error without ceasing, and to fight it with the holy Gospel, as long as the Spirit of God sustains my life, and to revenge the wolf (1) (before he wounds and destroys the beloved sheep, bought with the body and blood that Christ has given us); (4) and to prevent, with all possible diligence, the authorities in our country from selling the books of error, but to keep them out of the margraviate: Three days ago I saw a new booklet at the market in Baden, in which at the end there is a final speech, which reads: The true Corpus Christi of Christ and his blood is present in the sacrament of the altar.

But who he is, or from what spirit he has prescribed this final speech, or what he subsequently introduces, I will leave that alone, for I have no regard for man in divine teaching; so God's truth is just, even if the stones stop to speak. There is also no doubt that God's word is unchanging in Himself, even if the devil himself were forced to speak it; for the denial of God in the speech of Balaam, Numbers 23, is just as unfailingly true as in the mouth of Samuel. Also Caiaphas has just from God's Sent 3) truly pronounced by Christ, John 11, ohn faith, as Paul with faith.

(18) Forasmuch then as we teach and preach without ceasing here at Baden, out of an ohu-contradictory understanding of the words of Christ, that the true body and the precious blood of Christ are present in the Lord's supper, I cannot deny this truth, whether it be spoken by a believer or an unbeliever. Since the presentation of divine truth in the above-mentioned booklet, thus poisoned and seductive, has been read by many people, and nothing against it is contained in the booklet for a true reason, I have not been able to avoid stimulating the wrong mind with short words, thus:

(19) Zwingli of Zurich unashamedly points out the truth that the true body and blood of Christ are present in the sacrament in the much-thought-of booklet, and says: "This article is unchristian, for it openly disputes God's word and the articles of our true old Christian faith. Also, he dares to prove his impudent pretence with the Scriptures, and says, first of all:

The flesh of Christ is not at all useful to eat, John 6. The flesh is not useful, so Christ did not give it to us to eat. Mark well, thou devout Christian, in the first word thou shalt hear how freely this man wants to force the eternal Word of God upon a dead, false, and seductive mind. It is also revealed here that there is no understanding of the doctrine of the true faith among the wretched people, and so on:

Zwingli wants to force us to hear the word of God in the sacramental eating of the body of Christ, as if one eats beef and veal. And so he denies that we cannot eat Christ's flesh. Every devout Christian knows this well, and there is no one of such a coarse mind who would make of Christ's supper a fleshly filling of the belly and eating; for only these subtle masters, who introduce such coarse fleshly, even beastly doctrine with beautifully polished words. Therefore, Christian reader, "take to heart" that Christ teaches and pronounces differently about the eating and drinking of his flesh and blood, in two places of the holy Gospel, truly and clearly. For there are two kinds of eating here, and no such gross eating of flesh (as the new prophets arrogantly impose their own urge 4) on the word of God) is made or understood of any of them.

3) d. i. Fitting.

4) d. i. Compulsion.

The first way to eat the flesh and drink the blood of Christ is entirely spiritual and inward, for which the eater and drinker have no need of any outward sign or being, whether of heavenly or earthly creatures. For it is accomplished only according to the eternal Word of God in faith inwardly without sense or voice, and thus the flesh of Christ is eaten.

23. Whoever firmly and without doubt believes that the Father has given His only beloved Son to us, that He in His innocent humanity (taken for our sake) suffered torture and death in His pure most holy body, also shed His precious blood, and thus paid for the sin and guilt of all men born of Adam, and put an end to God's wrath and vengeance, and after such faith thus recognizes God's unfathomable gentleness that he places all his trust in this sufficient redemption with the highest pleasure: he eats and drinks the body and blood of Christ without ceasing. For such eating and drinking inwardly is nothing else than believing in Christ, which is necessary at all times. Thus the believer eats and drinks the body and blood of Christ every hour at the true supper of the Lord, which is followed by eternal rest; thus he abides in Christ, and Christ in him, as the text openly expresses, John 6, that Christ says: "He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, abideth in me, and I in him." Of eating and drinking, then, Christ says and teaches throughout the whole chapter; and nothing carnal or bodily is to be understood there, as Christ himself explains; for the parables, here indicated, of the flesh, blood, and bread, are thus understood from the words of Christ alone; as the bodily food inwardly 2) keeps a man alive according to his bodily powers and healthy for a time; so through faith Christ, inwardly in the mind, becomes present to the believer with blessed fruit and effect of his innocent suffering and death, even the shedding of his blood.

(24) But since Christ our Saviour indicated such a way of eating His body and drinking His blood, it was all heard by the Jews as if the Lord had spoken of eating flesh in the flesh; therefore they said, "This is a hard saying, and who can hear it? And Zwingli wants to charge us with this coarse understanding, as if there were no one who could understand this chapter on spiritual and inward eating without his teaching.

(25) But consider, every one, how formally he censures the Scripture here, when he says in his first probation, The flesh of Christ is no use at all to eat; and forces the Scripture, without all Christian understanding, that Christ said, John 6: "The flesh is no use. Dear reader! Hear here a subtle artificial master of the Gospel; for Zwingli would have it that this is the understanding that Christ said: "His flesh is not useful"; although Christ speaks of no particular flesh here, but alone points to the gross carnal understanding of the Jews; therefore Christ sets "spirit" and "flesh" against each other in the Gospel manner. And as Paul commonly calls the whole man "flesh," because he, according to his mind and desires, does not hear and love otherwise than according to his own use, lust, and pleasure. In the same way, all Scripture is heard by the carnal man and is not accepted otherwise.

26. The Spirit, however, draws the whole man in faith from himself, and leads penetratingly all knowledge and desires into God with the highest delight and confidence, from which then is raised the godly life that abides eternally in the believer. Thus Christ says here to the Jews: "The Spirit makes life"; that is, he brings the mind of living faith with my words; "but the flesh is not useful"; that is, the carnal mind, comprehended by senses and human reason, without the Spirit in faith, is of no use at all, nor can it produce fruit in the Word. Thus it is found how masterfully the new prophets interpret the Scriptures.

27 Furthermore, if Zwingli wants to force the word of Christ upon his most holy flesh, how can it be that, according to such a mind, God's supreme mercy in the sweetest work of redemption is not condemned? For if the flesh of Christ is not useful, wherewith are we then redeemed from eternal death? If the body of Christ is not useful, then the suffering and death in the body is not useful either. Thus the simple are forced, under high spiritual words, into the highest contempt of God; and nothing else is to be expected, but that such holy prophets will preach a whole spiritual Christ. For Christ's body and flesh are of no use to them.

(28) But it is evident from these miracle-workers how he produces such precious arguments from his rhetoric; for the text of Christ's much-reported words is thus, "The flesh is not useful," and is drawn from no circumstance to no particular flesh. Thus penetrates my good

1) "Also" here stands for "and".

2) Instead of "internal," it should probably read "external" or "bodily."

Zwingli based the words on Christ's most holy flesh. With God's help, however, it shall be further revealed what such people have taught, so that I will subsequently, with better leisure, discover Ber subtle Meister Fundament. Enough is said herewith in haste about the inward way of eating Christ's body and drinking His blood, and how skillfully and Christianly Zwingli brings out the Scriptures in the first word.

The other way of eating the body and blood of Christ is not included in the sixth chapter of John. But the holy evangelists, Matthew on the 26th, Marcus on the 14th, Lucas on the 22nd, and Paul on 1 Cor. 11, describe the supper of our Lord with whole public and bare words: "that Christ took the bread, and gave thanks, and brake it, and gave it to his disciples, and said: Take and eat; this is my body, which is given for you. Likewise also he took the cup, and gave thanks, and gave unto them, saying, Drink ye all of it: this is my blood of the new testament, which is poured out for you for remission of sins: as often as ye do it, ye shall do it in remembrance of me."

(30) So Christ gives his body and blood, above inward eating, in outward, visible, and sensible signs, which are also bodily eaten and drunk; and yet his most holy body, even his precious blood, remain invisible, and incomprehensible to all the senses and reason of man, but truly present by the power and almighty effect of his eternal word.

(31) Neither can the eating of flesh and the drinking of blood be heard here, as the crude prophets attribute to us: for the true body [and] blood of Christ has no bodily effect or sensibility here in the sacrament, but only for the consolation and spreading of faith among the pious children of God, who without doubt believe the simple revealed words of Christ. Therefore it is a sign only for fruitfulness to the believers and not to the unbelievers. So that the first inward partaking in faith (as indicated above) must also precede this outward eating; for without faith there is no profit even in this joyful supper of Christ.

(32) From this it is recently evident how impure, carnal, and animalistic the wretched people teach, to inestimable annoyance, about the pure and wonderful supper of Christ.

(33) Nothing here is changed in the body of the believer, or bodily sensibility exercised in partaking of the body and blood of Christ;

But the unwavering faith of the words of Christ is confirmed in the certain presence of the body and blood of our Lord. Therefore, man does not eat the flesh of Christ in a carnal way, but according to the nature and content of the almighty and mighty words of Christ: "This is my body", "This is my blood".

34 Now we want to continue in the shortest possible way the prescribed foundations of Zwinglin in the much reported seductive booklet.

In the beginning, there is no need at all for the true discerners of God's Word to seem to hear of the first appearance, as no reason at all is found behind the new prophets in the interpretation of the Scriptures, in all that they pretend against the presence of the holy body and blood of Christ. For they have taken away the key of true understanding, and thus have accepted the kingdom of God, that is, the right inherent understanding of the true holy Scriptures, and thus have barred the pious Christians from the unified meaning of God's word: that as they no longer recognize Christ in his word because of great art, they also no longer want to let anyone come to the truth, and thus understand this:

It is impossible that a letter, even the smallest detail of it, in the holy scriptures can be understood thoroughly and for salvation without the true faith, before which all human reason and wisdom perish and must disappear. Now these masters of the new heresy take away everything that is taught in faith about the wonderful presence of the true body and blood of Christ in the sacrament, according to the nature of God's eternal word, and insist on this according to human (deceived and seduced reason) knowledge; and teach that one should not accept or admit anything further than what human reason can well comprehend. Therefore, according to such human doctrine, one must not have faith at the supper of Christ; the sensible masters can do it all well without faith and God with their pagan cleverness and art; and though they speak sweetly of faith with their mouths, they mean nothing else than that one should believe their fictitious understanding; And whoever does not surrender to the mighty gods in a hurry, they will exploit him and call him a priest, a preacher of the flesh, and other disgraceful speeches (as such people's new spirit is able to do).

(37) Therefore, if all Christian doctrine is consistent only in the faith that God gives, 1) and here in the

1) d. i. consists.

Night meal the reasoners from the faith of the words of God lead the simple-minded into the deceived human reason.

(38) Whoever wants to be a Christian and true believer should beware of this new perverse preaching, as of the most pernicious teaching of men, never heard on earth.

But lest anyone think I am doing too much for him, I refer to the wretched book of the supreme master of this new art, which he sent to the pious preachers in Swabia some months ago, where his resolution is: One should not accept anything more at Christ's supper than what reason can comprehend.

40 Therefore, where we have a spark of true faith, we are not easily frightened by Zwinglin's compulsion here.

41. [This is in the other ground of his probation, how he compels the innocent Scripture, John on the third, when Christ said to Nicodemo, "That which is born of the flesh is flesh." If now (says Zwingli) the bodily flesh of Christ is eaten; nothing but flesh comes of it. Fie 1) and shame on him who says this! I have never read nor heard such an explanation of the pure Word of God, only from Zwingli, who himself also fritters from his artificial glosses; yes, without doubt fie, shame and vice above all vices, to drag the living Word of God to such a carnal and animalistic 2) mind!

(42) There may be nothing in the innocent words of Christ that Zwingli puts forward, for no one has ever taught that the body of Christ is eaten sensibly like other food, since he is invisible and present in the sign, incomprehensible to all the senses; likewise his holy blood. Therefore, as said before, nothing corporeal belongs to the eater, nor is it changed in him by the body of Christ.

But, dear reader, see how Zwingli actually forces the holy words of Christ to prove that the true body of Christ is not present in the sacrament. Christ says, "That which is born of the flesh is flesh." Therefore, says this Master, the Body of Christ cannot be present. That is to say, wisely to fiddle around in the Scriptures, if perhaps no one could notice on what blessed ground Christ pronounced the words; for here it is not thought of what flesh-eating gives birth to in man. 3) birth of all the children of Adam, who are all conceived and born in sins. Therefore, they all come from the tribe and remain according to their nature nothing but flesh, that is, nothing of the Spirit of God is in them; for all their mind, desire and inclination flee from God and penetrate into themselves to love and esteem themselves great above all things. Therefore, this birth is prevented from everything that requires GOD's glory in us. Therefore Christ says, "If ye be not born again, neither shall ye enter into the kingdom of heaven." Which birth is not of flesh and blood, but of the Spirit in faith. Now this scripture points Zwingli to the sacrament of the true body and blood of Christ; therefore one may well notice that he has hit it very well. Yes, if he were a Zwingli and not a Zwingli of the Scriptures, that God's word would have to agree with his teaching!

44. the lord says here about the fleshly spirit.

45 Thus it may be easily obtained that this scripture, "that which is born of flesh is flesh," may not be understood to imply that the true body of Christ is not present in the sacrament.

Thirdly, Zwingli presses on to confirm his error with the innocent two sayings of Matthew 26: "You will not have me forever"; Matthew 28: "I will remain with you until the end of the world. Zwingli says: "The first word must be understood in terms of human nature alone, for according to divine nature and grace he is with us all the way, as the following word indicates. And Zwingli insinuates that all those who preach the flesh also falsify God's word, if they say that Christ will be with us in the flesh, but he has said that we will not have him with us in every way. Truly, anyone who does not know what it is to write poetry and to recite the Scriptures contrary to their nature would be frightened by such an artificial person. But, dear reader, it is Zwingli who writes such delicious things here.

We know well that Christ says to his disciples just before his suffering: "You will not have me forever," and that this can by no means deny the presence of his body in the sacrament, invisible and without all sensibility. For Christ says of his presence in this text, in a mortal and visible way, that afterwards he would often be shown the honor and devotion that the damsel did when she poured the precious ointment on his head at Bethany in the house of Simon the leper, as Matthew puts it, and also Marcus in the 14th verse. Therefore, we confess that Christ is such

1) Original: Pfuch.

2) In the old edition: fischeschen.

3) "gives birth" put by us instead of: gebühret.

He died once and rose again, and can no longer be mortal; all this remains unharmed if we do not preach the presence of the body and blood of Christ in a carnal way (as Zwingli did), as the almighty word of Christ expresses it, since the Lord says: "This is my body", "this is my blood". So also this marvelous presence of the body is nothing contrary to the common presence of a divine kind; for GOD, who is present, works mightily at the Lord's supper in the Word, as the text reads.

48] Fourthly, one of Zwingli's innocent scriptures is used to protect his dry bread and sour wine. John 16: "I came forth from the Father and am come into the world; again I leave the world and go to the Father." This must be understood (Zwingli speaks) only of the leaving of human nature; for according to divine he may not depart from us; so he is ever not in the Sacrament.

So, dear Zwingli, take the whole Bible and say 1) about the visible and sensible presence of Christ: so we say without constraint and with sure faith, in virtue of the words of Christ, about a bodily, real, but nevertheless invisible and insensible presence of Christ's body and blood.

But the pious Christian people must suffer the misery of the new prophets, who want to confirm the bright and obvious error (under the appearance of the eternal word of God, presented with many writings according to their invented mind) against the true spirit of God.

Fifthly, Zwingli cites the evangelical word Marci 13: "If any man shall say unto you: Behold! here is Christ; behold! there; believe it not." Therefore one should not believe those (says Zwingli) who preach that the body and blood of Christ is present.

(52) It is truly disconcerting to answer such puerile diligence. For who has ever taught that Christ is to be believed here or there according to sensual sight? Nor does Christ himself say this to warn us against such teaching, but about special places and sects, about false clergymen, as if a special and certain Christ of his good pleasure were invented in religions and places of his own devising. Therefore, no faith should be placed in such things, for Christ, our Savior, has his certain pleasure and our following in faith alone.

1) In the original: vsag.

The Lord, who decided under the cross to keep his commandments, cannot be found in monasticism or hunnery, nor can he be blessedly heard in prayer in one church or city more than another, even though miraculous signs may be seen. But it does not follow from all this that the true body of Christ and the most holy blood are not visibly present in the Lord's supper.

The sixth is the scripture Apost. 1: "Two angelic men say, Why stand ye looking into heaven? This same Jesus, which is received from you into heaven, shall so come again, even as ye have seen him go into heaven." "Here must break all those (says Zwingli) who say, Christ took from us only the face 2) of his body, not the body."

Dear Master, have a little mercy on us, so that we do not have to break away from your art right away. For we will not be turned away from Christ with grief. We know and confess that Christ has ascended bodily, truly and visibly into heaven, and has taken not only the bodily face but also the whole human substance from the disciples and ascended into heaven. But it does not at all imply that the same body is not invisibly present in the power of the almighty words when the supper is held, as Christ instituted it.

55 Therefore, if Zwingli thinks that he even forced it, I think that it is 3) yet undone. There is a great difference between the Ascension, as Lucas writes in the place of the preconceived, Apost. 1, and the true presence hidden in the bread, as Lucas described in the Gospel on 22. We have also never taught that Christ visibly enters the bread when he ascended to heaven; for if he were to be seen entering the bread in this way, there would also have to be an almost large bread, even if we were to see all of it, we could not believe it, but we could see it; for Zwingli teaches here that nothing is to be believed except what is evidently understood. How thoroughly this is spoken of faith, any simple-minded Christian can well judge; for Scripture, indeed, the nature of faith, requires invisible things in the exercise of faith. And this we have not learned from the pope, but from the divine eternal word, that we know, beyond all our reason and sensibility, to adhere to the eternal word without all doubt.

For the seventh, Zwingli, after having read the Scriptures many times without all understanding, now takes

2) i.e. seeing.

3) In the old edition: seyn.

He now wants to frighten them out of their natural 1) and of God by Christ, the prophets and the apostles. And so swift writing to the simple, 2) whom he misled before with the word that is preached is called the eternal living word many writings, so that they also now have to let of God by Christ, the prophets and the apostles, often and themselves be referred to a foreign understanding, in many places in the Scriptures, and it is also honored invented by Zwingli and his followers, in the revealed and had for eyes. words of Christ "this is my body, this is my blood". (61) Therefore, according to the content of the word, it Therefore he, Zwingli, speaks on the word of Christ: "This is to be believed here without all error that Christ truly is my body, which is given for you": "If then the bread is presented bread and wine to His own in the sacrament. the body, which was given for us, then the bread is But the true invisible body, hidden under the bread, and crucified for us; therefore it is invented that it is a different the true blood of Christ under the natural wine, is that of which the eternal word says: "this is my body, this is my speech. blood."

Here, dear Christian reader, open your Christian eyes, and consider how sophistically the delicious masters introduce the unpleasant error under the evangelical name. For it is evident that the body of Christ is not bread, God and Savior Christ says, St. John 7: "My doctrine is or the bread the body of Christ; but bread remains bread, not my doctrine, but the doctrine of him that sent me." and the body of Christ also remains unchanged. Here you hear that Christ shows an excellent difference in

(58) Therefore the Lord Christ said of that which was his teaching, when he says: My teaching is mine and not hidden under the bread, that the bread is an outward sign. mine. So that it must be understood how he speaks And so the body of Christ is truly present with the bread differently according to human nature and divine nature. through the almighty word of God. Zwingli, however, uses The most holy gospel of Christ, after his holy human a simile of St. John's blessing; 3) where he read it in the manner, proclaimed with uttered words, is the doctrine of Gospel, I do not know; but I do know that the faithful are Christ, as delivered by him in an intelligible voice; and this all blessed in faith. However, Zwingli leaves the Scriptures is the word of Christ after human character. and proceeds with histories, as is the way of the spirit, 64. but that which is signified by this Word, and hidden turning from one to the other, so that the listeners are well from the voice, is the true eternal Word of the Father, heard. Himself, the Son of God, according to the divine nature

(59) But if we are to teach in the same way here, we and person; as He then says to the Jews in the eighth of do not have to model fairy tales, but proven Gospel John, "I am the very thing that I speak to you." Scripture, because it shows and compares quite artfully And so the teaching and the word of Christ did not and well the composition of the visible bread and the come from the humanity of Christ, but from the heavenly Father. 60 For the word of God spoken, as much as it can be Word of God is present without expression; and yet the understood outwardly, is only a human voice, formed by difference is that the Word of God is not the word of man, men. But that which is signified by the utterance is the nor is the voice of man the word of God; nevertheless, the eternal word of God, which also [in the] in the Word that is preached is called and described as the Word of God.

So, devout Christian, take here a strong and irrefutable likeness in the doctrine of the Sacrament, where certainly is true bread and wine, and the true essential body of Christ.

4) "samiglich" - sämmtlich.

1) "artlich" - which they have according to their nature.

2) "einbilde" put by us instead of: einbilden.

3) Under the papacy, people tried to prevent thunderstorms from striking by reading St. John's Gospel; this was called St. John's Blessing.

and his most holy blood. The bread thou seest; the body thou canst not see, or the blood; for, as often said, by virtue of the almighty operation of the word of Christ, his body and blood are invisible, and present beyond the comprehension of all sense and reason. So you perceive the bread sensibly, also the wine, and the body and the blood of Christ under the bread and wine, or with the bread and wine, invisibly and [un]sensibly.

68 You can also read more about the comparison of the word "good" in the Gospel; for Paul also speaks to the Thessalonians, 1 Thess. 2: "When you receive from us the word of divine preaching, you receive it, not as the word of men, but (as it truly is) as the word of God."

69) Clearly, the difference mentioned above can be heard in the living Word of God, for Paul had to preach to the brethren with his own voice and speech; but that which was proclaimed in the words of Paul is the eternal, fatherly Word of God, hidden among human words and voices.

(70) And though the voice goes away with the sound, yet the word remains in the concept and imagination of those who have apprehended it, or described it, and are presently speaking of it, or contemplating it.

71 Furthermore, the examples thoroughly hold thus: that as the word of God, in the outward word, does not become fruitful, so long it remains in sound and voice, or also in sensual or rational retention; but only then, when it becomes inward, and is accepted with faith, does it bring life.

(72) So also with the sacrament, he who without a living faith receives the body of Christ and his blood with the bread and wine has no grace or fruit, but rather eats and drinks the judgment of God himself, as Paul says in the first Corinthians on the 11th verse.

Therefore, the sacrament, like the word of God, is only for the faithful an increase and confirmation of their faith; but for the unbelievers [the] revenge of God on their ingratitude is also an unpleasant increase.

I think that these comparisons of the Word and the Sacrament are much more sufficient to confirm the truth, because Zwingli with his St. John's blessing may penetrate the true Christian mind in the doctrine of the Sacrament. Although some who fall into the trap of denying the Body and Blood of Christ in the Sacrament through Zwingli's art may find such a likeness of Scripture incomprehensible, I am well aware of it, Whoever accepts the simple knowledge of God's word with due faith, that he may easily meet the manifold seduction of this new prophet.

VIII] For the eighth, Zwingli brings the Article of faith. He ascended into heaven, seated with the righteous of God the Father Almighty; there he sits, there Stephen, the first knight of Christ, saw him. Apost. 7.

(76) Yes, dear Master, it is just as much done with this as with many writings martyred above by you; but, praise God! we have not allowed you that, because of the visible and essential ascension, the body of Christ may not be invisibly present in the bread; as insurmountably indicated by the word of Christ, to which word also no scripture or article of the true Christian faith is opposed.

(77) I see also in thy swiftness how rough thou soundest here from sitting to the righteous hand of the Father, when he must sit with thee all the way. How? if he might also stand up before you? Stephen saw (says Lucas, Acts 7) Jesus standing before the righteousness of God.

Dear reader, one feels an Aristotelian Christian quite well and obviously in this subtle master; because he does not admit the omnipotence of God more than his reason can grasp with the pagans.

79) But it should be reasonably thought, 1) that it is just as impossible of nature that two bodies be in and in one circumscribing place, as that a body be visible in one place, and otherwise supernaturally (without all sensitive effect and quality from God's almighty power) also truly present in other places.

Now St. John speaks twice on the 20th that with his true body Christ entered through closed doors to disciples and opened his joyful resurrection. But nothing of the Scriptures is valid for the wise Aristotelian preachers; they do not express their patron saint by name, but they push all their foundations of faith into the sinful, afflicted reason. Christ nor Paul did not teach them this, but their high intellect in Aristotle and other pagan fables, since they have drawn their high Latin from. I hope, however, with the grace of God, to soon bring the new prophets to a fuller understanding of their spirit and their Christianity, and to bring them to the knowledge of all pious Germans. But, dear reader, listen, for God's sake, how this master rummages around in the Scriptures.

81. to the ninth he says: Therefore Chri-

1) i.e. consider.

stus is from the right hand of his father in the future to judge the living and the dead; therefore he cannot be invisibly present in the sacrament. And he confirms this with the word of Christ, Matth. 26: "From now on you will see the Son of Man in the righteousness of the power of God. There he sits (says Zwingli) from that 1) he has ascended. You see here! He (Zwingli) does not grant Christ that he rises, and unwaveringly from the side of his Father works something further (according to the content of his eternal word), which the sense and understanding of all creatures cannot comprehend without faith.

He further says: Christ does not sit in a little stone house. Now there is no need to answer this further. It is evident in what sense we have taught of the Lord's supper, recorded above. But that he refers to it in this ninth article, saying: "There he showed himself and nowhere else bodily, that he did not further visibly show his bodily presence after the session to the righteous of the Father", we know well.

But Zwingli cannot escape from the true bodily invisible presence, with which he kindly shows himself to the believers in the bread, when he says: "This is my body", even if he would bring forth the whole Bible of his invented mind.

For of all the sayings of the Divine Word, there is not a single one in the whole Bible that is fundamentally repugnant to and contrary to the blessed, invisible presence of the Body of Christ in the Sacrament.

In the tenth rotten foundation, Zwingli warns us not to fall into the Marcionite heresy. Oh God! If he had left himself and his listeners, yes, all of Christendom, unconvinced and unburdened by this most harmful error, against the eternal Word of God, we would have easily protected ourselves from the old heretics.

But he continues to torment the Christians with false reasoning (invented from the innocent Scriptures), and says: "because Christ did not show Himself to the disciples on the day of resurrection at one time, the body of Christ may not be present in the sacrament by any means": which is printed in many ways here above.

(87) Then everyone can see how finely Zwingli's Scriptures are compelled for this is his delicious argument: "If Christ could have been in many different places at one time, he would have been (when he vanished from to the two disciples at Emmaus, and was no longer 2) with them) no less with them and with the disciples at Jerusalem."

88. Now hear this, Christian reader! Is not this a strong reason against the most holy sacrament, first invented by Zwingli, and previously unproven to all Christians?

(89) It has been said as much as this: Christ did not walk on the water all the time with dry and sinking treads, therefore he may not do it all the time. Is this not a masterly argument? Christ did not let himself be seen in many places on Easter Day for one hour, therefore his body cannot be visible to the righteous of the Father and invisible in the sacrament. Ah, wretched master! bring forth an expressed text that will do your poetry justice, and say that Christ's words "this is my body, this is my blood!" are not to be heard according to their light and bright understanding of the true presence of the body and blood of Christ. But you would not produce the same text in eternity; for God has once said, "This is my body," 2c., and will never revoke it in eternity. What you further attack in the Scriptures in testimonies and other fictitious teachings, is all pervasive and pulled by the hair against God's word.

90 He says even more in this tenth article, since Thomas did not want to believe that he had risen, John 20. Let us see that the disciples did not understand Christ's words, "This is my body!" that he had given them his body to eat; for Thomas (says Zwingli) could have believed otherwise very soon.

Oh God, of the deceived teaching and introducing of the Scriptures! If Thomas had believed the word of God unwaveringly, he would not have doubted the resurrection.

Now Thomas and all his disciples had fallen away, for Christ had so often and so clearly said that he would rise again on the third day, but they did not believe. This proves beyond all doubt that Thomas did not want to accept anything, because he saw it and grasped it with his hands. Therefore, it is far wrong that he would have been content with the hidden and invisible presence in the sacrament.

It is also undoubted that the disciples did not keep Christ's supper at that time.

2) "no more" put by us instead of "always". - After "was with them" we have deleted "there he would be" because it is too much'.

1) So put by us instead of: "and he is gone out".

But Zwingli must thus force and penetrate much Scripture together with Christ, the eternal Word of God, against Scripture and Christ, so that he alone may be the light of the whole world. But our light Christ stands with us with the true lanterns of his word and shines for us, so that we know with good faith and an eager heart (regardless of Zwingli's chatter and his kinsmen) that his body and blood, in virtue of his almighty word, are in the sacrament; and therefore we do not say that Christ is everywhere after the manner of men, but in such a way as is often indicated above, where after his word and institution the supper of Christ is held.

In the eleventh, Zwingli takes the pope as a witness to his doctrine and says: as it is written, de consecratione, distinct. 2. prima: the body of Christ, in which he is resurrected, he must be in One place. "Ah God! (says Zwinglius) what can all the popes do against it? Does it apply, their pope's book, why do they not surrender then?" I let Zwinglin force with the pope, maybe they will become one without me.

But I have sufficiently indicated that we do not believe or teach Christ's body to be present outwardly according to sight or sense, nor according to your concept of reason, for we know, according to the infallible word of God, that the words of Christ, "this is my body, this is my blood," according to the omnipotent effect of the word, irrefutably bring the innocent body and the most holy blood of Christ to be present; yet (as has been said all along) invisible and insensible.

97 And herewith I want to have jumped over all his bars, which he has shot in front of the truth; for they are only his fictitious straw-halves, which a sick flea can jump over; I say this of his false interpretations and not of the truth.

He is the only one who, without any reason, miserably and shamefully insists on and forces his unfortunate error.

But let it not be so: for though he dreams that no creature may leap over his bars, yet I, the most grievous creature of God, know that I have leaped over them with all true believers, with joy and true faith, and on the ground of the Scriptures. So, even if he were to put down the greatest bars, growing in all forests and stubborn minds, still we remain at the table, eating the true body and drinking the blood of Christ, and are well preserved; for God, our Lord Christ, has spoken it, and will no longer speak otherwise of this sacrament.

99. With this I will also conclude for this time, and have served my dear Christian brothers (out of necessity and insurmountable need of love, through which faith works and is able to do all things) with haste; so that the impolite plea and seductive declaration against the true presence of the innocent body and most holy Christ in the Sacrament may be found to be impotent and contrary to Scripture. That the impious plea and seductive declaration against the true presence of the innocent Body and Most Holy Blood of Christ in the Sacrament may be found to be impotent and contrary to Scripture, and that Christians may be taught how to remain steadfast to the revealed and expressed words of Christ.

Afterwards (whether God wills it!) this new error will probably be further disclosed, discovered, and found to be true with the word of God among all true Christians.

God have praise!

Therefore, we will soon 2) penetrate to its reasons, and dig them up with the bit of the divine word, so that only men will see that their bodily flesh is essentially eaten or present, or as they want to have the words, a cowardly pamphlet, that is, a word cloak and poem, which has no foundation in God's word, nor in the mind and spirit of the believer a certain nor clear understanding. God grant mercy!

9. First of all, Doctor Jacob Strauß does me an injustice that among all my writings that have gone out, he does not dare to contest any of them, neither those that I have written in great haste, I mean truly (in) one night, against the Popes Eggen (Eck) and Faber, greatest enemies of the Gospel and Christian tranquility; so he will have read out the further and crossed out ones 3) before, although he wants to be seen as if he had fallen about it at the market, and had never heard of the things before. However, he has also in the short so nothing at all entweget 4) that he has more fortress with his book carried, neither our taken. Therefore, it would have been kind of you to judge: to whom, against whom, at what time I have written, and according to it the more perfect writings were subject to contest.

10. I. Now that he speaks, "If the unkind deceivers shrink from us the pure body and blood of Christ of his miraculous and joyful presence in the Sacrament, 5) and give us only dry bread and sour wine." These are his words. From these words one realizes that Strauss himself is not sure that the body of Christ is present, for he says that the presence of Christ in the sacrament twitches him. If Christ's body is present, dear, who will twitch it? Therefore, by the form of his words, we see that he is afraid that the truth will come to light, against which he shields falsehood; for if he is sure in faith that the body of Christ is present here, then he will not fear that it will be taken away from some believers.

(11) The fact that he says, "We serve only dry bread and sour wine," indicates that he does not know otherwise, neither is the Lord's supper instituted for the sake of food; it is instituted for the sake of thanksgiving or remembrance, for he says, "Do this in remembrance of me. Therefore the ancients called it Eucharistian, that is, thanksgiving. And for a sign of Christian unity, Christ ordained an open friendly sign, which he called after his body and blood, to eat with one another in brotherhood; so that those who gave thanks to him with one another for his salvation, as they testified to one faith, might also give themselves the open sign of being one body with all the members; therefore it would be quite shameful not to walk in a Christian manner.

(12) St. Paul, seeing that he wished to draw the Corinthians away from the idolatrous church or congregation, thus says: "Is not the drink of thanksgiving, when we give thanks, the commonwealth of the blood of Christ? is not the bread which we break the commonwealth of the body of Christ? For we, the whole multitude, are One Bread and One Body, since we all share of One Bread." Now it is found that thanksgiving is the essential and noble thing for which we come together in the supper, and that the next thing is to make an open sign of duty to one's neighbor, so that the first two commandments of the love of God and of one's neighbor may shine forth in all the words of God; for in them hang all the statutes 6) and prophets.

13) If then we praise and give thanks to God in the supper of Christ, and teach brotherly love in the outward sign (without a doubt, neither a bouquet), how can he have us so pompous about dry bread and sour wine? 7) Does anyone also say that baptism is nothing but cold, unflavored water? Therefore, bouquet of such sacrilegious words should be justified, if he is the one he wants to be seen. We teach the great grace and love of God toward us, and for this we give thanks to Him; and as He has given us a visible sign of duty for the open manifestation of brotherly love and the display of the members and body of Christ, we also teach brotherly love. Therefore we come together, practicing this also; and do not come together to drink sour wine, as a bouquet rude, let alone uncivil.

(when he speaks of us from *impis teuschet*¹⁾). Therefore, it is found that Strauss has never learned the noble and essentials of Christ's supper, because he thinks that if the body of Christ, which they seal here, is taken away from him, then the sacrament or supper is over and forgiven.

14, II. According to this, he thinks that if we drop the mighty words of Christ, which he opened in the supper, then 2) the whole of Christ would soon be gone, and the outward word. As if the supper were only a part. How? is not the whole Christ eaten there? bodily, spiritual and mental? then we have already overcome. Now therefore I show that you, devout reader, learn to recognize the precious words which they lead, that they are only winged or dazzling tricks; and if one deceives the good, 3) then they are only spoken, that one may dazzle and frighten the simple with them. Otherwise, who will accept the words of Christ? Yea, ye, if ye now say with them, "This is my body," and therefore gladly, and for the advantage of strife, say, "Who is given for you," but in whom the ground of truth is found. We are so far from wanting to disregard the words of Christ that we first teach them to understand the right divine way, so that the words of God may be pleaded rightly even before the enemies; and this not from our heads, but from God's Word.

(15) When he says, We are high, seeming, and sweet words, he shows a little orator, though he has not, without doubt, made the rhetoric dirty; for [with that which] he does, he wants to appear that one does not take it from him, and lays it on us. And it is found in the case of anyone who knows how to speak that nothing makes him write or puts him off in a trade that he does not understand, neither that he trusts the color of his words so well; for I want to show him in this little book of his, since he uses the word "high" in six lines for the third time, by which one can see that he cannot grasp the mouth (I must also speak his language) full enough; is B on the other page. 4) And there is not much greater compophaceloremon to me, 5) who speaks one-and-a-half words more, neither he. Against this is all my writing, in German, so simple and bad, that where I hoped to get over something with words besides ostriches, I would really have to sell the workshop and store. But we are founded in the simple truth, and even if we are incapable of speaking, we still have so much understanding of the truth that we thank God that it is all, be it little or much.

IV. But he says, "They abuse the precious languages, Hebrew, Greek and Latin, for this purpose. Dear, my ostrich, how can you know that? You don't know any languages, how do you know whether we abuse them or not? But if others have told you, why don't they write against us? But, dear Strauss, that we undertake in the languages, we want to prove with the languages themselves that we take it right in our hands. And do not judge more highly than you understand yourself, lest you be like the donkey who judged, 7) that the Guggler sings neither the nightingale nor the nightingale. And know herewith that the knowledge of the languages is the right pointer by which one is pointed to the right way in this trade. I will tell you a few things here, in the hope that you will accept the report of the truth.

(17) The kind of Hebrew language is so necessary also to the writings of the New Testament, which is written in Greek, that without it nothing can be understood. For those who wrote it in the Greek language were of Hebrew descent, as was also our Lord Jesus Christ, and therefore they did not leave their own language in another language; just as when one puts Latin after the German way, or again German after the Latin way. Example: You have given the name to your book: Wider den unmilden Irrthum 2c. Then you took impium from 8) the title of Pomsrarrus' childish epistle, and rewrote unmild in the German manner, because one of the blind leaders taught us that Pius was mild, impius unmild; because the words are sometimes also, though rarely, used in this way by the right Latinists; but Pomeranus did not take impium, but you rewrote it. That is why you have betrayed yourself in the title, that you do not know the kind of Latin language: you are therefore a good German schoolmaster, and should not take the writing so seriously.

1) "teuschet" - täuschet is mockingly said instead of: "teutschet". Strauß has translated the word impi with "unmildiglich".

2) "accordingly" put by us instead of: nevertheless.

3) d. i. when you get to the bottom.

8) d. i. from.

(18) Now the Hebrew language has a way of using a lot of tropos, that is, speech used or otherwise understood; therefore Christ used it so much. He says of John [the] Baptist, Matt. 11, "He is Helias." And was John not Helias; therefore it is a "metaphora," that is, a taking away. For John was like Helias in spirit and power, Luc. 1. indeed, so great a prophet that no greater has ever been. Item, Luc. 16. Christ speaks: "There was a rich man" 2c., and has not been one, but it is only "parabola," a likeness, not a history; nor does he speak: "There was" 2c. after the Hebrew manner. Paul speaks Gal. 4th, "Abraham had two sons," 2c., "which are the two testaments." And the sons of Abraham are not the two testaments, but it is an "allegoria" (let no one make a mistake about the xxxxx, I urge to the simple, clear sense), that is, a different speech. And Paul wants to say: We may well understand the two testaments through the two sons. Again he says Gal. 3: "Christ became the curse for us", but he is the blessing and salvation that took away the curse from us. Therefore it is a transformation of names (metonymia), since one also gives to the good the name of the evil, which it accepts; as, in the Old Testament the word "sin" is taken quite often for "the sacrifice for sin". And here Christ is called the curse according to the words written in the 5th book of Moses 21, who is the blessing against the curse.

(19) Now thou hast two witnesses, and of each two tidings, whereunto thou shalt learn, as also in the New Testament the manner of the Hebrew language is used. And hear me 1) of these; for in former writings I have shown many more things. Now I will show you such figurative or other understandable speeches in the Old Testament, and before that the metonymias, that is, after-naming, by which you see that Christ spoke in these words according to his anterior manner, and yet had another meaning, neither of which we suppose at first sight. In Exodus 29: "Burn the flesh of the bull and its dung in the fire outside the camp; it is sin." Or according to the 70 [interpretations]: "It is sin." Here the sacrifice is called "sin," though it is not sin, but the sacrifice for sin; nor is it an that is. Re-naming, and confusing the name).

20) So here the friendly brotherly measure 3) in the supper of Christ is called the corpse of Christ, because it is used in the remembrance of the corpse, that is, death of Christ, from some likeness or taking away. 4) But if someone were to say that the example of Exodus 29 does not serve this purpose, 5) on the one hand, that it says nothing either significant or essential about the body of Christ; on the other hand, that it may well be interpreted, "It is for sin," that is, it is a sacrifice for sin. Answer: First, the sacrifices in the Old Testament, which are often called sins (but for atonements), have all been meanings of the perfect sacrifice of Christ JEsu. Secondly, Hebrews indicates that hatath, sin, is not a genitivus, as is learned in Leviticus 4 and elsewhere in many places. Therefore this interpretation "it is sin" is by no means obscured by us 6); for the meaning is well brought out, yet the words are different. But if it befits the 70 [interpreters] to actually bring out the meaning by changing the words, and since (in their and our language it is incomprehensible that the sacrifice is sin) thus speak: "It is the sacrifice for sin"; why should it not befit us to act on these words "this is my corpse", which are not comprehensible to us, with comprehensible ones, and to actually bring out and speak the meaning: This is the memorial of the body, that is, death of Christ? or a meaning?

(21) It was proper for St. Jerome to bring out the meaning, and he departed from the Hebrew way; why should it not be proper for us also? For 4th book Most 19, where Moses speaks of the red cyt-cow, "She is sin"; Jerome says, "For the cow is burned for sin;" and does him justice, for the cow was not sin, but burned for atonement, and the ashes cast into the water 2c. Now why should we be told in the words:.. Why should it not be proper for us to say in the words: "This is my body, which is given for you": "This is a meaning, a feast of thanksgiving, that the body of Christ is given for us"? If we see so publicly that in the words there is the Hebrew way, which is not understandable to us, we bring them forth with another way of the Greeks, Latins and Germans. As St. Jerome himself does, who speaks of the words of Matthew 26 thus:

3) Measure" ---- meal.

4) Randglosse: 8ie aāpsllavit Oseolamxsāius ūne tropum metapvorML, nā usum seiūest spsotavs.

5) d. i. firstly.

6) i.e. rejected, spurned.

1) i.e. content myself with it.
2) Marginal gloss: Aletou^mia stlana est uomium commutatio.

that he, Christ, signifies the truth of his body and blood 2c., with other more words, with which Jerome publicly gives to understand that he has understood these words "this is my body" 2c. also only that they are meaningfully spoken. But to say much about it here would be superfluous, since enough has been said and written about it by many before.

In the other book of Mosiah at the 12th we will actually learn this kind and characteristic of the Hebrew language for all sciences, because there is the same form of the words. And since Christ used the paschal lamb and his memory [in] the night when he substituted his memory for the old one, it becomes clear that he also used the same form of words. Now God speaks there of the paschal lamb or of the feast: "This is the transgression". And if the lamb was not the overtaking, because the overtaking happened only afterwards in the night; the feast, which the children of Israel practiced in the following time, was also not the overtaking: still so the lamb, and the feast, me- tonymicds, that is, by an after-naming or alternation, is called "the overtaking". So here the thanksgiving and the bread that is broken in thanksgiving is called by a Hebrew me- tonymiam, that is, surname, "the body of Christ"; not that it is the bodily body of Christ, but a memorial and thanksgiving that he gave his body in death for us.

(23) But when some say, Let no figurative or falsified or used speech be made unto me here, for the commerce is too great; and if Christ had willed that his words should be otherwise understood, he would well have signified it: such combatants show that they have heads, but little sense in them; for the most solemn things in the holy scriptures are all now and then falsified with figurative speeches. As that all things are in God's power, that he is the Almighty, according to the content of the first article of faith, the Psalmist speaks thus: "Lord, in your hand are all the ends of the earth. Now God has no material hand. But if a ruffian wanted to argue about it: The scripture gives him hands, so he also has hands, he would miss, because the scripture needs here "hand" for "force". Jesaiä at the 66th chapter: "The sky is my chair, and the earth the footstool of my feet" 2c. We speak here only of the Godhead, which we do not know how it is measured, and do not speak of the humanity of Jesus Christ.

24 Item, the whole sum of the Gospel Christ says with figurative words, John on the Chapter 6: "My Flesh is the Right Food" 2c. With which words he wants to tell us that his death is the payment for our sin, and whoever accepts it, 1) is assured of blessedness. Item "He sits with the righteousness of God, Father Almighty" is a figurative speech, by which it is understood that Christ Jesus is equally powerful with the Father. And the whole Scripture is full of such speeches, even in the most serious matters of faith, in which tropical, that is, figurative and used speeches are used. For, as Fabius and Cicero teach, every trade becomes higher and more beautiful because of the speeches used, neither without them; 2) therefore God needs them even in the most serious things. Therefore, we should refrain from justifying Christ as if he did not speak tropically in a great commerce; for he speaks as befits commerce, but we are unintelligent. As if the king said to his son, "I give you my crown," and the son understood only the golden crown and not the whole kingdom. So we fall on the flesh of Christ, and he called the thanksgiving of it, that he gave the flesh for us for a sacrifice, "his body".

(25) So much, dear Ostrich, about the filth, since you scold us that we abuse the languages, that you may see that we do not abuse them, but take them in hand as the right tools, and with them dig to the truth. And there is no need for your blustering and scolding; the faithful and the learned know well what we say. And take care that some of you have not yet reached the measure in which you think you are. No thing is too great for God that he does not often speak and do it tropically. In the beginning he says: "And the Spirit of God held upon the waters, or weaved 2c. Say whether it is a tropus or not? Therefore open thou thine eyes, and thine ears, and shut thy mouth, and put forth thy pen; and learn beforehand, before thou hast taken thy stand (for there are other men in the matter more despondent than thou), and give glory to God, and to the truth; and we shall know that thou hast faith, and that thou hast the Spirit. For because the clergy see that you now want to lean on faith and spirit out of ignorance, they will not give way to your rumbling, and we will not let you continue with untruth, if God wills.

26. v. He also tells us "to give one another titles that are proper to Christ alone". This he devises; and has not enough that he unwittingly-

1) i.e. rely on it.

2) In the original "dron" i.e. "their without", or "without the same".

lich 1) writes, he must first lie to it. For I do not recognize any high title, whether it would be attributed to me; do not attribute it to anyone. But it could be that Strauß, like Faber, Egg, and the wild animals, would not yet know what the titles are called. As when one writes episcopum, a bishop, that is, a guardian, describes that he be admonished of his office by the name.

VI "We have separated ourselves from those who persist in preaching the gospel", he also puts on us in a feminine way, those who, not being able to answer with the truth, rebuke it. For where, according to our measure, have we lacked in the diligence of the gospel 2)? Consider our work in the Gospel, whether it be stöpfli, 3) heuin or hölzlin. Therefore, dear Ostrich, notice that they have separated themselves from the steadfast Christians who, against all custom and order of the church, do not allow all doctrine to occur, and therefore do not leave the church alone free to judge, as Paul points out in 1 Corinthians 14 and 1 Thessalonians 5. This you do, Ostrich, and others more, introduces a new tyranny and violence; for you want to be seen as having held with the Christian infidel princes of Baden that our writings have been banned. Then I require you to show me the scripture or the proven spirit, so that this may be appropriate for you. What else has the pope done, neither commanded: Do not touch this! Do not read this! This is heretical? 2c. If you now, in the same way, deny to your churches the truth that you see inwardly but are ashamed to confess inwardly, because you have immersed yourselves in it, what are you but new popes who take away the judgment of the church, and the pious lords, just as the pope also did, are moved to protect your error? This is to renounce God's word, and to make distinctions and discords. This, however, is the only way of unity, in that the church is left free to express an opinion for and against, and thus the church is left free to judge; for God is not a God of discord, but of unity, who will not let His own, who are gathered in His Spirit, err; and thus there will be peace, atonement, and unity among all churches. But where one lord, city, people or commune lets the teaching of God's Word go freely, and not the other, there must ever be discord.

28 Now watch, which of God's Word and His Church, but you or we? We let your, the pope's, and all antichrists' writings be read freely, and put down the errors with the sword of God's word; so you want to do it with prohibition. Now I will choose you, you ostrich, to be a judge. Tell me, which seem to you to have the more suspicious cause? those who let their adversaries' writings come freely before their churches without any violence, and fight against them before the church; or those who bark against their adversaries before their simple-minded, and write against them publicly, also recommend their writings to their sheep to read, and often lie to them in their writings, 4) than you do here, and Faber and Egg do in all their writings? And if the opponents apologize or explain themselves, they cry out: Let them not be heard; more pernicious heresy never arose 2c. Yes, therefore, judge, know which are the more suspicious!

(29) For it is of no avail to say, "Evil conversation offends good morals," 1 Corinthians 15:15. For to pretend that in this sacrament one eats flesh and blood bodily, or that Christ is present bodily, does not make good morals. Proved: The Christians have never been more angry, neither since one has held the erroneous opinions.

(30) In addition, it is publicly found that we have never taught anything shameful, 5) sacrilegious, evil, or wicked; indeed, we have taught with more virtue and baseness 6) than some of the pillars 7) that are respected; therefore, our doctrine, for the sake of annoyance, shall not be justly reproached 8). If, however, we were to teach falsely or angrily, our writings should sooner be let before the church, for men would see their falsity from the beginning and accept the miracle, for the teachers would soon turn them back if there were such open falsity in them. That is why they are colors and fictitious requests of the tyrants of the Scriptures.

Accordingly Strauss says: "The holy apostles also did not falsify the truth for the sake of the weak, but only allowed something of the old holy ceremonies, 9) and did not teach 10) besides that, so that they would not be necessary for salvation.

4) In the old edition: anliegen.

5) In the original: schampers.

6) d. i. Demuth.

7) In the original: Sül.

8) In the old edition "happened", which is probably a printing error.

9) Randgloffe: Ancient sacred ceremonies! Have thanks.

10) About this "not" compare the note to §11 of the previous scripture. Zwingli interprets this printing error in such a way that the following up to § 36 incl. has been written against it.

1) i.e. in an ignorant way.

2) "ienen" - any. In all editions erroneously "those".

3) stöpfli - from stubble.

32 Behold, devout Christian, to the learned ostrich, how well he is reported to the Scriptures, so you will not be surprised that soon afterward he speaks so grandly and disconsolately:

33. VIII. ostrich: "But after this, in a short time, their foolishness (meaning us who do not want to eat Christ's flesh in the flesh) shall come to light more clearly through me (see, he puts himself first, so that he does not miss himself) and many others of even greater reputation with the help of God."

34 Answer: We, like the apostles, have not falsified the teaching for the sake of the weak. That the apostles yielded somewhat, we also did. We did not put the doctrine of the flesh and blood of Christ in the sacrament on the track, but we spared the weak until God put it on the track, and without doubt neither Paul nor other apostles attacked the circumcision. To this end, we have not wanted to attack commerce until one would be so well grounded in all things that nothing would want to deceive him any longer. In this Carolstadt breaks out and speaks the truth; but he has the defect, which the Father of Light has also left us, that he first of all did not bring the misunderstood words to light with the Tuto in the most skillful way. We could not let the truth lie there, because he did not really hit it with the words; for it should be proper for everyone to speak in the church. And so we did not teach the old error, because unfortunately it was now taught too strongly, but spared the weak in it, and still brought forth the truth in time enough. Therefore, the first part of this speech of yours is a calumnia, that is, fictitious calumny.

The other part, however, is an open lie, but I will call it ignorance; for the apostles not only taught that the ceremonies were not useful, but also that they were harmful, unpleasant, and to be done away with. Paul to Galatians, chapter 4: "Ye keep the day, and the new moon, and the feast, and the year: I fear I have labored among you in vain." Item Galatians at 5: "I Paul say unto you, that where ye are circumcised, Christ shall not be profitable unto you." Item Hebrews, chapter 9, which is a different understanding 1) of the same time in which gifts and sacrifices were offered, which things did not make him perfect who did them. For who would be perfect in food and drink, in various washings 2) and carnal ceremonies (that is, in outward din-

Who alone were appointed until the time of the abdicacion) will be saved or perfected? Item, Peter Acts at the 15th chapter: "Why do you tempt God to put a yoke on the believers, which neither we nor our forefathers could never have borne? Christ our Savior Himself says in the 15th chapter of Matthew: "That which enters into the mouth does not defile the man. Item Marci 2: "The holiday is made for man's sake, and man not for the holiday's sake." Item John 4: "The time is coming when you will worship the Father neither in Jerusalem nor on the mountain, but the true worshippers will worship the Father in spirit and in truth." These proclamations, to which an innumerable number might still be added, all extend to your seeing that Christ and his apostles have publicly taught against ceremonial things; and by this you learn not only your ignorance, but also iniquity.

36) Accordingly, I have long considered 3) why you have spoken these words, that the apostles did not say that the ceremonies were not necessary for salvation, and have not been able to find the cause from the argument or content of the matter, because it does not fit the place. 4) But after a long time I thought, 5) you have said it, as if we should not teach that the bodily flesh of Christ is not useful, and that nothing is promised to the bodily food, which not only you, but some who are much greater, also cry out. But why should we not teach that which our Captain Christ JESus himself teaches? since he says, "The flesh is not profitable"; understand to eat, and not carnal mind, as ye mightily bend his word. Even though your mind is more carnal, neither the kind of flesh described by Paul and Isaiah; if you want to show up God's words 6) for his meaning, which comes only from your ignorance, and therefore only over-fleshy poems, which are also grasped by the children, will be word colors.

(37) Yea, saith Christ, "The flesh is not profitable," and understandeth, to eat. For he said of him, killed long before, that it is the true bread that makes the world alive; that is, that his humanity is the lamb and sacrifice that takes away the sin of the world-not because he is a man, but because he is God and man; but according to mankind he might suffer, and according to the Godhead he maketh alive. Therefore the disciples said: "We believe that you are the Son of the living God"; and not: "We believe that you must be eaten in the flesh"; or: We believe that you are true man; or: We believe that the carnal mind is not useful. For this Christ would not have been misled by the Jews, who wanted to understand his words even after the urge of the words to eat of the flesh bodily, if he had spoken these words "the flesh is not useful" of the carnal mind. And lastly, Christ does not speak so lukewarmly as if he had said: "The flesh is not useful", for: the carnal mind is not useful; as before it was more abundantly brought forth: if you now also read it, and let it be reported to you. Therefore we say for and for: The flesh of Christ is not useful to eat, and again give up trying to prove from God's Word that His flesh, eaten in the flesh, is useful.

38, IX. Soon as Strauss does not want to mention Harrow's name in his book, he strongly suggests how little it matters, from whom the truth is spoken, and yet he does not need palate 1); for he undoubtedly does not spare mine. Then he knows that he will not be seen standing with the priests. And does he, as well as the popes, protect that which is against God's word, yet with greater clumsiness, he and his associates, neither do the popes. For so the popes cry out: Let the words of Christ remain with the simple mind, and thou therefore sayest unto them, It is written, Who is given for you; and therefore must he be eaten bodily sensibly: they seem to yield to this, and say: Yea, he is eaten tenderly, as he hung upon the cross, 2c., as the recantation of Berengarii signifieth.

39 But Strauss and his associates, if they shout with the popes: One should let the words of Christ remain with the simple mind; we have the words clearly, it says "Is", so it must be, and one answers them about it: Well then, let the words have their simple meaning, and see what may be understood of them; and the meaning will be found: The bread is my body, which is given for you. If therefore the bread is the body which is given for us, then the bread must be crucified for us; for his body is given for us.

40. as one also speaks: let the words

1) In the old edition: Goumens, which probably stands for "Gaumens", i.e. "Meidens".

Christ's body to the simple mind, then the pope must be right, and we must eat Christ's body not only sensibly, but also visibly; for he is visibly and sensibly crucified. Thus they say, Behold! these are new sophists. And if they say: How can this be sophistry? if you urge us to the simple unused mind; then we take him in our hands, he does not add 2). For so they say: This is the simple mind: This is my body invisible, which is given for you visible. Here we give answer: Does corpus actually and unused mean an invisible corpse? or tradtur: is visibly given up?

This is how they want to do it with shouting: We believe the simple words of God. It is right. Who is a believer who does not do this? But you are the first who do not let the words of Christ remain in the unused mind, when you say, Let it be the invisible body 2c. For Christ has never said: This is my invisible body, which is visibly given up for you.

So it turns out, dear ostrich, that those of your party who speak like this, as first reported, are the first who have taken the natural meaning of Christ's words, and yet have not met them. Therefore it has become better for you, and the unused sense has wanted to be too strong for you, and you have said that this is the simple sense of the words "this is my body": "in the bread is my body. But then, whether you interpret it or not? Is it not now a synecdoche, when you say: In the bread is my corpse, for: This is my corpse? Is this not a trope, when we say: The feast is a memorial that my body is given for you? which is a metonymy; for the supper, thanksgiving, or feast, is named after the body of Christ. So they argue and shout: One may not suffer the tropum! and lead them in the midst of the tropum, and lay it out by the tropum. I often find out that they do not yet know what a trope is, so they fight against it and make do with it.

42) And at last Ostrich comes, and sees that they may not receive it: "In the bread is my body," and says: "3) The body of Christ is present in the sign incomprehensible to all the senses, likewise his holy blood," but nothing corporeal is due to the eater. Behold, this is a new handle! Because can I ostriches right

2) i.e. fits.

3) These words will probably refer to § 67 of the previous scripture.

He wants to say that the body of Christ is in this sacrament, but it is not eaten in the flesh. Why then does he fight? Our dispute is not primarily whether the body of Christ is in the sacrament, but whether it is eaten bodily in it. Although he is not there, he may not be in it with the permission of God's word. And if we prove with God's word that he may not be in it, then our opinion follows that he is not eaten bodily in it. So they say against God's word that he is in it, but may not receive that with God's word.

(43) Now therefore, Ostrich, behold what this is: the body of Christ is in bread, and nothing corporeal is eaten. What then is he doing? How do you answer the pretextual excuses, since you have all spoken: He is essentially eaten bodily, but invisibly? But this has brought thee hence, that thou canst not answer for "he that is given for you"; for he ever ought to be sensitive there, because he hath suffered sensitively. Thus thou sayest mightily, Yea, he is there, but nothing corporeal is eaten there. Do you know what it is to say about the red pants? What one says, so says another: It is not called that. And that is the most beautiful thing about you, you first tell me how I am an Aristotelian sophist, even if you have also read something in Aristotle; but you are open sophists. For sophist (as it is used at this time) comes from sophizein, 1) that is, to wit and seek cunning without reason of truth. But this is what you do, if you now come with the invisible corpse, and say: it will be eaten bodily, without reason of truth, that is, without God's word. For God's word, "This is my body, which is given for you," unless it is to be a used speech (as you argue but do not hold in exposition), may not suffer him to be there invisibly and insensibly, for he did not hang invisibly nor insensibly on the cross. Soon you say: he is there, but nothing corporeal is eaten; also without any reason of God's word. Now stand before the mirror, and examine thyself, and thou shalt find thyself a more open sophist than any Gryllus ever was.

44 Again, we may not be blamed for being sophists with any semblance of truth. For to truly introduce and conclude from God's word is not sophistry, but the truth itself; or else our Lord Jesus Christ would have to be suspected of sophistry, because he is always smiling on God's word. As he says, Luc. 16: "If they do not follow Mosi and the prophets, then

Nor will they believe, though one rise from the dead," is losus ab autoritaty, or a majore ack minus. Marc. 3, Luc. 11. collects Christ, and thus concludes: "Every kingdom that is ambiguous in itself is destroyed; if Satan is ambiguous in himself, his kingdom may not exist. What kind of syllogism is this? I will not give any more examples here; I have given enough elsewhere.

45 Therefore we rightly conclude from God's word: If the body of Christ is the bread, or in the bread, then he must also be visibly sensitive in it; for he speaks (if one must understand the words according to your violence): "Who is given for you. Now he is visibly, sensibly, essentially bodily, also mortally given for us; so he also ought to be there, and so to be eaten, as he is crucified. So we also conclude: If the bread is the body of Christ, then the bread is crucified for us; and is no sophistry nor deceit; for introducing, following, closing is needed before all artists are ever born.

(46) Neither are we sophists, for that which we have ever taught is so firmly established in the Word of God that no one has ever liked it, nor will ever like it. And do not be concerned about what the sophists preach against us in imperial congresses and elsewhere; we have another day, neither the blind may see, nor at this time, in which we may well walk.

47. X. When Strauss now begins to reverse my reasons, he first attacks the word of Christ, John on the sixth chapter: "The flesh is of no use." And comes forth with the old little piece that Christ meant to say: The carnal mind is not useful. Enough has been said about this before, and often before, as about everything that is found in it. But how often they see that Christ here speaks of his fleshly flesh, not of the carnal mind; yet they do not object to it, and cannot answer for it; for their conscience tells them that Christ spoke in the error of the Jews, saying that his flesh was of no more use to eat than they supposed it to be. Still they fight, and they think they can get through with it, that they deceive 2) and lie, what they want, and cry out thereby: God's word, God's word! and call us: False prophets, false prophets! But when their error is brought to light, they let no one read it. How honorable this is, Christians do not need to judge, but Turks and unbelievers may recognize it.

much said, as if it had never been heard before, he says: we will preach a spiritual Christ. Dear Strauss, are you preaching a carnal one? I thought that if we had known Christ immediately according to the flesh, 2 Cor. 5. I say this only to drive you, for you do not know what you are saying. For you are those who do not let the true humanity of Christ, according to the Marcionite way, remain truly human, if you say that his body is eaten bodily and essentially, and say that it is eaten spiritually. So the body, of which you say, must be a spirit and not a corpse. For I ask you, Ostrich, whether in this sacrament the body eats or the soul? If the body eats, how can the body eat spiritually? But if the soul eats, how can it be a corpse? Does the soul also eat bodily food? If it is a spirit, then you make Christ's humanity a spirit, not us. Yes, it is a little wooden pigeon of which you say. You write words, which neither you nor any angel understands, as you weave the words together, 1) and in the midst of it you reproach so badly, that whoever of you does not want to be reproached to the highest, has to say that he understands it; and it is nothing but sophistry and word poetry. So notice this.

(49) Thou sayest, Ye speak of eating the flesh of Christ, not as the Jews, but that it is spiritual meat, eat it also spiritually. We have recently confessed that to eat Christ is to trust in him. Now you are looking for the sophistic rank: Yes, this is the spiritual food, but the sacramental. Eating has another form. Tell me, do you eat the sacraments too? You do not know yet whether sacrament is a custom and practice or an essential thing. You say that the body of Christ is eaten sacramentally. Dear, what is sacramental eating (sacramentaliter edere)? For it seems to me that you want to give the simple one over the eye with the word. Is it essentially eating the body of Christ himself? or, is it trusting in him? Now you come, offer us the little wooden scaffold, and say: One eats him essentially bodily, but spiritually, and only the clergy understand it; and to this you make with God's omnipotence, and to this you pity with sacrilegious words: whoever does not believe this, let him revile Christ 2c. Dear, not so! Let go! Tell me, how many are the spiritual meals of Christ? If ye say one, we will speak unto you straightway. If you say: two; God be with you! So you are the ones who bring innovation; for you cannot say a word of God about your spiritual food.

1) "wättend" probably as much as: connects. Cf. § 50.

Nor do I indicate any old, stately teacher, for they all understood spiritual food as we all commonly understand it. But I should spare you here; for you still speak anew, that one eats here nothing corporeal, [because] the body of Christ is still there.

50 Therefore sacramental eating, devout Christian, is not something fraudulent or sorcerous, as these dyers paint it, but it is nothing else than eating the sign, but in the supper of the remembrance of Christ. And no creature can deny this. The pope also understands sacramental eating, as we speak of it in the often mentioned Canon: Ego Berengarius. In turn "Eating spiritually" means nothing else, neither trusting in Christ Jesus, the true Son of God; and eating together spiritually is a poem of those who do not want to let themselves be rejected. And as little as thou knowest what a wooden poker is, though thou understandest the compound words, yet, if it be wood, it cannot ever be iron. So little do these fighters know more of the bodily body, spiritually eaten, or of the spiritual bodily eaten body, neither that they have the words together, but which have no acceptance nor home 2) unbelieving mind. In the same way, as if we spoke of a black snow, and said: it would be black; but we would not see it. Finally, a spiritual eating of Christ is trusting in him; and a bodily eating is praise or thanksgiving. And to eat the body of Christ bodily, as the popes say, is a gross misunderstanding of the words of Christ, which, after the manner of Hebrews, mean the commemoration and praise of the death of Christ with the words of the body of Christ. But to eat the corpse of Christ bodily, yet spiritually, and not according to the pure spiritual meal, is a sacrilegious sophistical poem of those who do not want to be told the truth.

51 Therefore, Ostrich, the words of Christ, "The flesh is of no use at all," are true for and for, and are not spoken of the carnal mind, but of the fleshly carnal eating; which is of no use. Still thus you rage before the simple-minded: If the flesh be of no profit, for what is the death of Christ? And now we have shown in seven or eight stories with bright words that we speak only of the bodily eating of the flesh of Christ, that it is not useful. See now whether ye be not open calumniatores, protectors, and traffickers, when ye, as often as it is accounted for and rightly presented, draw it out harshly before the ignorant, and so introduce them, yea, seduce them.

as if we deny Christ; and forget 1) in the midst, that the truth be not read.

We must not, dear Strauss, make a special aphorismum, that is, a separate piece, out of the words.

53 Strauss: "So Christ gives His body and blood above inward eating in outward, visible, and sensible signs, which are also bodily eaten and drunk."

(54) For thou wilt say nothing else, but that the signs shall be eaten. But if you also want the body of Christ to be eaten, but invisibly, we require you only for this reason, that you prove with God's word that the body of Christ is eaten invisibly here. For these words, "This is my body, which is given for you," may not be understood of any invisible body.

55. we also require you for the sake of the words which you all say, but you with this form: 2) "But only for comfort and spreading of faith" 2c. And soon after, "Therefore it is a sign only to fruitfulness to the faithful." There you all speak from a harbor of sophistry, without God's word. For the supper is not to spread the faith or to increase it, nor does the sacramental meal bring any benefit; or else you would set up again not only the papacy, but also the old ceremonies, should external things increase or bring forth fruit in the inner man; but it is a thanksgiving of the death of Christ. Therefore you all speak the words without reason. Examine on thy iij [third leaf] these thy words; let see how much findest thou the tidings of God's word?

56. xi. ostrich: 3) "Therefore man eats not here the flesh of Christ carnally, but according to the content of the almighty mighty words, so Christ says: This is my body, this is my blood."

57. Answer: Behold! so shall ye rumble and conjure before the simple. If you eat not the flesh of Christ carnally, what is your warfare? Now are we not one, that whosoever eateth it spiritually shall be healed? Say: I speak carnally. Say, How can you eat the flesh of Christ otherwise, either spiritually, or carnally, or bodily? Behold, now you must bring forth your little wooden dish, of which enough was said before. Accordingly, you give the simple, like-

(Dear ones, always leave out the words "which is given for you", so it will be seen what kind of customers you are) were spoken by Christ in such a way, as if he had used the words to force his body into the bread or supper bodily, and if his body was there by the power of the words, because he had said: "Do this in remembrance of me", also that he was almighty.

58 And Christ did not mean to say, "Do this in remembrance of me, that by words you should commit my body to death; but thanksgiving is remembrance, as we understand it publicly in the words of Paul, 1 Corinthians 11: "As often as you eat the bread and drink the drink, you will praise and glorify the death of the Lord, and therefore give thanks," that is, proclaim it. Thus, while the church stands until the last day, we are to remember the good deeds of Christ and give thanks with one another. This is what Christ means to us; not to make his body to be there and to be eaten bodily, for the words are tropical.

(59) Forasmuch then as ye cry, He is almighty; prove not therefore that there is flesh and blood. For it does not follow, You are an ostrich, and God may make you a goose, but you are a goose. Just as it does not behoove us to teach: Christ is almighty, therefore if you eat him sacramentally, he may drive out your bump; so it is driven out of you. But if you ever do this, and if you ever do this, say: What are the words: "The flesh 4) is not useful" to eat; "again I leave the world"; "you will not have me forever" rc? Are they not Christ's? Yes. Is he not as well omnipotent to keep the words, as that you say against his presumption, that by his omnipotence he makes himself bodily in the bread or supper? Are not our words, as being good, as which ye have spoken, 5) yet not understood? For understood they are common to us all that believe.

60. XII. Strauss also says: 6) "They teach that nothing more should be accepted or admitted here than what human reason is able to comprehend" 2c., with many other lying words, which are unpleasant for a lover of truth. For we speak here not of the reason of the flesh, but of the reason of the inner man, that is, of the believer, as Paul also speaks to the Romans in the seventh chapter. There it is also evident from their own experience that it is not possible for the mind of the

1) "To forget" means to beware, to be careful; hence "to forget" here probably means to prevent.

It is incomprehensible to believers that flesh and blood are eaten here in the flesh, or in the flesh-spiritually, as they say; for they therefore fall short of the omnipotence of God, that they themselves cannot remain on their flesh-spiritually.

61 But Strauß did not want to 1) revile Oecolampadius, who, however, does not count his, but Augustini's opinion. He wants that in the night meal no new miracle is to be pretended. How? Is it comprehensible to the human mind that Christ is the Son of God and payment for our sins? No. To whom then? To the one whom God has drawn. But is this not a miracle? Yes. From this you see, dear Ostrich, that Augustine does not want to speak of the high secrecy of Christ, for which reason he is a comfort to the soul; for this is the miracle that God has done for us, according to the prophet's legend and Ps. 117, but that in the night meal it is to be expected that the body of Christ will be miraculously eaten in the flesh. On the other hand, he does not speak of carnal reason, but of the faithful, which knows that "eating Christ" is entrusted to him, and does not ask for any other food, Jn 6: "Whoever comes to me will not hunger" 2c. And has the pious man well seen that these words of Christ are a used tropical speech, which calls with the corpse the memorial or meaning of the corpse of Christ; just as we still today call the memorial of the Ascension also the Ascension, as he indicates ad Bonifacium.

When Strauss speaks to us of not knowing faith, he always makes it sound as if this is faith, if one believes that flesh and blood are eaten or present here; and with this he wants to blind the simple; for he has said enough about spiritual food, how the same is trust in Christ; and now he makes it sound as if we believe that flesh and blood are here 2c. We know faith well and truly, thanks be to God! of which Christ thus speaks, John 6: "Verily I say unto you, he that trusteth in me hath everlasting life," and of which we say in faith, "I believe in Jesus Christ." But in this they must all strangle, that they shall not bring forth that Christ hath spoken: Verily I say unto you, He that believeth that my flesh and blood be eaten there hath eternal life, or is feasted in faith 2c.

63 Yes, they say, "Which is not to each one of them?"

1) Perhaps it is to be read: "hiemit". Should "hie not" be correct, it is to be taken ironically.

2) In the original: zwarten.

If any man believe the words which Christ spake, he is damned. Here I would like to give another answer, but for the sake of the simple I will not do so; for this following is the firmer, and better for the simple.

64 Answer: You speak rightly, but you lie, first of all, that he who believes the words of Christ has the right understanding; for to misunderstand the words of Christ, and to believe them, is not to believe the words of Christ, but your own misunderstanding. For example: "On the rock I will build my church", Matth. 16, the pope shouts at himself and also says: "God is able to do all things, he has done it for man's benefit, that he has given me such power in Petro; God may not be deceived. Yes, let it be! But now the right-minded one comes and says: You do not understand the meaning; he does not mean Petrum, because he was not the rock, but a "rocker", called by the true rock. Now Christ builds his church on the rock, of which Peter is called a "rocker". Behold, therefore, one must not rely on God's word, erroneously understood, for that is not God's word; for he may not err, but our error.

In the saying or words, "That which is born of the flesh is flesh," the ostrich holds himself out, so that it may be seen that he is not a juggler, 3) as he calls me, but a gossamer ostrich; for he pretends that Christ is speaking there, John 3. So well trained are the journeymen in the languages that they do not yet see what similia, parables, are, and how one teaches the simple by them; which Christ has had in use without intermission, and here especially uses in the most beautiful similia, parables, of the birth of the flesh and spirit. Thus, after Nicodemus did not understand Christ's teaching about the rebirth or innovation of the spirit, Christ held up to him the summa of salvation with the words: "Whoever is not born again with the water (that is, the right divine wisdom, and does not speak here of the water of baptism; read John 4) and the spirit (for without the spirit man does not accept the divine), may not enter the kingdom of God." Now he explains to him what the spiritual birth is, and takes the likeness of the right fleshly birth; but he omits, according to the Hebrew way, the word of likeness in the beginning, 4).

3) In the original "gougler" and "gouchfarber". "Gauch" is "fool", therefore "gauchfarben" will mean: dressed in fool's colors.

4) Marginal gloss: lets, notam similitudinis srebra ornittunt llsdrasl.

thus: You see that everything that is born of the flesh is flesh; therefore everything that is born of the spirit must also be spirit.

(66) See, dear Ostrich, that these two gnō- mae, that is, two unbetrayed senses or conclusions, are understood everywhere by all flesh and by all spirit; for gnomae or sententiae must be true everywhere, or else they would not befit to go out for certain. You see also that Christ uses the words: What is born of the Spirit must likewise be the Spirit, from the former, "What is born of flesh is flesh." So then I have indicated your error in the way of conduct half ab effectu aut sequela with such a conclusion: Everything that is born of flesh is flesh; if then something is born of the flesh of Christ, it must be flesh. You all may not break this calculation, Syllogismum, and immediately become nonsensical. But you German schoolmasters lack much; you are not so reported that you can go over the wells yourselves; learn from the German books, and then put on a different coat as if you had born it, and want to make a name for yourselves with it, and if one looks for you behind the shield, you are not at home.

67 I realize thoroughly that you have never clearly understood the piece in the Gospel of John 3; nor is my conclusion, which I draw from it, certain. If something is born from the eaten flesh of Christ, it must be flesh. This I have silently wanted to show to the greater ones, neither you are, against their false pretenses, since they speak: The flesh of Christ, eaten, makes faith firm, yea, also gives the gospel present; and such nonsensical speeches as turn back all the birth of the gospel, which alone comes from the drawing Father, with the words. And we have a sure word of God, which is born of the flesh, and ye cannot signify one, that ye may prove that faith is established thereby.

68. xv. That I therefore say these writings: "But you will not have me forever" and: "Again I leave the world and go to the Father", and the like, must be understood only from the human nature of Christ; that alenfanzt Strauß so freventlich with so open disgrace of the truth, I want to be silent, that I almost want to think that it is not an ostrich, but a Guggler. 1) Dear ostrich, why don't you also cry out here: A little book of God's words may not fall? Now he has said that he will leave the world; so he must ever leave them. But he may not leave them with his grace to us Godhead, for with it he sustains and permeates all things: so this must be spoken of human nature alone. For this you know that the believing mind indicates this, and all who have ever interpreted these words. You may still rumble; but it is evident that you have not read, indeed, without doubt, you may not read the right old theologians, in which you have learned to walk a little bit in the Scriptures.

69 Thus you account for everything with the single word "invisible. The bodily presence of the body of Christ is not taken away from us, but only the face and the emotion; and the same is now your deed. When will you hear it? Present a scripture for it, or else you are the most sacrilegious sophists I have ever seen. You want to talk out of your heads and not present a word of God for it; this you have in common with other sophists. But that you first speak about the same thing bodily, yet invisibly, from the body of Christ, you do not only against all reason (in this you are more evil than the Sophists), but you speak against God's word. Yea, and ye reproach the humanity of Christ, because ye say that he is invisible and insensible in the sacrament, when he saith, This is his body which is given up for us. If then he is visibly and sensibly given up for us, and you say that we eat him by the power of words, and yet deny the sight and sensibility; you deny that he suffered visibly and sensibly. Still you hump and sound hard and firm, and do no writing, but may not escape. If you want to understand it literally, when you cry out that the words are clear: "This is my body!" then you must stand down with the Marcionites, that he has not suffered; this is an open reproach of the Lord Jesus Christ, and we do not reproach him.

70 Therefore, as soon as you say that the invisible corpse is there, you now take the word corpus tropice, that is, the corpse for the invisible corpse, and still scream against the tropos, as if he wanted to oppress you, as is indicated above.

71 Thirdly, learn also from God's word, that if Christ were with us bodily, yet invisibly, he would not have spoken the words, "Again I leave the world. For he alone who deprives the face is not therefore called absent. Once, when you were a preaching monk, at night in your cell, you were invisible, nor were you present, and could not be said that you were not there. I alone show you, that you seek such poor escapes, and think to blind the simple. When Christ was a little while of the disciples, he said not, "I leave the world;" but, "Ye shall not see me a little while." In short, not to be seen alone may not suffer the strong words, "I leave the world"; for if he were bodily with us, he would not have left the world, for he would be divinely and bodily with us. The angel proves this when he says, "He is not here," and does not say, "He is here, but invisible. Say: But he is in the sacrament. Answer: To be in the Sacrament would mean that he would have to be in a hundred times a hundred thousand places, which is not possible for mankind, not even for a corpse. And to be at so many ends is not fitting for anyone, except for that which is incomprehensible; that alone is the Godhead. Therefore, neither in the Sacrament nor elsewhere can the body of Christ be more than in one place. And the angel's saying, "He is not here," proves well and truly that he is bodily in only one place. As also Augustine de consecratione, dist. 2. cap. prima.

Here you need a fine piece. You lead us with your sophistry to say: it may be that a corpse is more than once in one place. And when we break your lies, you say: You are sophists. Say, What is the word: "He is risen, and is not here"? And this: "Me you will not have all away"? If it is mine, it is sophistry; but it is his who is the truth. But if we had him bodily, this word would not be true, for we would have him all the way.

73) Fourthly, you may not reverse this, Apost. I.: "Jesus, who was conceived by you in heaven, will come again as you have seen him go to heaven. Here we indicate to you that when he comes bodily, he will come visibly. Thus you indicate to us from God's word that he will come invisibly into the sacrament; you are not able to do so, for it is nothing but your blue trumpety: when he comes, he will come visibly; and you adorn and pamper yourselves as you wish. He might well have said, I will be with you invisibly; and should not have said, I leave the world; and, It is for you that I depart from you. 2c.

74 Finally, Strauss reveals himself to be a German schoolmaster, that is, that he has learned his reasons solely from German books. For he speaks the words, Matth. 24, Marci 13: "If someone were to say to you: Here or there is Christ; so do not believe it," that should be understood only for the sects. There I am told that an excellent man 1) drew the word neißwa in a booklet; but Strauß from the beginning thinks it is the natural meaning of the words, and does not go over the well himself, because he has no creator. 2)

So Christ wants to say that the tribulations will be so great that even the unbelieving Jews will cry out for the Mosiah, the container or Christ; then the false prophets will show them the container here or there; they should not go there, because he will not be there; understand bodily, when they will look for him. So the disciples ask him, "Where will he be?" He gives them two parables: one, that he will come as bright and clear as lightning, filling the whole circle of our faces in a moment. The other is that they do not assume the place, because as the eagles gather to the carrion, so with him, the heavenly eagle, the train of the elect will be gathered.

(76) First of all, if Christ does not want to be shown here or there, why do you show him in the supper? Understand me only for the sake of mankind. Secondly, you see whether he comes visibly or invisibly. Third, the elect will be with him. He also wants his servants to be with him where he is. If he is in the sacrament, the great Christ must also be with him. See whether the clergy serve us or not. But that of the sects is only an included one, and not the noble or principal one.

Here I must give an answer to some preachers, who also stood there in a very deceived city and cried out like this: Behold, devout Christians! These new teachers are the false prophets who show Christ: Behold, he is here! Behold, he is there! for they say, Behold, he sitteth with the righteousness of God the Father! Do they not show him in one place? Yes, they say, God has no hand, therefore to sit with the righteous as much as to have equal power with him 2c., with much other wisdom. Behold, devil, how thou art bowed down! Shall we not show him above, as Marci 16. thus saith, "He is conceived in heaven, and hath sat down with the righteous of God"? And Stephen says, "I see heaven open, and the Son of man standing by the righteousness of God." Is Marcus a false prophet? like St. Stephen? Now they are talking just like us.

1) In the original: "Träffenlicher", by which Luther will be meant.

2) d. i. bailer.

78. O you mockers, Isa. 28. and Ps. 1, notice! does sitting with the righteous mean having equal power with God? Yes, so it is a trope, a used speech. Do we not now also rumble and shout? We keep the simple words, we do not make "sitting with the righteous" into "ruling with". Therefore, notice (as indicated before) that God speaks tropically even in the highest things. Therefore, dear brethren, did Christ come recently to the righteousness of God, or has he been there forever? Will you answer without doubt, and also rightly, that he is eternally seated, that is, equal, and reigning, according to divine nature?

I ask: What has gone up there? Without a doubt mankind. Without doubt, it was not there before. If it has not been up before, then the humanity of Christ is never more than in one place; or else, if it had been everywhere, as the Godhead says, it would also have been everywhere up, and would not have needed to go up. Thus you learn by going up that it is now in one place; for otherwise it would have been above all things with God, and would not have been allowed to go up. Learn also that the ascent and "sitting with the righteous" here reaches only to the humanity of Christ. And take the communicationem idiomatum, that is, the common features of both natures, right in hand, and all things will become clear to you. And see this: If he ascended (when he is undoubted), he is not here bodily; for if he had wished to be here bodily, and in heaven, he would not have said of mankind, "Again I leave" 2c.

80 Will you not call this also the work of the sophists? Yes, yours is not only sophistical, but genosphistical; that is unfaithful to God's word. For we speak with the holy apostles, Acts 2, that he of the righteous, that is. Power, God has exalted; not according to the Godhead, according to which he was not allowed to exalt, because he has the same clarity from eternity, Joh. 17. And again with Petro, 1 Petr. 3: "He sits with the righteousness of God. He has gone up to heaven, and there the angels are subject to him." And with Paul, Rom. 8: "Since Christ is seated with the righteous of God." And again Heb. 10: "Who sitteth for ever unto the righteousness of God." And well we know that he reigns with the Father and the Holy Spirit; still thus we know that his humanity is now in one place, as even 1) the holiest form of the face of God. We but do not show him, 2) because he shows himself. But you show him in the bread, in the supper; also, as one should not show salvation or comfort in any outward things, you show in his food the fortress of faith, also the presence of the preached gospel; yes, everything that comes to your mind, so that you hope to talk your way out of it, but everything out of your heads, without God's word. Therefore, mend and change, or else you will move the wrath of God where you will not yield to the open truth.

After a long pondering, however, Strauß comes back and says: "It is obvious that the body of Christ is not bread, or that bread is the body of Christ; but bread remains bread, and the body of Christ also remains unchanged. If Strauß were to leave it at that, he would have spoken rightly and according to God's word. For Christ says Matt. 26: "For this cause ye shall see the Son of man sitting upright in the power of God, and coming in the clouds of heaven." In which words we well perceive that he will not change his seat or dwelling or abiding until the last day; as we also prophesy in faith, "He sitteth unto the righteousness of God the Father Almighty, [from] whom he is to judge henceforth." 2c. So we do not read that he then 3) will not be in any other place in the flesh in the future, nor for any other work, neither to judge.

82 But Strauß does not stop at words, but speaks immediately afterwards:

Ostrich: "Therefore the Lord Christ said of that which was hidden under the bread, that the bread is an outward sign. And so the body of Christ is truly present with the bread" 2c.

Eriväge, dear reader, these words of Strauß well, so you invent that Strauß does not believe that in the bread the body of Christ is eaten, as Pomeranus and the part holds. For I also noticed and understood beforehand actually everywhere on his word that he now wants to say that the corpse of Christ is present, but is not eaten. But whatever he may say, it is evident that he is leading nothing but an impotent, unfounded pretense; for when he says that the body of Christ is hidden under the bread, he leaves it hidden. If he says that the body of Christ is hidden under the bread, he does not leave the words of Christ "this is my body" simple, but makes it tropically, otherwise understandable: under the bread is the body of Christ; but this may not be suffered. For if he had been under the bread, he would have been invisible under it; then it follows but that he suffered invisibly, for it is written, "Who is given for you."

83 XVII That he murmurs about St. John's blessing is a calumnia, a transgression. I have wanted to give the simple-minded in this matter an example of metonymy, that is, of calling by names, and have sought one for them that is known to all men. But if he wants to have biblical examples, he will find them everywhere in our writings, which have written about it, also here, as is indicated above.

84. XVIII. Since he therefore presents himself with an example or simile, with the external and internal word: the external word is only a human voice; but that which is signified by it is the eternal word of God, neither he nor those who have made the foolish 1) (I must ever give it the right name) little book in Swabia against the pious Oecolampadium, do more than the Sophists do when they ask: Termini an res veniant in praedicamentum? of which it is not proper to say here, because they are looking for a button where there is none.

The external word that comes from our mouths is also the very word of God that is with God and in our believing hearts, as long as we call it the word of meaning and truth. But if they understand by the external word the breath, the voice, the speech, the sound that falls from the lips, without the understanding: ah, God, what do [they] want to gain by this? Is there not a difference between any word of breath and sense? But if the bodily word is to make the inner word, then we take it in hand: Ostrich preaches the gospel outwardly; so be it that he preaches it rightly, and the man who hears him will be told inwardly just what Ostrich has told inwardly. For here I only give an example of their deed, otherwise all believers know that no one accepts the word, neither he whom the Father teaches. But I will teach only this, that when they give parables of the outward and inward word, they quite foolishly call the blast 2) and voice of the word the outward word, which is very bad for such highly learned people. The outer word that Paul preached (now I call "word" the sense and mind) is the sense and mind that God has; and the inner word of Paul was also of one mind and sense with the outer. And then the same word, if God planted it in the hearts of men, was just the word that God wants, and Paul has inside.

Therefore, we Christians are One Body.

of which Christ and the apostles taught much, for we conduct One Spirit, sense, mind, opinion, speech within and without. For which reason Paul says: "No one speaks: the Lord Jesus, except in the Holy Spirit." How? teach an agolstren 3) or parakeet to speak: Lord Jesus; as those rabbits could 4) speak, whose emperor says they have 5) much at home; do they also speak in the Holy Spirit? So now you see, devout Christian, what the outward word means to the apostles; not the voice, as these blind men speak, 6) or the tules would speak in the Holy Spirit; but the very opinion, which they have in their hearts, spoken out. So now the Zurich limites want to say: The external word "this is my body" not only gives birth to the mind, but also essentially makes the body of Christ to be there through its power. Now 7) God is pleased with me, pope and popes, you pillars of all darkness. So the pope will say: When Christ said to the bedridden 8) "Son, your sins are forgiven you", then the almighty word spoke, and it was so in himself; and therefore when I speak by the power of my keys: Your sins are forgiven you, then not only the teaching follows, but by the power of the words man's sins are forgiven; I have the almighty word. Grace-pastors, then go, not to the sinners 9) (for you blind men are not to be sent to men, you deceive them), but to the mangy dog Ulysses, and say to him: Until pure, Matth. 8. Let see, may you drive him away with it!

Forgive me, Christian reader, for speaking thus to the peacocks! I know what God does through His believers. But these blinders have to be attacked, or else they thought they had it right, since they have so many boasters, and yet in many years the foolish book has never gone out. est (even as we children, when we were afraid), the Word became man. Behold, the Word became flesh! So it also happens here, when these words "this is my body" are spoken. Answer: When Christ became man in the pure body of Mary, who spoke the word "the word became man" with his breath, and then the word or command became man? No one. So you understand, how your Zürlimürten has reason. But suppose it were recommended that an angel should say to Mary, "The Word is made man"; would it therefore have been made man by the power of the external word, or even by the mind of the angel? No, they would say, but by the power and effect of God. So it is right for him. Why then do you cry out: We have the almighty Word; as also Ostrich often does here? If the word has no power either in man or out of man, why do you preach to the simple, you tenebriones? Suppose also that these words "this is my body" and "the Word became man" are of the same power (as you say): so it follows that as often as one says: the Word became man, so often will Christ become man. Just as you say, by virtue of the words "this is my body" the body of Christ will become.

88) Therefore, summon the quarrelsome devil from you, 1) dearest brothers, and also teach you! you walk on walls. You have to get out of see in the words of God which are words of narration or history; and on the other hand, also see which are words of promise. By the words of the story understand also the words of the external things, which are called or forbidden. Words of promise are: "Whosoever trusteth in me hath everlasting life"; "whatsoever ye do unto one of the least of mine, [that] shall be done unto me." "The signs shall follow them that trust in me" 2c. The Scriptures are full of these, and yet they are distinguished. Some are general, as, "Thy faith hath made thee blessed," and, "He that giveth a drink of cold water," 2c. But some are particular, as, "He will give me a choice barrel or crockery." Words of the story that forbid are: "But ye (understand the apostles and ministers of the word) shall not so rule." "Pray not evil for evil" 2c. Words of history commanding, "Go ye, preach the gospel"; "Baptize in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost"; "Make thanksgiving unto my death"; "Wish peace to the house whither ye go" 2c. Words of history or narrative alone are: The Word became man: "She gave birth to her first and only Son", and laid him in the manger; "Her daughter was healed at the same hour" 2c.

Now take a figure of it, whether you would like to be reported after all 2).

Words (1) Of promise, promissionis verba. Are:

general, univrsalia, and special, privatza.

(2) the fact, facti verba. These are:

(a) Words telling the simple-minded story.

(b) Words that forbid: This shall not be done. Are also:

general: Ye shall not be angry.

And
special: You shall not rule, concerns only the apostles, and those we call ministers.

(e) Words that command: This shall be done. Are with difference:

Words that are ceremonial alone.
Words that encounter life or customs.

90 Now, I hope, you have noted the difference, for I am cutting you off roughly. If you now want to fall from one gender of words into the other, and prove one by the other, which, however, is of a different gender, you err nothing less, because the advocates or intercessors do not correctly represent the action or naming. As when God speaks: "Him-

Heaven and earth may pass away, neither a letter of my words"; it is a word that is understood under the promise. Now if you would speak, "Christ became man," it is written, "The Word became man," and therefore, where the Word is spoken, there Christ will be from that time forth; for heaven and earth (behold, now you lift up [to] perish).

1) In the old edition: "beschwer".

2) "those" - any, put by us instead of: those.

(1) into another generation of words) must pass away, neither one of his words, then thou art mistaken. For the word "the Word became man" is a simple story told, and may not be counted among the words of promise, nor proved with them, nor drawn into a misunderstanding.

91 Now take an example in one generation, as in the promise, but in other members. "I remain with you until the end of the world" is a word of general promise; and, "He becomes my chosen cask or harness" is a word of promise, but to a particular [man], namely Paulo. Now if you were to say to any one, He is a chosen vessel of God, he is Paul (as the Anabaptists did), you would be mistaken in supposing it to be a word of promise; for it is not of the promise common to all believers, but of the particular promise.

Now we want to go into the other gender of the words of action, and there also show that the words, which are like one gender of action, but not one member, also do not like to prove each other. Christ speaks to the mute, Marci 7: "Hiphathah, is 2) opened." This is a word of special promise, because he spoke it (for I understand the present command of Christ's miracles also under the promise), but when it is held out to us, it is a louder story, what Christ spoke and did. And the word: "You received it in vain, you give it in vain" is a word that tells us what to do. If then I should say to the teaching evangelist, Speak the word Hiphathah over the dumb man, and make him speak; for Christ also spake it, and the dumb man was made to speak: You are mistaken, for you may well think that he is telling you the doctrine without reward, for Christ said it; but with the word "is opened," he cannot make a mute speak, for it is only the simple story described in this way, not that the words have this or that power.

Now take two examples in one generation of the deed, but in other members. One: "Baptize them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. This is a word of the act, but still a ceremonial word. (I say this now only so that I do not delay, because I otherwise know well that the apostles also had baptism for a ceremony, 3).

they did not consider these words to be the definite words, without which baptism is not, because they also baptized in the name of Jesus). Nevertheless, there is nothing new in this case, for those who baptize in Jesus also baptize in the Father and the Holy Spirit, and those who baptize in the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit also baptize in Jesus. These words are not to be omitted in baptizing. But do not understand by the words the breath, but the meaning and the opinion, namely: that the baptizer should incorporate the baptized into the Father, Son and Holy Spirit, to whom he also is incorporated according to God's opinion.

(94) Take therefore a word of commandment, which is not a ceremony, but which teaches the manners. As, "Into which house ye enter, there eat that which they have." If then you will take the foregoing words of the ceremonies of baptism to mean that nothing is to be omitted in the mind of God, and therefore, just as baptism is given as a ceremony for those who are introduced into the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, so also the word, "Eat that they have," is to be fulfilled, you will become a remaining householder. For who would let you eat all his possessions?

95. Now take an example from the line of words not to do, and first a general one: "You shall not give evil for evil. Applies to all believers. "What you do not want done to you, no one does to you," the like. 4) Again, "You shall not carry sackcloth or coats of mail with you," and "You shall not rule," apply only to the apostles or messengers; or else whoever had sackcloth and coats of mail, or whoever was a ruler so as to rule, would be condemned (as the Anabaptists would say). Therefore, it does not follow that one should prove the one with the other in that place: Yes, God has commanded this, and it applies to all men; and if this also has been commanded, it also applies to all men; for the one he has forbidden to all, but the other only to some, not to all.

Now let us come down to our business. Now if someone wants to say: Christ has said "this is my body", and he may not lie, so it follows that the body of Christ is there, then you see clearly now, devout Christian, that he deceives himself, because he wants to prove his error from the words that are not of one gender. It is true, Christ does not like to lie. Therefore, when he said, "This is my body," for: This is the memorial of my body; was

4) "the like" - this applies equally to all believers. ,

1) "perish" - to go astray.

2) will" - become.

3) In the old edition: "gehebt", which is: kept.

So to him: for he instituted the ceremoniam of thanksgiving for his suffering. And they that this very day make thanksgiving acknowledge him truly to have suffered for us, and praise God for it; and they that do this outwardly, but have not the truth of Christ in their hearts, are guilty of the blood and flesh of Christ.

97 But that here, because Christ thus spake, it should be pretended, where the words are spoken, or the supper of Christ is eaten, that the body of Christ should be bodily eaten, or be present; this shall not be, and may not be; for therefore "is" is not a word of promise. For Christ does not say, "Speak the words, and my flesh will be darkened," or anything like that, but there is no word of promise here, neither that the body will be there, nor that in the eating of the supper there will be a stronghold of faith. So also "the Word became man" is not a promise that the Son of God would become man; but it is a simple historical account that he became man. And if one puts the two words together, either 1) may explain the other, for they are not of one gender, the one is a described history, the other an insertion of the memorial of the death of Christ, without any promise.

But if you, simple one, ever want to profit from this diligence and learn to compare the spiritual with the spiritual 2) for clarification, as Paul says in 1 Corinth, chapter 2, first consider the nature of the words, whether they are words of promise or of action. If they are words of promise, see whether they are general or particular, and then contrast the words that are of one gender and one member, and you will find clarity. But if they are words that mean or forbid a deed, see among the words that mean deeds whether they mean deeds that are ceremonial or that affect morals. If they are ceremonial, take other words of commandments or deeds that are also ceremonial (and not of a different gender), and put the ceremonial deeds together.

99. example. We have no more than three ceremonies in the New Testament: [1] the baptism (which is a common sign of all the members of the Church, as was circumcision), the supper (which is a fraternal measure 3), so that one may give thanks and praise to the surpassing goodness of God in giving His Son to die for us), and the be-

Only those who can remember in faith, as Paul teaches; and the laying on or offering of hands, which is done only to those who are ordained to the ministry of preaching. From these, let us take the two most common ones, and then contrast them with the two ceremonies of the Old Testament, and we will see how the erring people willfully deceive themselves.

If it is to be said that Christ has said, "This is my body," and therefore the body of Christ is there, it will also be true: Christ has said, "Baptize them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit," so also under the water must be the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, and herewith the essential humanity of Christ, which he will never do from him. Say [you]: God is everywhere, and therefore he is also in the water. Answer: Therefore he is also outside the water. From this nothing else follows, neither that he is no longer in the baptism, nor in the whole sea. Therefore, since it is impossible to compare them with each other, let us take 4) them into our own hands:

(101) Just as one who is counted as a member of the Church of God is recorded in baptism, so also in the supper of Christ appears one who trusts in Christ Jesus, the Son of God and our Redeemer. Here it must not be said that God the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit are in the water by virtue of the words and do this or that, nor in the supper of Christ, how his body is eaten there. For baptism is not given to work anything 5) in a man, but that the crosses may be baptized on him who comes to the church, 6) that is, that he may be marked with the common sign of the people of God. So also the supper of Christ is not celebrated to eat the body of Christ, but that those who give thanks with one another for the death that has made us alive also eat this friendly meal or measure with one another, so that each one also has given open evidence of himself that he trusts in Christ; and also then 7) lives Christianly toward the other members.

102 Now lift it up against the ceremonies of the Old Testament, against the circumcision and supper of the paschal lamb. It does not follow: God has commanded circumcision at a high price, therefore something is given in circumcision, or it has some power; for it is only a sign of the covenant, Gen. 17.

1) "eithers," neither of the two, used by us instead of: either. Cf. Col. 709. twederes also occurs.

2) "lift" - hold, compare.

3) d. i. meal.

4) let" put by us instead of: let.

5) i.e. something.

6) i.e. marked, applied.

7) i. furthermore.

are essential in the covenant. But it follows that just as circumcision is prescribed at great cost, yet it does not make a man righteous; so also baptism does not make a man righteous, but is a sign of one who has either believed or otherwise been a member of the church.

103 So it does not follow: Christ has said: "This is my body", so it is also there and is eaten 2c. Also, since in the Old Testament it is written, Exodus 12. "This is the transgression", it does not follow that the lamb is essentially the power or angel of God that transgressed; but it does follow (that is, it illuminates each other well, so that Strauß does not think that I mean it is a consequentia); so it says: "This (understand the lamb or the feast) is the transgression", and was only a commemoration, thanksgiving or praise of the transgression. And therefore the words of Christ "this is my corpse" are not to be understood that he wanted to give his corpse to eat, but a memorial of his death (which he had to carry only on the corpse, because the Godhead may not die), provided that he has done such use just of the night feast, by taking away the old paschal lamb, which has only meant on him, and has represented himself now, now to death.

(104) Yes, so much I have had to show the simple-minded about a common form, against which they can lift all the speeches of the resisters, and see how even and straight they need the comparisons of the sayings from the Scriptures. For such things must not be attributed to the learned; for either it must not be so, or else it does not help them; they are so high up that they badly do not want to be taught; and, in turn, they are so self-centered that, even if they do not hold to the doctrine, they turn back everything that is said to them.

Mark a pretty piece, if one says, the words of Christ "this is my corpse" may well be understood in the Hebrew way: This is a meaning or memory of my corpse; for "this is the transgression" also stands for "this is a meaning or memory of the transgression"; so they cry out: Behold, they want to conclude from one to the general! Yes, the word "is" is taken meaningfully in one place, therefore it shall be taken thus everywhere; for thus the word "this is my beloved Son" would also now be able to mean "this means my beloved Son": Behold, what deaf heretics these are! And if we answer against it (as I alone now do talame 1) for the fourth time): No, that is not our opinion, that we want to force the mind with it, but in other words, "The flesh is not useful at all"; and "He has ascended to heaven; sit down with the righteous" 2c. That the body of Christ may not be bodily present nor eaten, and therefore, if the simple cannot extricate himself from the words "this is my body," we indicate the nature of the language; not in other words than they, but in one way, so that one may learn that the defect does not come from God's word, but from our lack of understanding, and that such words have more such understanding 2c. So they do the same as the desperate Jews, who did not want to hear Stephanum, lift up 2) their ears. O of beautiful holiness! O of faith! and flirt 3) around the corpse of Christ, they want to take away our salvation. But not so, devout Christian, one must ever speak peaceably with one another in the right understanding of the Scriptures, without self-contradiction; and therefore look at the analogiam, that is, the like kind (as has been said enough) alone, without grief, or else we miss altogether.

I must give one more example. Christ says: "Inasmuch as ye do it unto one of the least of these which are mine, ye have done it unto me. About this word the popes rage, and say: "Behold, whatever one does to St. Peter, Wendelin, and the Gertrude, that is God's doing. Therefore I pray to St. Peter so much pater noster. St. Wendelin so much sheep sacrifice. St. Gertrauten so many candles burn 2c., so I have done it to Christ. Now you see how they miss; for the word of Christ has two parts: the first is to be done admonitively, and belongs under the words of the deed to be done, under the member of morals; and the other part, namely, that he will count it done for himself, is the word of promise. In this way, the popes put it under the words of the commanded deeds, which are ceremonies. In short, Christ speaks of helping and doing good to the needy, so they speak of ceremonies, therefore they miss; for even number praying is a ceremony. To worship otherwise, neither the one God, is idolatry. The elect, however, suppose [when the saints] are honored with the Pater noster or other prayer, is not only idolatry, but also foolishness.

Thus, the magic example that Strauss and his crowd 5) have written about the external and internal word is, I hope, well drawn out. For the outward word preaches Christ the pledge of the

3) Perhaps: to flutter back and forth (to üirt).

5) In the original: Hoof.

It is the same in the mind; it is the same in himself after the fact. And if one now expresses the opinion that Christ is the salvation of the soul with the words, as he himself does in John chapter 6: "The flesh of Christ is truly the food of the soul," then the works may be different, but the inner word is nothing else but: Christ is the salvation of the soul. But according to these people 1) it should be so: First, one would have to speak of the outward word, as it is here tuned with letters or by a mouth; then of the understanding; and third, Christ would not only have to be the salvation of the soul, but his flesh would also have to be essentially in the soul, or be eaten, or, as Strauss says, be present. Now if Christ did not intend anything else with the words "this is my body," 2c., neither commit the memorial of the good deed that I have given my body for you, with thanksgiving and praise, 2c., then not first must his body also be essentially or presently there, as little as when he says: "My flesh is truly food." But let us again take Strauss's words in hand.

108. xix. ostrich: 2) "Therefore, according to the content of the word here, it is to be believed without all error that Christ truly presents bread and wine to His own in the sacrament. But the true invisible body hidden under the bread, and the true blood of Christ under the natural wine 3) is that of which the eternal word reads: This is my body, this is my blood."

First, it is shown enough in talame 4) that they speak for and for the invisible body of Christ without God's word, when Christ did not speak at all of an invisible body, as far as one should understand the words according to their meaning; for he says: "This is my body, which is given up for you. Secondly, it can be seen that Strauss does not keep his part with the commoners; for he does not want to say that Christ's flesh is eaten there, but that it is there to be watched; 5) or I do not know how he means it. Lastly, if this were true of them, the priests of Jerusalem must not only have taken away the houses of the widows with their legerdemain, but they must also have eaten them substantially; for Christ says, "You eat the houses of the widows."

Widows." Would also like to speak: It is "the eternal word". But not so! but if one understands the eternal word rightly, then one should first say: So it is certain. If one understands that Christ understands by eating at houses, 6) then one sees that he meant "to be undeceived," namely, that they thus beguiled the widows with goodies. 7) And may not follow: Yes, they also have to eat the houses substantially. So also here, if Christ wanted to institute the thanksgiving of his corpse (as is clearly found in his and Paul's words), one does not have to argue that the corpse is also essentially there by virtue of the words; for with the power of the words he did not want to institute anything else, neither the memory.

110. XX. Ostrich: 8) "In such an opinion, the true eternal Word of God is proclaimed by human and sensitive word, and is thus united with the same, that where the word is uttered, there is God's word present without expression."

Behold, with what the dark ones and the deceivers deal, how they can no longer speak! They can no longer say: The word that Paul preaches is the word of God, when Paul himself says that he cannot boast of any thing of himself that Christ did not work in him. But they try to lead in a madness, as if the truth, which is taught with the words, were introduced under the word as under a cloak: so that when the words "this is my body, which is given for you" are spoken, they may penetrate to it, that then the body of Christ is introduced through them, or under them. But not thus, but that which is thus in itself, which the word thus shows to be; not that the word first makes something or therefore brings something, but as it is beforehand in itself (namely, a ceremonia and memorial of the death of Christ), thus the word shows.

(112) Therefore Paul says: "You have not received the word as if it were the word of man, but as if it were the word of God, which it truly is. Behold then, where is your difference between the outward word, as if it were man's, and the inward word, as if they have not One Being? The external word is not the word of which they want to say, unless it is God's word; now if it is God's, they will not say how the internal one is under the external one of man.

because the external things that Paul preached would not be his, but God's opinion and word. But if you look long at the tired things, they are nothing else than respectus rationis and work of the idle word fighters; and take nothing from them now, devout Christian, or else you would have to learn formalitates Scoti first, but you speak thus: When God speaks through an angel or Paul, he speaks as the truth is in itself; not that the speaking makes or brings ütziid [anything], but the speech is an opening, as it is in himself. And if they say, Therefore is this the body of Christ, answer, If Christ had willed by words to give his body, it would be there; but he willed not this, because it would not stand by other his words. Therefore one must understand his word rightly, then one becomes aware and sure that he is as he means it.

113. example. When he says: "I have decreed that you eat at my table and drink in my kingdom", he speaks a word of promise; nor does he want to say that it will happen in the kingdom of heaven with eating and drinking, but he wants to understand with this tropical speech that they will have eternal delight and joy with him. But to the quarrelsome one would have to speak thus: The word, which here Christ speaks bodily, leads also in him the essential eating and drinking; and should be pressed also in heaven above, and that so much more, that this is a word of promise, but the "this is my body" is not a word of promise. But not so; but we must first hear what he means by eating and drinking, and not falsify the sense by the seductive introduction by the outward word, or by putting together the outward and inward word. With the words "this is my body, which is given for you" and "do this in remembrance of me," Christ wants to introduce the thanksgiving of his redemption. So it is also in Himself that He has redeemed us; therefore we give Him praise and thanks.

114. XXI John's description of how Christ entered the closed doors, Strauss shows, as if his invisible presence (as they speak) in the sacrament or supper should be proven, for the reason that it is more possible that one corpse is invisible in many places, than that two corpses are in one place. And although this is nothing else, neither philosophized, it still occurs to Strauss, and scolds us, we have learned our reasons from the Aristotle, also our wise Latin from the Aristotle and pagan fables; so he speaks. See, Pious Christian, how should you deal with crickets? The captain of this matter (when he himself is deprived of it) should first tell how to learn Latin in Aristotle and the Fables? That is why so few of the right Latinists have never gone to the right well, namely to Aristotle and the Fables; that is where Strauss has spied us out. But you, pious Christian, let the pure boy dance around in his Guggelfedern 1) (he has it for Straußfedern) and you notice so:

That it is not possible for the mankind of Jesus Christ to be more than in one place (not by his power, but by his word). For he said, "For the time being ye shall see the Son of man sitting for the righteousness of GOD." "He ascended up to heaven; sit" 2c. "As ye have seen him ascend into heaven, so shall he come again", and other sayings. For this it is gnug indicated that it does not follow: God is able, so it is; or else, our beautiful ostrich would be a hoopoe; for he may well make it so. Secondly, neither ostrich nor I should say that, since Christ came in through the closed doors, there were two bodies in one place; for coming in to the disciples, that the doors were closed, has also, of course, to speak of it (as ostrich and his part do, and put it on other people), well other ways, neither that two bodies must be in one place. When he was born of Mary, unharmed of her virginity, there is also no need to know of two bodies in one place, nor was he born of her without her injury; which way, however, is well known to him. Much less is it necessary to bring in here, how he came in through the decided [doors] after the original state.

(116) Nor is it found that he was ever bodily, neither in birth, nor in appearance after the primal state, but in one place. And even if the same would be proved, nevertheless it did not follow that he would be eaten bodily in this sacrament: because he therefore neither named nor promised anything. For "do this in remembrance of me" does not refer to "making or eating his flesh," but to thanksgiving, as has been sufficiently demonstrated before. Notice here, too, pious reader, how Strauss [sometimes] perverts our doctrine. If we say that it is not possible for the body of Christ to be eaten, nor, moreover, to be in one place, we suppose that, according to God's word, God's word, spoken in other places (for it must ever be set against each other), does not permit such things. Thus they state that we speak according to the course of nature, and then also come and want to prove that it is natural for two corpses to be in one place, and call us "naturalists" with fakers, harrows and such animals. And we do not want such a way, but only indicate that it is not possible according to God's word that his flesh may be eaten; for it may be nowhere else, neither in heaven above until the last judgment.

1) "Guggel" will probably stand for "Gugger" (cuckoo).

117. XXII. When I indicated for a conjecturam, that is, a factual assessment, that Thomas did not want to believe the primal states, it is equal to the matter that he did not understand the words of Christ "this is my body", that one eats the body of Christ there bodily. This is so pitifully done by Strauss, that it would have been quite obvious to him that the disciples would not have believed it either, 1) because he lets up that Thomas did not believe that flesh and blood would be eaten; that I am surprised that he cries out so mercifully to me.

Ostrich: 2) "Oh God, of the deceived teaching!" And speaks but from hour on these words on it:

Strauss: "If Thomas had believed the word of GOD unwaveringly, he would not have doubted the resurrection either."

118) So you, dear ostrich, let it pass that we here say that he did not believe unwaveringly. So also it followed after your commandment, 3) that Thomas at the same time had been a heretic, a false prophet, a most pernicious disciple-also condemned; or else you must also forbear us, that we therefore are not heretics, nor condemned, if we believe not bodily flesh of Christ eaten here. Behold, thus thou goest about in the scriptures, as a blind mariner on the sea. But mark this, Christ saith, "He hath not lost any of them which the Father gave him, neither the prodigal son of Judas." But if Thomas should be condemned according to your judgment (because he did not believe in flesh and blood), then more than one would have been lost. He says Luc. 22: "You are the ones who stayed with me in my temptations; therefore I decree it to you" 2c. Is all spoken of the elves, among whom Thomas was; for Judas had already gone to his merchants. But this is learned from the fact that Thomas, as well as the other apostles, well understood the Lord Christ in his words "this is my body"; but not that they understood his

The devil did not eat the corpse in the flesh, but that he called the thanksgiving of his corpse that died for us 4) "his corpse". Therefore, dear ostrich, do not give Thoman to the devil in time. But if ever the devil must have one, give yourself to him, that you write so ignorantly from Thomä Wider the truth.

119 Strauß speaks further in this point. Strauß: 5) "It is also undoubted that the disciples have not yet kept the night meal of Christ.

Where do these words go, dear ostrich? Did they not have the supper with Christ? Now it says: "He gave it to the disciples" 2c. Or do you mean that they never kept it for themselves after Christ's supper at that time? Yes, that is what you want to say. But what else do you mean by this, neither that you present yourself with ignorant speech, as if you wanted to say, "Yes, I cannot say about the other disciples either, whether they have believed to eat and drink flesh and blood, because they have not yet celebrated the supper. But I am sure they did not believe any more than Thomas, whom you have already rejected, did. And immediately before these words you speak thus of Thomas:

Strauss: 6) "Therefore it is far wrong that he should have been content with the hidden and invisible presence in the Sacrament."

With which words you want to indicate publicly that if Thomas had understood how the body of Christ is eaten invisibly, he could have well believed the originals. But what do we say differently? But if this had not been the case with Thomas, then he would not have been able to believe the original. If you also herewith present the other disciples (but with a dark speech) as if they were apostates from Christ because they never received by faith (see how you, dark one, have cut your words so that neither you nor those who read you may know what you are dealing with), which Christ often told them about the original state. So I cannot consider otherwise, 7) neither that you want to say of all disciples that they also did not receive faith from your invisible flesh-Christ's food; for if that, then they would also have received the original with faith (so you speak) and would not have been grieved without doubt in the prison of Christ.

6) In the previous writing § 92.

7) d. i. hold for it.

ivorden (for they had already eaten him bodily before), nor fallen away. But you give your words a gloss, as you will, so that you will ever know with us that Thomas and the disciples did not hold that the body of Christ was eaten bodily. Why then do you rage against me? You are like the evil barnacles, who bark at all people, even at their friends, but may nothing be done to them. So you bark against what I have gathered from Thomae, only that you leave nothing unaccounted for; and you are of the same mind with me, except that I say that the disciples did not understand Christ to give his flesh to eat, but that he instituted a memorial of his death, and have done right by him, thus understanding. So you say that the disciples did not do right to him, or that they were mistaken, but you are more mistaken about this than about the churches. For as you say that he who in the sacrament does not believe that he is eating flesh and blood is himself eating damnation, Thomas and all the disciples must have eaten damnation in the Lord's Supper.

120 How is this then? Christ said: I was well pleased to eat the passover with you," but would he have longed to be damned? which is far from the Savior of the whole world 2c. On the other hand, it turns out that your false argument, in which you say that faith is fixed with the meal, is not true. If it were so, the disciples would undoubtedly (after Christ told them of their future apostasy) have also fortified themselves anew with it. But they committed the thanksgiving the very first, and not with ignorance and unbelief, as bouquet is put to them, but according to the opinion and pretence of Christ; and from that time on they fell more mockingly, neither before nor since they had not yet committed this thanksgiving. Behold, if we speak from ourselves and not from God's word, we deceive ourselves, so that even when we think we are with God, we are publicly against Him.

(121) Other vain and loose words of reproach and revelry, such as: whether I will not allow Christ to stand up? whether he must sit down all the time? and such things as these I will now leave in their value, and have admonished you, Ostrich, along with other resisters, for God's sake, that you stand from the pursuit of high words, even from your own treasure. For with your own treasure you deceive yourselves and the simple; yourselves, because you think that where you are soft, this harms your name. For that you have your honor you can by no means deny that you do not love well, for your open and secret writings show this; and you could not gain greater honor than that it could be said of you forever how you had the truth reported to you. For that some of you lay upon us, as if we had set the matter on [the] course, that we might also have some new creature, is as truly conceived as it is strongly spoken. And if you have perhaps made something useful in the gospel of Christ (although I truly say that it will be found out in fact that those who think they have done much will have to unravel a great deal again; let each one take it where he will), then it is not without, there are always such simple-minded people who allow themselves to be led by a pretense to think that what this or that one says is the light, since it is thick darkness. Therefore forgive 1) yourselves, so that you do not fall under the umbrella of your name to these simple-minded people.

If we seek honor from men (as Christ says to the Jewish priests in John 5), how will we believe? If we want to protect our name, how will we stand, if the truth appears so clear that only men see how we have missed? We then raise such chicanery 2) we reproach the servants of truth, and press and urge the scripture that it may falsify 3) and look for theure words, under which we must bring forth the foul untruth; as Strauss does out through his whole little book. How often does he say: The tender body of Christ, or the tender presence 2c. and similar words! How often does he diminish our doctrine (which has its foundation in God's Word) so magnificently that even if he were learned and capable of doing something in God, he should not speak against the most wicked, the most contumacious, in such a lowly and arrogant manner! But where the matter is not good, and we do not want to be found wrong, the flesh does the same to him. This can be seen publicly in the case of the Anabaptists and those who protect flesh and blood here. What is too much for them to say?

But the costume of high words. How can he not be too quick for the simple? We all speak of the gospel; we read it; but many of them have truly not grasped it in their hearts and lives, because, alas, they only cling to the high and noble words of men. Yes, there are some friends and brothers who are dearer to me than I am, who also have no faith in the gospel and all doctrine.

1) i.e. shepherds.

2) "Chic" probably as much as: skillful way.

3) Maybe: sigh?

The people who have been blinded by the high speeches of the Logo-Dae- dalon, i.e. wordsmiths, have valued some doctrines (even after warning) so highly that they were nothing but polished words. And thus the seriousness to live piously and innocently was abandoned. And innumerable word-fighters have become, and a small number are those who do or suffer for the sake of righteousness (which is God); but for the sake of quarrels or gain, whether of good or name, we are prepared to do and suffer much. That is why we are so full of cruel deeds: for our speeches are now great and cruel, and in deed little brave. But bravery (as Seneca also teaches) is not doing cruel things, but holy, pious goodness for common peace and life. The feminine way, however, has come to us only from the poem of high words, and all talk highly and beautifully; and if one wants to see how brave we are with the deed Christians, we lie in the muck. We may not expect any danger, even harm, for the sake of God and our neighbor, but he has absolved us of his death with a board of directors. 2) In short, if we should become angels with life in the gospel, we become devils with quarrels and disputes.

124. And to this harm hardly a thing serves (I speak to God without contestation!), neither flesh and blood in the night meal and thanksgiving of Christ protect. For most of those who (after the manner of the prophets) should go to the highest princes and report their vices to them (with which some of them are so surrounded that it is seen that their home is with them), have not yet procured anything else from them, except that they are more ungracious toward the poor, more splendid with themselves, and stand forth, wanting to protect the flesh and blood; Let them then be said to be Christian princes, if they have brought the seducing teachers to forsake the true services of God, mercy, righteousness, and faith, and to protect the delusion, which no man ever believed, by killing the pious.

Therefore also here, pious princes, be admonished for God's sake, do not let yourselves be stirred up against the truth. Truly, truly, your scholars should not forbid you to hear or read this or that opinion, if it is still in the beginning of the unchallenged things; but since Carolstat first broke forth, they have graciously said to you: Do not argue and do not hurry, learn the truth; it behooves even a sinner in church to speak where a thing is dark.

Now the whole of Germany sees what is at stake, and the lords (who are like the gospel otherwise) are regarded as if they were gilders. It all comes from the fact that we think Christ is worshipped by eating his flesh, because of the seduction of those who teach such things out of the fear of lavish honor and the fear of harm. And Christ Joh. 17. thus says: "Father, I ask you for their sake, I will not now be in the world, but they are in the world" 2c. What else is this said, neither that he will no longer be here in the flesh? For what would have been the point of the visions, if he had only taken them away from us? would he therefore not have been bodily in the world?

If one reads the aforementioned chapter more closely, one will learn where it lies; and one should strive to be God-fearing, not God-talking; to put on Christ, not to eat; to bear the fruits of heavenly righteousness and innocence from within, not to make something internal by eating the flesh of Christ. May God give us poor people the sweet clarity of His Word and refreshment of our souls, that we may desire to live according to God! Amen.

In order that the simple-minded, who do not soon see what is in high gossip, may be less deceived, I will show three points in which Strauss and his part proceed, 3) because they do not have God's word.

I. The body of Christ is eaten here bodily, but invisibly, and Christ is here bodily, but invisibly, they speak not only without, but against God's word and against the article of faith.

II. the body of Christ, eaten in the flesh, fortifies the faith, gives the essential that one preaches and believes, they speak without God's word.

III Jacob teaches how to anoint the sick and to pray for them. Now where the apostles of Fortress would have believed in the bodily eating of the body of Christ, as they pretend, Jacob would have said before all things: Bring him the bread of the supper. For one needs the fortress of faith most of all in danger of death. God grant mercy!

6. Zwingli's Augsburg Confession.

27 Ulrich Zwingli's Confession of Faith, which he had presented to the Roman Emperor at the Imperial Diet held in Augsburg in 1530. *)

July 3, 1530.

Translated into German by M Aug Tittel.

We have waited, most just Emperor Charles, with desire that also we, who preach the gospel in the cities of the Christian community and cantons, would be required to confess the faith that we have and recognize. And since we keep ourselves so calm, we hear, more by uncertain rumor than certain message, that many have already written a sum or content of faith and religion, which they wanted to hand over to you. So we know neither advice nor help; for on the one hand, the love of truth and common peace drive us to do what we see others doing; On the other hand, the fleeting opportunity makes us anxious, both because, due to your alacrity, of which we have also heard the rumor, everything would have to be done quickly and immediately, and because we, who are preachers in the towns and villages of said cantons, are too far away and remote to be able to come together in such a short time and discuss what might be necessary to write to Your Highness. Since we have now seen other confessions, and even refutations of the very same opponents, who seem to have been ready before anything was demanded of them, I thought it would now be time for me to make my confession of faith [for] myself alone, but without detriment to my countrymen. For where otherwise it has been slow to proceed, it has at least been necessary to hasten in this, lest, if the bargain were missed, there should be danger either of suspicious silence, or of a defiant carelessness would fall upon me. I therefore hand over to you, Lord Emperor, my summa of faith, that I at the same time testify that I want to trust and leave the judgment not only of these articles, but also of everything that I will ever write or write with God's help, not to one or a few alone, but to the whole Church of Christ, insofar as it judges according to God's holy Word and His Spirit's government.

(2) First of all, I believe and know that there is one God and that he is by nature good, true, powerful, just, wise, a creator and governor of all things visible and invisible. That the Father, Son and Holy Spirit are three persons, but one and simple being. And hold throughout in all things of the Godhead itself and of the three names or persons according to the declaration of both the Nicene and Athanasian Creeds. Of the Son I hold and believe that He is flesh, that is, human nature, indeed, the whole man, consisting of body and soul, truly assumed by the immaculate and ever pure Virgin Mary, and in such a way that the same whole man has been assumed into the unity of the independence or person of the Son of God in such a way that the man has not constituted a person of his own, but has been assumed into the inseparable, indivisible and indissoluble person of the Son of God. Although both natures, namely the divine and the human, retain their nature and characteristics in such a way that both are found to be true and natural in him, the particular nature of the Son of God separates them from each other.

*) This writing was written by Zwingli in Latin and appeared, even before it was sent to Augsburg, in print in Zurich under the title: Oarolum Uomnnorum imperntorem, OerMuniae eornitin ^uKustne oelebrmntkM, üäei Hulärwüi L^inZlii ratio. On the third of July, 1530, Zwingli sent a copy of the same to Augsburg. In the same year it was reprinted in Zurich with the Dpistoln aä Ulustrissimos Oermanine Principes in cornitiis ^uAustnnis conAreZutos, in which he defends his confession of faith against an attack by Eck. In Zwingli's works, this writing is found Dorn. II, p. 538. In addition, this writing is appended to Oeolampad's vinloZus wider Melanchthon, Basel 1590, and printed in the "Unterricht von kirchlicher Vereinigung der Protestanten" by Ernst Saloin. Cyprian, Theil 2, p. 1. The authors of the "Historie des Sacramentsstreits" report p. 128 that Zwingli's special confession "was printed in Latin and German at Zurich on July 3, 1530, and soon arrived at Augsburg. Walch, because he could not get the old translation, had the Scripture translated anew. We reproduce this translation.

The fact that the qualities and works of nature do not in any way affect the unity of the person, just as body and soul do not make two separate persons in the human being. For as these are by nature quite distinct, so they also have different qualities and effects. The human being, however, who consists of them, is therefore only one, but not two persons. Thus God and man are One Christ. Son of God from eternity; Son of man from the order of time in eternity: One Person, One Christ, perfect God, perfect man; not that one nature becomes the other, or is mixed under itself, but that each remains its own and only the unity of the person is not separated by such quality. Accordingly it happens that after the human nature the same some Christ whimpers as a child. He grows, increases in wisdom, hungers, thirsts, eats, drinks, has heat, freezes, suffers pranks, sweats, is wounded and killed, is afraid, becomes sad, and suffers more such things, which belong to the punishment and chastisement because of sin, although he remains far away from sin itself. But according to the divine nature, together with his Father, he rules heaven and earth, penetrates everything, sustains and carries it; he makes the blind see, the lame walk, the dead live, he terrifies and strikes down the enemies with one word, even when he has died, he comes to life again, goes to heaven, sends down the Holy Spirit from there; so that all this is done by the same one Christ, although in a different way and nature, and remains in one person of the Son of God. In the same way, what is merely of the divine nature is sometimes attributed to the human nature because of the unity and perfection of the person, and what is human is sometimes said to be of the divine nature. He said that the Son of man was in heaven at the time when he had not yet touched or entered heaven with his body. And Peter says that Christ suffered for us, since mankind can only suffer. But because of the unity of the person, it is rightly said that the Son of God suffered and the Son of Man forgave sin; for he who is both the Son of God and the Son of Man in one person suffered according to human nature, and he who is the Son of God and the Son of Man in one person forgives sin according to divine nature. As we say that man is wise, although he consists of both body and soul, and the body has nothing at all to do with wisdom, indeed, is poison and hindrance to wisdom and understanding. Again, it is also said of him that he is wounded, since the body alone can receive wounds which

But soul by no means. Here no one says that two persons become from the human being, if each part is assigned its own. Nor does anyone say that the natures are mixed, if that is said of the whole man, which belongs to the whole (being) because of the unity of the person, but because of the properties of the natures is only one of them. Paul says, "When I am sick [weak], then I am strong." But who is it that is sick? Answer: Paul. Who is healthy (and strong) at the same time? Paul. But doesn't that sound unequal, contrary and self-contradictory? Not at all. For Paul is not one nature, though one person. Now when he says, "I am sick," it is true that the person who is Paul is speaking; but what is said does not refer to both natures, but only to weakness of the flesh. And when he says, "I am strong and healthy," it is certainly Paul's person speaking, but only the soul and his spirit are meant. In this way also the Son of God dies, namely he who is God and man at the same time according to the one and simple person; but he dies only according to humanity alone.

3. in this way I do not believe alone, but all the old orthodox teachers, as well as the new ones, have believed in this way about the Godhead and the persons and the assumed nature; and all who know the truth are still of this mind.

4. secondly, I know that the supreme being, who is my God, decides freely about all things, so that he does not rely and depend with his counsel on any creature opportunity; for this is the characteristic of lame human wisdom, that it decides something by a previous consideration or example. But God, who overlooks everything from eternity to eternity with a single and simple glance, does not need any reasoning or consideration at all, or that something has happened beforehand (to act according to it), but as an always equally wise, prudent, kind 2c. Being he decides freely about all things, because his is everything that is there. Hence it came about that, although he created the man who would fall with knowledge and good consideration, he also thereby decided to clothe his Son with human nature, that he raised up the fallen one. For thereby his goodness was revealed in all things. Inasmuch as it carries with it both mercy and justice, and therefore made justice manifest, since, when he sinned, it drove him out of the blessed dwelling of paradise, and put him into the dungeon of human misery and the bondage of toil and sickness, and with the

He was not only in the midst of a double misery, but also in the midst of the fear of the transgressed law. For here he learned in double misery not only that the flesh would be in misery, but also that the mind would be afflicted with the fear of the transgressed law. For since he saw in the spirit that the law was holy, just and a message of the divine will, because it required nothing but what was in accordance with equity, but at the same time he also became aware that he was not fulfilling the law with works, he condemned himself, gave up all hope of attaining salvation, and fled from God's presence in despair, thinking only of how he would endure eternal torment. Thus, the justice of God was revealed. But since it was also necessary to reveal the goodness that He had decided from eternity to show as well as the justice, God sent His Son to accept our nature in all things, except in so far as it is inclined to sin, that he might become a mediator as a brother and equal to us in all things, who would be sufficient for us to the divine justice, which had to remain completely holy and unbreakable, just like his goodness, so that the world would be assured that justice was reconciled and that God's goodness was present. For since he gave his Son to us and for us, how should he not give us everything with him and for his sake? What should we not hope for from him who condescended so far that he not only became like us, but also ours? Who could admire enough the riches of divine goodness and grace, since he so loved the world that he gave his Son for its life? I consider this to be the right source and streams of the Gospel, the only remedy and strengthening of the languishing soul, by which it is brought back to God and to itself; for nothing can make him certain of God's grace but God Himself. But He has poured out such grace upon us so mildly, abundantly, and wisely that we can desire nothing more than the highest and overflowing abundance.

Thirdly, I know that there is no other sacrifice to atone for sin than Christ, for even Paul was not crucified for us, and that there is no more certain and undoubted sign of divine goodness and mercy than the same; for nothing is so certain as God. And there is no other name under the sun whereby we must be saved, but the name of Jesus Christ.

(6) Thus are set aside here both the justification of our own works and satisfaction, and that of all the saints who may be in heaven.

or earth, their satisfaction or intercession, to procure the goodness and grace of God. For this is the only mediator of God and men, namely the God-Man, Christ Jesus. But God's choice remains firm and unchanged. For those whom he chose before the foundation of the world was laid, he so chose that he united them to himself through his Son. For as he is merciful and kind, so he is also holy and just; thus all his works contain mercy and justice. Therefore also the election of the same has in itself. This is goodness, that he chooses those whom he wills; and this is righteousness, that he unites and binds the elect to himself through his Son, who became a sacrifice to satisfy divine justice for us.

Fourthly, I know that our forefather, the first man, out of self-love, since the devil had wronged him out of envy, fell so far as to want to become like God. Since he decided to commit such a sin, he ate the forbidden and harmful apple, thereby deserving death as an enemy and insulter of God. Since God was able to destroy him according to all law, He, out of kindness, changed the punishment into a state and made him a servant whom He could have executed. Neither he nor anyone born of him could change this status (because no servant can beget anything other than servants), and consequently the entire descendants fell into servitude through this harmful food. Here is my opinion of original sin: it is rightly called sin because it is against the law; 1) for where there is no law, there is no transgression, and where there is no transgression, there is no sin in the true sense, inasmuch as sin is vice, evil, crime and debt.

(8) I therefore confess that our father sinned in the right sense, that he committed an evil, wickedness and wrong. But those who are descended from him have not sinned in the same way; for which of us in paradise reached for the forbidden apple and ate it with his teeth? Must we therefore admit, even without our will, that original sin, as it is in Adam's children, is not really sin, as has already been shown; for it is not a deed contrary to the law.

1) This sentence seems to us to be erroneous, and it cannot be brought into agreement with what is said in the following paragraph. We suppose that it should be read: "it is not rightly called sin, because it is not contrary to the law. For Zwingli also teaches in other places (as in the following) that original sin is only "an infirmity" (Prest).

the law. It is actually only a disease (infirmity) and state. A disease, because, as he fell out of self-love, we also fall in the same way. A state, because, as he became a servant and guilty of death, so we are also born as servants and children of wrath and consequently are subject to death. Although I do not deny that such a disease and state, according to Paul, is called sin, yes, such a sin that all who are born in it are God's enemies and adversaries; for the state of their birth brings them to this, not the actual act of wickedness, insofar as the first man once committed such. Is therefore the wrong and sin committed by Adam the true cause of the divine insult and death? And this is truly sin. But the sin that is attached to us is also truly a plague and state, or necessity to die. But this would not have happened according to birth, if sin had not corrupted birth; thus human misery comes from sin as a cause, but not from birth. From birth, however, not unlike something that flows from the source and cause.

This opinion is confirmed by testimony and example. Paul, Rom. 5, speaks thus: "For if death has prevailed through one for one sin, rather" 2c. Here we see that sin is actually taken away. For it is Adam alone through whose guilt death hangs over our necks. In the 3rd chapter he thus speaks: "For all have sinned and lack glory", that is, the goodness and grace of God. Here sin is taken for sickness, state and birth, so that it is said of us that we all sin even before we are born, that is, that we are in the state of sin and death even before we really sin. Which opinion is quite irrefutably confirmed by the very same words of Rom. 5, thus: "But death reigned and prevailed from Adam to Moses, even to them that sinned not in like manner as Adam transgressed." Behold, we have death, though we have not sinned in the manner of Adam. Why? Answer: Because he sinned. But why does death come upon us, who have not sinned in the same way? Answer: Because he died because of sin, and thus begat us dead, that is, condemned to death. So we also die, but through his fault, only according to our state and sickness, or sin, if it is taken in the unqualified sense. Now I will also give an example: A prisoner in war has, through disloyalty and enmity, deserves to be kept as a servant. Now those who are born of him, as members of the household or those born at home, become bond servants; not through their guilt, crimes and misdeeds, but through the state that is descended from guilt. For the father from whom they were born deserved it through his guilt. The children are without guilt, but not without the punishment and penance of guilt, namely, serfdom, servitude and penitentiary. If one wants to call this misdeed (or sin), it must be because one suffers it for the sake of no actual sin.

(10) This original sin, I further believe, is inherent in all men by the natural pestilence and estate, which are derived from the lust of man and woman. And I know that we are children of wrath; but by grace, which through the other Adam, Christ, has helped our fall, we are undoubtedly made and accepted again as children of God. But this in the following way.

(11) Fifthly, it is evident from this that if in Christ, the other Adam, we are brought to life again, as Adam's, the first man's, fall brought us to death, we wrongfully condemn the children of Christian parents. For if Adam by sinning corrupted the whole human race, but Christ by dying did not redeem the whole race from the harm done by him and make it alive again: so the salvation obtained by Christ is not equal to corruption, and so (which God forbid!) wrong (what Paul says): "As in Adam we all die, even so in Christ shall we all be made alive again." But be it as it may with the children of the Gentiles, we assert this, because of the power of the salvation acquired through Christ, that those judge falsely who condemn them to eternal damnation, both because of said redemption and because of the free election of God, which does not follow faith, but precedes it; of which in the following article. For those who are chosen from eternity are necessarily chosen before faith. Therefore, those who do not yet have faith by age must not be condemned by us so quickly; for even if they do not have it, God's election is still hidden from us. Which, if he has chosen them, we judge too soon from what we do not know.

(12) But of the children of Christians we say another thing, namely, that the children of Christians, as many as they are, belong to the church of God's people, and are parts and members of the same church. Which we thus prove: It is almost through all

The prophets promise that the church will be gathered from the Gentiles to the church of the people of God. And Christ himself says: "They will come from morning and evening, and sit at the table with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. Likewise, "Go ye into all the world" 2c. But to the Jewish church also belonged their children as well as the Jews themselves. Therefore, our children also belong to the church of Christ, as well as to the Jews themselves; for if it were otherwise, the promise would be null and void, for we would not sit at the table with God as Abraham did. For he also was reckoned to the church with those who were also born of him according to the flesh. But if ours were not so reckoned with the parents, Christ would be meager and envious toward us, since he denied us what he gave to the ancients. But this is ungodly to say, for then the whole promise of the prophets concerning the calling of the Gentiles would come to nothing. Since the children of Christians belong to the visible church of Christ as well as the adults, it is also clear that they belong to the number of those whom we call the elect as well as the parents. Therefore I believe that those act presumptuously and ungodly who curse the children of Christians. For so many clear testimonies of Scripture are against this, and say that the church of the Gentiles will not only be equal to the Jewish church, but will be much greater. All of which will now become clearer when we present our faith in the church. (13) Sixthly, we hold of the church in this way: that the church is taken in Scripture in various ways; a.) from the elect, who are ordained by God's will to eternal life, of which Paul speaks when he says: "It has neither wrinkle nor spot," Eph. 5. This is known to God alone, for He alone knows, as Solomon says, the hearts of the children of men (1 Kings 8). However, those who are members of this church know well that they themselves, because they have faith, are the chosen and most distinguished members of such a church; but other members than they do not know it. For thus it is written in the Acts of the Apostles, "And as many as were ordained unto eternal life believed." Now those who believe are ordained to eternal life. But those who truly believe know no one but the one who believes, for he is already certain that he is God's chosen one; for he has the pledge of the Spirit, according to the word of the apostle, by which he is betrothed and sealed, and thus knows that he has been set free and has become a child, but is no longer a servant. For the same Spirit cannot deceive. If then he says to us that God is our Father, and that we call him Father with all confidence, and are reconciled that we shall inherit eternity: then it is certain that the Spirit of the Son of God has been poured into our hearts. It is therefore certain that he is chosen who is confident and secure in this way, for those who believe have been ordained to eternal life.

(14) But since many are chosen who do not have faith; for the Holy Mother of God, John, Paul, when they were children and little ones, were they not chosen from the beginning of the world? But they knew it neither from faith nor from revelation. Likewise Matthew, Zacchaeus, the thief, and Magdalene, were they not chosen before the world began? And yet they did not know it until they were enlightened by the Spirit and drawn to Christ by the Father. Thus it is concluded that the same first church is known to God alone, and that only those who have a certain and unaltered faith know that they are members of this church.

15. b) But the church is also taken to mean all those who are called by Christ's name, that is, those who are called Christians, many of whom recognize Christ outwardly through confession and the communion of the sacraments, but do not respect or know him in their hearts. To this church we count all who confess Christ's name. Thus Judas was of the church of Christ, and all those who afterwards departed from Christ. For the apostle counts Judas as belonging to the church of Christ as well as Peter or John, since he was nothing less than a member of it. But Christ knew who were his own and who were of the devil. This, then, is the outward church, even though it does not come together (or is not united) in this world, namely, all who confess Christ, although there are many reprobates among them. For Christ delicately portrayed it in the likeness of the ten virgins, some of whom were wise and others foolish. For she is sometimes called elect, though she be not the first that hath neither spot nor wrinkle: but as she is a church of God according to the opinion of the people, according to the outward confession, so is she called elect, because we hold them to be faithful and elect which call themselves after Christ. Thus Peter said, "To the elect," he says, "who are in various places in Ponto," 2c., where by the elect he understands all who belonged to the churches to which he wrote, not only those who were actually chosen by the Lord; for as Peter did not know such, he could not have written to them.

16. c) At last, the church is also used for a

Each separate cluster of this general and external church is taken as the Roman, Augsburg, and Lyonian churches.

(17) But there are other meanings of the church, which it is unnecessary to mention now. Now here I believe that one church is those who have one spirit, so that they are assured that they are true children of God; these are the firstfruits of the church. This may not err in faith, namely in the first reasons of faith, on which the main work consists. I also believe that a general external one is, if it holds to the confession of which we have already said. I also believe that those belong to the Church who profess it according to the precept and promise of the Word of God. I believe that the children of Isaac, Jacob, Judah, and all who were of Abraham's seed, as well as the children whose parents became Christians at the beginning of the church, at the time of the apostles' preaching, belong to such a church. For if Isaac and the rest of the ancients had not belonged to it, they would not have had the sign of the church. Since they were of the church, the children and infants of the first church were also of it. Therefore I believe and am sure that they are also marked with the sacrament of baptism. For even children make their confession when they are presented to the church by their parents, yes, when they present the promise, which is so abundantly made to our children, yes, more abundantly and more often than to the old children of the Hebrews.

(18) And these are the reasons why children should be baptized and given to the church, against which all the arrows and armor of the Anabaptists are useless. For not only those who believe are to be baptized, but also those who confess, who belong to the church according to the promise of the word of God. Otherwise no apostle would baptize anyone, since no apostle knows for sure whether the one who professes to belong to the church has faith. For Simon the Magician, Ananias, Judas and who else is not baptized, since he outwardly professed Christianity, even though he did not believe. Isaac, on the other hand, was circumcised as a child, since he neither professed nor believed, but the promise drew him to the church. Therefore, since our children are as good as the Hebrew's, the promise also gives the name to our church and confesses (for them). Does baptism as well as circumcision (but we are talking about the sacrament of baptism) really require nothing but one of the two, either confession or outward accession, or the covenant and promise. All of which will become clearer from the following.

Seventh, I believe and know that all sacraments do not confer grace at all, that they do not even extend or withhold it. In this I might seem to you, most great emperor, to be all too freely excusing myself. But it remains so. For grace is wrought and given by the Holy Spirit (but I speak in Latin when I use the word grace, and understand it to mean pardon, kindness, and benevolence without merit or reward), and therefore this gift belongs to the Spirit alone. The Spirit, however, does not need an escort or a chariot, for he himself is the power and the carriage by which everything is led, and does not need to be led; nor do we ever read in sacred Scripture that external things, such as the sacraments, certainly bring the Spirit with them, but if external things have ever come with the Spirit, it was the Spirit who brought it, not the external things. So when a violent wind came, the languages came with it by the power of the wind, but the wind was not carried by the power of the languages. Thus the wind brought quails, and carried away the locusts; but never were quails or locusts so sufficient and fleeting as to bring the wind. So, since such a great wind, that it could also carry away mountains, passed by Elijah, yet the Lord was not in the wind. In short: "The spirit (wind) blows where it will", that is, blows in such a way as it is its kind, "and you hear its voice, but you do not know where it comes from and where it becomes still. So is every one that is born of the Spirit"; that is, is enlightened and drawn in an invisible and unnoticed way. Truth has spoken this; therefore, is not the grace of the Spirit brought about by this immersion or that potion or anointing; for if it were, one would know how, where, whither, or upon what the Spirit came. For if the presence and power of grace is bound to the sacraments, they work where they are brought; and where they do not come, everything becomes dull and miserable. And here theologians do not have to talk about the matter or person who receives them, that such must be in good condition, that is, that the grace of baptism or the Lord's Supper (so they say) is given to him who is first sent to it. For he who receives such grace through the sacraments (as they will) either makes himself fit for it, or is prepared by the Spirit. If he does it himself, we are also able to do something by ourselves, and the grace that occurs is nothing. But if he is prepared by the Spirit for the reception of grace, I ask: whether it also happens under the guidance of a sacrament, or apart from the sacrament? Where it happens by means of a sacrament, man is prepared for the sacrament through the sacrament, and this will always go on indefinitely, so that a sacrament is always necessary for the preparation of the sacrament. But where he is prepared for the reception of the sacramental grace without the sacrament, the spirit with its grace is also present before the sacrament, and thus grace has happened and is present before the sacrament comes. From this the conclusion is drawn (which I readily admit and permit in the sacramental trade) that the sacraments are given as a public testimony to that grace which is already present in each individual person beforehand. Thus baptism is given before or in the presence of the church to those who, before receiving it, have already confessed the Christian religion, or have the word of promise, by which it is known that they belong to the church. Therefore, when we baptize an adult, we ask if he believes. If he says, "Yes," then he receives baptism. But when a child is presented, we ask: do the parents present it for baptism? And if they answer by witnesses: they want it to be baptized, then the child is baptized. And here God's promise has gone before, that he will count our children to the church as well as the children of the Hebrews. For when those who are of the church present it, the child is baptized, with the condition that, because it is born of Christians, it is counted among the members of the church by divine promise. Thus, through baptism, the Church receives the one who is first received by grace. Therefore, baptism does not bring grace, but only testifies to the Church that the one to whom it is given has already received it.

(20) I therefore believe, Lord Emperor, that the sacrament is a sign of a holy thing, namely, of the grace that has taken place. I believe that it is a visible form or image of the invisible grace, which was given and bestowed out of God's benevolence, that is, a visible example, which is quite similar to the thing done by the Spirit; in short, that it is a public testimony. For example, when we are baptized, the body is washed with the purest element (or earthly substance), but this also indicates that (such people) are accepted by the grace of divine goodness into the community of the church and the people of God, in which one must live purely and innocently. Thus Paul explains the mystery in Romans 6, testifying to the one who receives baptism that he is a member of the Church of God.

who serves their Lord by healthy faith and holy life. And for this reason the sacraments must be held in great honor as holy ceremonies (for the word comes to the element and then becomes a sacrament), so that they are held in high esteem and treated honorably. For even if they do not give or confer grace, they still visibly add us to the church, which before we were only invisibly received into it; which, if it is proclaimed and made known at the same time as the divine words of promise, must be accompanied and venerated with the greatest devotion. But if we think otherwise of the sacraments, as if they, when used outwardly, purified inwardly, there is already a new Judaism, according to which it was believed that sins were atoned for by anointing, smearing, offering, eating, and the like, and that grace was, as it were, purchased. Which the prophets, and especially Isaiah and Jeremiah, have always rebuked, and taught that the promises and benefits of God are bestowed by pure grace, and not because of any merit or outward ceremonies. For I hold that the Anabaptists, when they deny baptism to the children of believers, are terribly mistaken, and in many other things as well as in this; but now is not the time to speak of them. But I, by God's help, have first taught and written against them, not without danger, that one should avoid their foolishness or wickedness, so that. Thank God! their pestilence among our people has abated very much. So I have been far from accepting, teaching and claiming the slightest thing from this rebellious mob.

Eighth, I believe that in the holy supper, that is, the thanksgiving supper, the true body of Christ is present in the vision of faith, that is, that those who give thanks to the Lord for the benefit shown to us in his Son recognize him in this way, that he truly took on flesh, truly suffered in it, truly washed away our sins with his blood, and thus everything that Christ did is, as it were, presented to them through the eyes of faith.

22) But that Christ's body is essentially and really, namely the natural body itself, either present in the Lord's Supper or chewed and eaten with the teeth, as the Popes, and some who look back to the Egyptian fleshpots, have pretended: we not only deny this, but also constantly hold it to be an error in conflict with God's word. Which, with God's help, I have told Your Majesty, Mr. Emperor, in a few as clear as the sun is in the sky. And that a) with sayings of the holy scripture; b) afterwards with conclusions from the same, which I want to let loose like storm goats against the adversaries; c) finally with attraction of old divine teachers, who have also been on our side.

23 But You, Creator Holy Spirit, help us and enlighten the minds of Your people. Fill the hearts you have created with grace and light! Christ Himself, a) God's mouth and wisdom, therefore speaks aa): "You will always have the poor with you, but you will not always have me" (John 13). Here it is only denied that he will not be present with your body, because according to the Godhead he is present everywhere, because there he is everywhere at all times, as another saying testifies: "I am with you until the end of the world", namely according to the Godhead, power and grace. Augustine agrees with us. And the opponents must not object: the humanity of Christ is everywhere where the divinity is, otherwise the person would be torn apart. For in this way the true humanity of Christ would rather perish, for nothing but God can be everywhere. And the fact that mankind is in one place, but the Godhead everywhere, separates the person as little as it separates the unity of the essence that the Son assumed mankind. Indeed, it would be more necessary to separate such unity of essence by the fact that one person accepts the creature, which the other [persons] do not accept, than that the person should be separated by this; for mankind is in one place, but the Godhead is in all. For We also see that among the creatures there are bodies which are bound to one place, but whose power and authority extend very far. We have the example of the sun, whose body is in one place, but whose power travels everywhere. The human soul travels above the stars and into the lowest world, and yet the body remains in one place.

24. dd) Again he says: "Again I leave the world and go to the Father." Here the word "leave" is written, as above "have", that the opponents must not say: We have him not visibly. For when he speaks of visibly taking away his body, he thus speaks, "Over a little, ye shall not see me." And would it come out great if one wanted to argue that his natural body was present, but invisible. For why should he not be seen who would be present, since he showed himself to his disciples so often after the resurrection? "But it is good for you," he says, "that I go." If

But if he remained here, it would not be good that he should not be seen. For as often as the disciples fell into error at the sight of him, he evidently showed himself that neither the senses nor the thoughts were deceived. "Take hold of me and feel me," he says. Likewise: "Do not be afraid, it is I." And: "Mary, do not touch me" 2c.

25. cc) When at his going he commanded the disciples to the Father, he said, "I shall henceforth be no more in the world," χαί ύχ ει etc., here the verbum substantivum is: "I am henceforth no more in the world," as in these words: "this is my body," so that the adversaries cannot say here either that it is a vague speech (or word-form), since they deny that in substantivis such a thing takes place. Although we do not need this here either, for it follows: "But these are in the world" (John 17). This contrast shows that he would not be in the world at that time, according to human nature, if the disciples were in it.

26. dd) And that we know when he departed, not, as they more clear than declare, made himself invisible, so Lucas saith, "And it came to pass, when he departed from them, that he departed from them, and was received up into heaven." He does not speak: he disappeared 2c., or: made himself invisible.

27. of which Marcus thus says: "The Lord, after he had spoken to them, was taken up into heaven, and sits at the right hand of God. He does not say: He stayed here, but made his body invisible. Likewise Lucas says in the Acts of the Apostles, "When he had said these things, he was lifted up and taken away in their sight; but a cloud took him away from before their eyes." The cloud covered him, which it would not have needed if he had only withdrawn his sight from them, but had otherwise been present. Nor would he have needed to be lifted up and moved away.

28 There it is written: "This Jesus, who was taken up into heaven before you, will come in the same way as you saw him go into heaven. What is clearer than this? "Before you," he says, "he was taken up." So then he has not been with them, either visibly or invisibly, according to human nature. When we shall see him come again, as he went, we shall know that he is there. Otherwise, according to human nature, he sits at the right hand of God the Father until he comes again to judge the living and the dead.

29) But there are some who deny the place of the body of Christ, saying that it is in no place.

place, let them see how they shut their eyes to the truth. He is in the manger, on the cross, at Jerusalem, where the parents were on the way, in the tomb, apart from the tomb, as the angel says, "He is risen, and is not here; behold the place where they laid him." And lest they should say that his body is everywhere, let them hear what follows: "Jesus came when the doors were shut, and stood in the midst of them." What would he have needed to come if his body had been there before, yes! invisibly present everywhere? It would have been enough that he had not come, but, because he was already there, had only shown himself. But away with such lying gossip, by which the truth of Christ's humanity and of the Holy Scriptures is destroyed!

(30) These testimonies prove that the body of Christ is not present everywhere except in heaven, if one speaks in a canonical way, that is, as much as the Scriptures teach us about the nature and quality of the assumed body, and as much as self-contradictory things enforce, since we would never have to twist and exalt the power of God, no matter how great we imagine it to be, in such a way that we would have to believe that God does something contrary to His word. For that would be more powerlessness than power.

31) But that the natural body of Christ is not eaten with our mouth, he himself shows, when he says to the Jews, who disputed about his bodily food, "the flesh is of no use," to indicate that it does not serve for natural food, but for spiritual food, because it gives life.

32. that which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit. If therefore the natural body of Christ is eaten with our mouths, what else can naturally eaten flesh become but flesh again? And that this conclusion may thin no man small, we may hear but the other piece: "That which is born of the spirit is spirit." So then, what is spirit is born of the spirit. Now if the flesh of Christ is wholesome to the soul, it must be enjoyed spiritually and not bodily. And this also belongs to the matter of the sacraments, that the spirit is begotten of the spirit, but not by anything corporeal, as we have already touched.

33) Paul dd) also remembers that even though he once knew Christ according to the flesh, he no longer knows Him according to the flesh.

34 By such passages we are forced to confess that the words "this is my body" are not natural but significant.

as the: "This is the passover" (or paschal lamb), was to be understood. For the lamb, eaten annually, with the celebration of the feast itself, was not the passage (or pre-passage), but only meant that such a passing or leaping had happened. In addition, there is also the succession, namely that the Lord's Supper followed the paschal lamb, so that Christ would certainly have used the same words; for such a succession is of one kind. In addition, the words are used in the same way; likewise, the time when in the Lord's Supper first the old Lord's Supper is mentioned and then the new thanksgiving (or thanksgiving meal) is instituted. In addition, there are all the memorials 1) property, which tend to be called after the thing that they mention or bring back to mind. Thus the Athenians called σεσάχ&εαν; (?) not that all the The reason for this is that Solon's debts were paid off every year, but because what Solon did was always celebrated; and they called such celebrations after the thing itself; so it is also called Christ's body and blood, which are signs of the true body (and blood).

35. d) Now follow the conclusions, aa) As the body cannot be nourished by a spiritual thing, so also the soul cannot be nourished with something physical. But if the natural body of Christ is eaten, I ask: does he feed the body or the soul? Answer: He does not feed the body, but the soul; if the soul, then the soul eats flesh, and so this would not be true, that the spirit is born only of the spirit.

36. bb) Secondly, I ask this: what does the naturally consumed body of Christ do? If forgiveness of sins, as one part says, then the disciples have already received forgiveness of sins in the Lord's Supper, consequently Christ died in vain afterwards. If it presents the power of Christ's suffering through eating, as the same part says, then the power of Christ's suffering and redemption has been shared before these come to pass. If it is eaten for the resurrection, as another even unlearned one claims, it will rather heal our body and save it from diseases. But Irenaeus wants it in another way, how our body is fed by the body of Christ to the resurrection, because he wants to show that our hope of the resurrection is strengthened. Ei! of the beautiful efflorescence!

37. oo) So also, if Christ's natural body was given to the disciples in the Lord's Supper, it must necessarily follow that it is eaten as he was at that time. But at that time he was suffering.

1) In the margin: xxxxxxx, the memories, commemorative sign.

If they say that they ate the same body, but not as it was wounded, but just as it was after the resurrection, we object: either he had two bodies, one that had not yet been transfigured and another that had already been transfigured, or one and the same body was both corporeal and incorporeal at the same time. And so, since he was so afraid of death, he did not want to suffer, but to use the gift of the body, so that he did not feel pain. Thus, he did not really suffer, but only in appearance, so that Marcion is brought back to us by our opponents in a very fine way. One could draw many hundred other conclusions, dear Mr. Kaiser, but these may be enough for this time.

38. o) But that the ancients (which is the last part of this article) believed the same with us, I will prove with two witnesses, which are probably the most distinguished among the others.

39 Ambrose, speaking about 1 Cor. and the words: "You shall proclaim the death of the Lord", says: "Because we are saved by the death of the Lord, we remember it and aim with food and drink at the body and the blood that was sacrificed for us". 2c. But Ambrose speaks of the food and drink of the Lord's Supper, and pretends that we mean by it the true things which have been sacrificed for us.

40 Similarly, Augustino, tract. 30. in John asserts "that the body of Christ, raised from the dead, must be in one place," since in the printed copies it says "may" instead of "must," but quite wrongly, for one reads both in the Magistro sententiarum and in the canonical decrees where such a passage is referred to Augustini.

41 From this we must clearly see that the ancients understood it not of the natural eating of the body of Christ, but of the spiritual, they may otherwise speak so gloriously of the Lord's Supper. For since they knew that Christ's body must be in one place, and that it was at the right hand of God, they did not pull it down to give it to be chewed with the rotten teeth of men.

42. the same Augustine has also Wider Adimantum Cap. 12. the following three things: The blood is the soul; that is my body; and the rock was Christ, significantly, that is how he a sign and a way of meaning. And among many others he finally comes to these words: I can also interpret that such a commandment is a sign. For the Lord had no hesitation in saying: 'This is my body' when he gave the sign of his body." So far Augustine.

(43) There then is the key by which we may unlock all the Old Ones' speeches about the Lord's Supper. He says that what was called "body" was merely the sign of the body. So let those who want to heresy us go and reproach us, but at the same time know that they condemn the highest theologian, Wider der Pabste Decrete.

44 From this it is evident that the ancients always spoke meaningfully when they spoke of the body of Christ being eaten in the Lord's Supper, namely, not that sacramental food could purify the soul, but faith in God through Jesus Christ, which is the spiritual food, of which the outward food is only an image and shadow. And as bread sustains the body, and wine strengthens and gladdens it, so (such food) makes the mind certain and firm of the mercy of God in giving us His Son. Thus it comforts the mind that the sins which offended it are blotted out by his blood.

45 With these passages we want to be satisfied this time, whether one could write out whole books to explain and prove that the ancients were of our opinion. And no one must be mistaken by the recently published writing of the opinion of the ancients, which he promises to assert with explicit words 8oi1. For we will soon see the refutation of it by our highly learned brother Oecolampadii's work, who has especially set himself to defend the ancients' opinion. But what is still required to explain these matters further or to refute the opponents, we, who are of this opinion, have already sufficiently explained and accomplished in many writings addressed to different ones.

46. d) I believe that ceremonies which neither come from superstition nor are contrary to the word of God (although I do not know whether such things are to be found) can be tolerated out of love until he, the morning star, rises more and more; but at the same time I also believe, as love teaches me, that such ceremonies are to be abolished if it can be done without great annoyance, whether those argue against it who are peacefully minded. For Christ did not forbid the Magdalene to perform her

1) "zwo" is wrong here. Because "zween" is used masculine, "zwo" feminine, "zwei" neuter.

The ointment was to be poured out, although Jude's avarice and disloyalty prevented them with great clamor.

(47) I do not count the images that are displayed for worship among the ceremonies, but among the things that clearly conflict with God's word. But those that are not displayed for worship, or where there is no danger that they will be worshipped, I do not condemn at all, but rather accept both painting and sculpture as gifts from God.

48 Tenth. I believe that the office of prophecy or preaching is sacred because it is most necessary before all other offices. For if one wants to speak canonically or correctly, we see that the outward preaching of the apostles and evangelists or bishops preceded faith among all peoples, which we attribute to the Spirit alone. For we see, alas, many who hear the outward preaching of the Gospel, but do not believe because they lack the Spirit. Where prophets, that is, preachers of the Word, are sent, it is a sign of God's grace, because he wants to reveal the knowledge of himself to his elect. And to whom such teachers are denied, it is a sign of impending disgrace. 1) As can be inferred from the prophets and Paul's example, who was sometimes called to some, but prevented from going to others and forbidden to do so.

(49) Even the laws and authorities for the administration of the common law cannot be better supported and established than by prophecy. For what is right is commanded in vain if those who are commanded do not observe justice and love equity. For this purpose the minds prepare the prophets as servants, but the spirit as the master, both of the teacher and the hearer. Such kind of people or servants, who teach, comfort, warn, care and watch, we recognize by faith in the people of God. Also those who baptize and in the Lord's Supper carry the body and blood of Christ (for so we also call the holy bread and wine by a change of name); who visit the sick. They feed the poor from church property and in their name; yes, also those who read, interpret and teach publicly, so that either they themselves or others may be sent by it and one day preside over the church. But the kind with high bishop's hats and staffs, which are only there to eat and drink and are a harmful plague of the fields, we recognize to be wrong, and that they

1) Should probably mean: "of the disgraced" i.e. that they are disgraced.

Nothing is better on the body of the church than the goiters and humps or humps on the human body.

Fifty-fifth. I also believe that the lawful authority is in God's stead, as well as the office of prophecy. For as the prophet is a minister of heavenly wisdom and goodness, as one who teaches by faith and brings error to light, so the authorities are ministers of goodness and justice. Goodness, that it may hear the grievances of its own in God's stead with faith and humility and help them for the best. Justice, that it may punish the wicked and protect the innocent. If the prince has such gifts, I believe his conscience has nothing to fear. But if he does not have them, and yet shows himself terrible and fearful, then I believe that his conscience is not free because of this, and has nothing to fear, because he has been rightly chosen and crowned. At the same time, however, I also believe that a Christian must obey such tyrants until the occasion of which Paul speaks: "If thou canst become free, much more must thou do so"; which, however, God alone must show, but not man, and that not in a dark, but in such a tangible and obvious way, as Saul was formerly rejected, but David was chosen as his successor. And because of the womb and duty that one must give up in order to be protected, I certainly agree with Pauli, Rom. 13.

(51) Twelfthly, I believe that the poem of the purgatory is as blasphemous a thing to the gracious redemption given by Christ as it is profitable and profitable to its poets. For if we have to redeem our sins and misdeeds with punishment and chastisement, then Christ will have died in vain, so grace is vain. And what more vain thing can be devised in Christendom? Or what kind of Christ do those have who let themselves be called Christians, and yet are afraid of this fire, which is more a vapor than a fire? But that there is a hell, where the faithless, the disobedient and the apostate are eternally punished with Jxion and Tantalus (in the fables), I believe and am sure of it. For the truth, when it speaks of the general judgment, reports that after such judgment some will go into eternal torment. So after the general judgment there will be an eternal fire.

52 For this reason the Anabaptists are all the less able to get away with their Olam, that is, eternity, which they need for the sake of their error, since they want the eternal not to go beyond the common judgment. For here Christus From the eternal fire that will burn after judgment, and will torment the devil with all his angels, with the wicked who despise God, with the cruel tyrants who suppress the truth with lies, and do not relieve the poor man's distress from the heart and in faith.

I believe, teach and defend this, as I have now stated it one after the other, not with my own words, but with the words of the holy Scriptures, and I promise that I will do it according to God's will as long as there is breath in me. Unless someone explains and explains the opposite from rightly understood sayings of the holy scriptures as clearly and distinctly as we do what is ours. For to submit ours to God's word and to the church, if it judges according to it in the spirit, we do so willingly and gladly, as it is fair and right. We could have done everything more extensively and abundantly, but since there was no opportunity, we have been satisfied with it and consider it to be things of the kind that can easily be touched, but not overturned, according to today's common way. But if someone wants to say it, he will not hunt much. For then we will fully bring forward and need our remaining rifle. For now, what we have witnessed may be far enough.

54. Therefore, most noble emperor and you other princes, lords, estates, and the envoys and heads of the free imperial cities, I beg and implore you through our Lord and brother Jesus Christ, by his goodness, justice, and judgment, in which he will give to each one according to his merit, before whom all counsel is revealed, who destroys the counsel of the ungodly-minded and evil-ruling princes, who exalts the humble and humbles the proud, that you 1) not spurn the speech of the lowly. For often also fools have said something useful, and the truth itself has often chosen weak and bad people to be proclaimed through it. For all men are liars. And unless they are taught by the Holy Spirit something other than what they themselves know and desire, there is nothing to be hoped for from them but that they will overthrow themselves by their wit and art. For the prophet Jeremiah said perfectly true: "Behold! they reject God's word, what further wisdom can they have?" Therefore, since you are the leaders of righteousness, no one needs more than you to know God's will. And from where can such knowledge come but from His holy Word? Therefore, do not be repelled by their opinions, which refer to God's word. For this is what we generally call upon ourselves.

so that the more the adversaries oppose it, the more it will shine out and the lie will be eradicated. If, however, as I am well aware, some are telling you much about our ignorance and even wickedness, consider also this among yourselves: 2) First, whether we who follow this way of the gospel and the Lord's Supper have led our lives in such a way that anyone could ever doubt whether we are to be counted among honest people? But we do not boast of anything, since Paul himself was also what he was by God's grace. But where a fresh and cheerful life has been given, it has never degenerated into revelry and insolence, nor has it been abused for cruelty, pride or defiance. So that the adversary's attempts, when truncated by the testimony of life, often receded. Scholarship is indeed greater than the enemies can endure or despise without conscience; but it is much less than those who persecute us in the day think. Nevertheless, in order to finally reach our goal, we have been practicing divine and secular sciences for so many years that we do not teach anything without thought.

But it will be granted to us to praise the grace and goodness of God, which He so abundantly shows to our churches. The churches that hear the Lord GOD through us have accepted the word of the Lord in such a way that lies and unfaithfulness are more and more perishing, but hopefulness and indulgence are inhibited, and useless gossip and blasphemy must completely give way. And if these are not true fruits of the Holy Spirit, what are they?

But consider, both of you, most noble emperor, and you princes and estates as a whole, what fruit the larva of the doctrine of men has produced for us. The purchased fairs have increased both the princes' and the mob's arrogance and insolence, introduced and spread the popes' revelry and the messmakers' drunkenness; indeed, what havoc have they not wrought! for who will penetrate the money heaped up by fairs if they are not clogged and strangled in the veins? 1)

57 Therefore, may God, who is much better than all of you together, whom we gladly recognize and praise as very good, destroy this and all other errors from the bottom up, and destroy Rome with its ash heap, which it has imposed on Christendom and especially on Germany.

1) It seems to go on eating and drinking. (Walch.)

and desolate, and that you let all the power, which you have used against the pure gospel, be used against the evil plots of the godless papists, so that righteousness, which has been completely driven out because of your negligence, and innocence, which has been completely darkened with false make-up and a false coat of paint, may appear again among us.

There has been enough raging, so it should not be anything wild and cruel to command, condemn, even murder, kill, rob, burn, and plunder without cause. Since it cannot be done in this way, it will have to be done in another way. If the council is from God, then do not fight against God; but if it comes from somewhere else, then it will perish through its audacity.

Therefore, O children of men, let the word of God sow and spring up freely, you are also as high as you want to be, so that you cannot prevent a grain from sprouting and growing. You can see that this fruit is moistened by the rain from heaven, and that no man's power can destroy it so that it withers. Do not think both of what you would like and of what the world demands in the trade or cause of the gospel. Let this, which I have presented here, please you in the best way, and prove by your actions that you are children of God. Given in Zurich, July 3. In the year 1530.

Your Majesty's and all the faithful's most submissive
Huldreich Zwingel.

d. of the confession of the four cities.

28. confession of the four cities, Strasbourg, Costnitz, Memmingen and Lindau, in which they declared their faith to imperial majesty at the imperial diet in Augsburg.*)

July 11, 1530.
Translated from Latin by M. Aug. Tittel.

Most Great and at the same time Most Gracious Emperor! Your Majesty has commanded that the estates of the Holy Roman Empire, as much as each of them cares and as much as he would like to contribute to the reassurance of the Church of Christ, should state their opinion of the religion as well as of the errors and vices that have crept in against it, in writing in Latin and German, and submit it to Her for examination and consideration; so that she could then the sooner find ways and means to restore the pure teachings of Christ and to abolish all the errors that have occurred.

This order, which also came from a godly intention and which will undoubtedly be profitable for the church in the future, but which most of all shows the incomparable kindness and grace of Your Imperial Majesty, so that you have already endeared yourself to the whole world, we should most obediently obey. For we have never sought anything else in these matters than that those things be abolished which run counter to the holy Gospels and Christ's commandments, and that we, as well as all other Christians, may preserve his doctrine, which alone is blessed. Therefore, we ask and implore Your Imperial Majesty in the most humble manner that you do so,

*) This writing, which was delivered in 1530 at the Imperial Diet of Augsburg, appeared in 1531 at Strasbourg, and later several times, under the title: Conkssio rslIKionis ekristianas, saeratissiwo imper "tori Oarolo V. Oassariin uomMisanno 1530 per lssatos oivitatum "rZsntorati, Oon-stantiae, Msmst Hiulavias skkidita. It was also translated into German and went out (without indication of the year and place) under the title: "Bek nnnis der vier Frey- und Reichsst tte, Strasburg, Costanz, Memmigen und Lindau, in deren sie Kayserl. Majesty at the Imperial Diet of Augspurg in the 30th year, have given an account of their faith and intentions, for the sake of religion." This German edition deviates from the Latin edition several times, which is why Walch had the text retranslated. We reproduce the text of the old edition. As F rstemann, Urkundenbuch zu der Geschichte des Reichstages zu Augsburg, vol. 2, p. 42, states, this writing, the so-called Ovnkss o tsrapolitana, was handed over to the emperor on July 11, 1530, according to our chronology.

what we shall bring forward to answer for the hope that is in us, with such a mind that you may be assured how we first of all let our wish and desire go only to this, that God our Creator and Christ our Redeemer, and Christ our Redeemer, and thereafter also to serve and obey Your Imperial Majesty hereunder, and that we do not accept a doctrine that is somewhat different from the previous common doctrine for any other intention or opinion than because we firmly believe that He who created and redeemed us demands it of us in this way. We have also promised ourselves, and that because of the special praise that you have gloriously received from us of religion, godliness and righteousness, that it would come to pass that if you (Your Majesty) were rightly and completely informed of all that we have long since accepted under the name of the doctrine of Christ and pure religion, you would completely approve of our opinion and count us among those who have ever and always been willing to show obedience to it in good faith. For Your Sacred Imperial Majesty's world-renowned love of truth and justice, and Your ardent devotion and godliness, did not allow us to fall in the least bit on the suspicion that, if You had not yet heard us, You might have been of a mind to our disadvantage before 1) us, and not hear us too graciously and willingly, or, if you have heard us and considered what is holy, that you should not immediately notice through God's good spirit, which has so far guided Your Majesty so well and happily in other matters, how we follow Christ's own teachings from the heart.

Cap. 1.

From the content of the sermons.

First of all, since almost ten years ago, by the special grace of God, the teachings of Christ were more clearly and more certainly established in Germany than before, and therefore, as in other places, so also in our country, most of the doctrinal points of our religion were publicly and daily more sharply disputed among the scholars, and especially among those who administered the office of preaching Christ in the churches, and thereby the devil also necessarily had his work cut out, so that the populace was dangerously divided by adverse preaching: have we well considered what St. Paul writes: "That the Scriptures, inspired by God, may be profitable to teach," so that thereby sin, where it exists, may be affected and punished, and righteousness established, "in order to

1) Maybe: from (?).

that the man of God is perfect, and fit for all good works". And therefore, because the fear of God and the certain danger of our common nature drove us to do this without further delay, we ordered the preachers among us to teach nothing in the pulpit except what was either expressly written in Scripture or flowed from it. For it seemed to us quite reasonable, in this great danger, to flee to where not only the holy fathers, bishops, and princes, but also all common (simple) people have turned before and always, namely, to the divine reputation and testimony of the holy Scriptures. According to which the Thessalonians formerly examined the heard gospel of Christ, as Lucas remembers with their praise, in which also Paul wanted his Timothy to practice with diligence; without which testimony the popes never wanted their decrees, nor the fathers their writings, nor the princes their laws to be recognized as valid and credible; from which also the great imperial council at Nuremberg, held in the year of Christ 1523, ordered the sermons to be proved and taken. For if it is true what Paul taught, "that the Scriptures make the man of God perfect, and fit for all good works," then he who studies the Scriptures with devotion will not lack Christian truth and wholesome teaching.

Cap. 2.

Of the Holy Trinity.

Since the sermons in our country have been brought out of this, and the harmful quarrels have been put away, those who were only a little attached to godliness have received the teaching of Christ much more clearly, and have sought to live their lives more diligently according to it, so that they have been kept away from what was evil in Christ's teaching, and on the other hand have been strengthened in what is in harmony with it.

Among these is also this, which the Church of Christ has hitherto believed about the Holy Trinity, namely, that one God is in essence, Father, Son and Holy Spirit, and has a difference only in the persons. And that also our Saviour Jesus Christ, who at the same time became true God, also became true man; that the natures are indeed unblended, but nevertheless so united in One Person that they will not be separated further in all eternity. And in this no one is of any other mind than what the Church believes from the Holy Scriptures about our Savior Jesus Christ, namely that he was conceived by the Holy Spirit, then born of the Virgin Mary, and finally, after preaching the Gospel, born of the Holy Spirit.

He died on the cross, was buried, went to hell, rose again on the third day, so that he would live forever; and after that he proved his resurrection and life before the witnesses chosen for this purpose, and ascended to heaven at the right hand of God, from where we expect him to be the judge of the living and the dead.

In the meantime, we recognize that he is nevertheless present with his church until the end of the world, constantly renewing it, sanctifying it, and adorning the so beloved bride with all the adornment of virtue.

Since in this we teach nothing different from what the Fathers and the common Christian faith say, it will be enough that we have testified to our faith in this case.

Cap. 3. From justification and faith.

But what else is commonly taught about the way in which we are made partakers of the redemption wrought by Christ, and likewise about the duties of a Christian man, ours have admittedly begun to teach somewhat differently than has hitherto been done. And how we have done it, we want to present to Your Imperial Majesty in the shortest possible way, and at the same time honestly indicate the passages of Scripture that have led us to this.

First of all, since it had been taught for some years that man's own good works were necessary for his justification, ours attributed them entirely to the grace of God and the merit of Christ, and taught that they were obtained by faith alone. Among other things, they were moved by the following sayings, e.g. John 1: "But as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the children of God, who believe in his name; who were born, not of blood, nor of the will of man, but of God. John 3: "Verily, verily, I say unto you, Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of GOD." Matth. II: "No one knows the Son except the Father, and to whom the Son wills to reveal it." Matth. 26.: "Blessed are you, Simon, bar Jonah, for flesh and blood has not revealed it to you." John 6: "No one can come to me, except the Father draw him." Eph. 2: "By grace are ye saved through faith; and the same not of yourselves: it is the gift of God, not of works; lest any man should boast. For we are his workmanship, created in Christ JEsu for good works, which God prepared beforehand that we should walk in them."

Now that our righteousness and eternal life is in God and in our Savior, Jesus Christ, he and therefore it cannot be a work of the flesh and blood, that one must therefore be born anew, and we cannot come to the Son, unless the Father begets us, nor learn the Father, unless the Son reveals it, and Paul wrote so clearly: "not of ourselves! "Not of our works!" it is obvious that our works do not contribute at all to our becoming righteous from unrighteous as we are born. Since we are by nature children of wrath and therefore completely unrighteous, we cannot do anything that is righteous and worthy of the kingdom of heaven, but the beginning of all our righteousness and salvation must come from the merciful God, who, out of pure grace and in view of the death of His Son, first teaches the doctrine of righteousness and His gospel by sending those who preach it, and then (since the natural man, as Paul writes, cannot understand anything that is of the Spirit of God, 1 Cor. 2.) 1) so that in the darkness of our hearts the ray of His light may dawn, so that we may believe the Gospel proclaimed, because the Spirit from on high convinces us of its truth, and then, relying on this Spirit's testimony, we may call upon God as Father in childlike trust and say Abba! dear Father, in order to be truly blessed, according to the word: "Whoever will call upon the name of the Lord will be blessed."

Cap. 4. Of the good works that come from faith through love.

But we do not want this to be understood as if salvation and righteousness were to be sought in idle thoughts of the mind and a faith without works, which they call unformed; for we are certain that no one can become righteous and blessed unless he loves God most highly and diligently seeks to imitate Him. For "those whom He saw before, He also ordained beforehand that they should be conformed to the image of His Son," as in the glory of the blessed life, thus also in the perfection of innocence and complete righteousness, "for we are His workmanship, created for good works." But no one can love God above all things and imitate Him righteously if he does not know Him rightly and take care of what is best for Him; therefore, we cannot be justified in any other way, that is, as righteous, so we can be blessed (for righteousness is also our salvation), than if we first of all come to terms with the

1) These brackets are set by us.

We must be endowed with faith, by which we believe the Gospel and are assured that God has adopted us as children and will always love us fatherly, thus relying on Him completely. St. Augustine's lib. de fid. et op. calls this faith the evangelical faith, which is active through love. Through this we are born again, and the image of God is restored in us; through this we become good and right again, even if we are born wrong, so that our thoughts are inclined to evil from our mother's womb. For then we become completely full of all good from God alone, as the eternal and always abundantly flowing source, and show ourselves to others as gods, that is, as true children of God, who seek their benefit through love in all ways. "For he who loves his brother abides in the light, and is born of God," and is heartily devoted to the new and at the same time old commandment of love for one another. And this "love is the fulfillment of the whole law," as Paul says: "The whole law is fulfilled in one word," namely in this: "You shall love your neighbor as yourself," Gal. 5. For everything that the law teaches runs out of it, and requires only this, that we be changed once rightly after God's image, and be good in everything and willing and useful for man's benefit, which cannot possibly happen if we are not adorned with all virtues at the same time. For who would judge and do everything for the true edification of the church and for everyone's true benefit, as befits a Christian, 1 Cor. 10, if he does not think, speak and do everything rightly and properly, and thus does not let the choir of all virtues dwell with him?

Cap. 6.

To whom the good works are to be attributed and how necessary they are.

But since those who are children of God are more driven by the Spirit of God than they themselves work, Romans 8, and all things are of Him, through Him, and to Him, Romans 11. So all that we do rightly and holyly must be attributed to no one else but to this Spirit alone, who gives all virtues; although he by no means compels us, but guides us with will, and works in us both willing and doing, Phil. 2. Hence St. Augustine writes very finely: "that God may reward his works in us. Here, then, we do not reject good works at all, but rather deny that anyone can be saved if he does not come so far through the Spirit of God that no good work is sought in vain in him, for which God will reward him.

For the fulfillment of the law is so necessary that heaven and earth will pass away sooner than the smallest point and tittle will be remitted. But since God alone is good, and made everything from nothing, and completely renews and governs us through his Spirit (for in Christ there is only one new creature), nothing of this can be attributed to human powers, and we must confess that everything of God, who benefits us by grace, without our merit, is a pure gift.

From this it is easy to see what we mean by justification, through whom we obtain it, and in what way we can enjoy it; likewise, what scriptural passages moved us to believe this way. For although we have drawn only a few from many, anyone who has only a little experience of the Scriptures will soon see that such sayings, in which, as Hosea says (Cap. 13), all sin and destruction are attributed to us, but all our righteousness and salvation are attributed to God, occur quite often in them.

Cap. 6.

Of a Christian's Duties.

It will also be known enough what a Christian's duties are, and what works he must especially perform, namely, such that he may serve his neighbor as far as possible. Namely, 1) for eternal life, so that he may learn to know, worship and serve God; 2) then also for the present life, so that he lacks nothing that belongs to the bodily necessities. For as the whole law of God, which perfectly prescribes all righteousness, is summed up in the single word: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," Romans 14; so all righteousness must be summed up and perfected in such demonstration of love. Therefore nothing is to be counted as a Christian duty that does not benefit the neighbor to some extent, and every work will be the more incumbent on every Christian and will belong to his duties, the more the neighbor is served thereby and a benefit is created for him. Therefore, after the spiritual office, we consider the administration of the common good to be one of the noblest duties of a Christian man, that he be obedient to those who administer it, because they thereby provide for the common good; likewise, that he take due care of his wife, children and family, and honor his parents, because without such things the life of man cannot exist;

Similarly, we include all honest arts and crafts, because without their practice one would have to forfeit much good that is very useful to the human race. In these and all other matters of life, however, no one must take anything thoughtlessly into his own hands, but must pay godly attention to what God calls him to do. This, then, will be everyone's best and most noble duty, by which man will be most helped and served.

Cap. 7.

From prayer and fasting.

Nevertheless, we also consider prayer and devout fasting to be holy works that are proper for a Christian, to which our clergy very diligently exhort their listeners. For right fasting is, as it were, a forsaking of the present life, which is always subject to evil lusts, but a contemplation of the future, which is free from all such disturbances. Prayer, however, is an ascent of the mind to God, and such a conversation with Him that no other thing so inflames the mind with heavenly desires, and directs it more and more powerfully according to God's will. But whether or not these are holy duties that are necessary for Christians, they do not serve the neighbor, nor do they prepare man so that he can serve his neighbor with benefit; therefore they cannot be elevated above holy teachings, godly admonitions and reminders, or other duties that benefit man directly. Hence we read of the Savior that he prayed by night, but by day he healed the sick and preached. For as love is greater than faith and hope (1 Cor. 13), so that which first proves the same and is most beneficial to man must be preferred to all other holy practices, as we think proper. Therefore, St. Chrysostom writes (Hom. 48 on Matthew): "Fasting is at the bottom of the list of virtues.

Cap. 8.

From the commandments of fasting.

But since no one can pray and fast properly and profitably except such souls as are devoutly and specially impelled by the Holy Spirit, we believe that it is better, according to the example of the apostles and the first pure church, to entice with holy exhortations than to compel with commandments, especially those which make everything a sin, as they have done in recent times, when the priesthood has become quite out of fashion. So we would rather leave the place, time, and manner of praying and fasting to the Holy Spirit, without whom no one can pray and fast properly, than to prescribe them by certain laws, especially if they are not to be broken without iniquity and indebtedness.

But that for the sake of the young and imperfect a certain time and manner are set, because they are thereby prepared, as by certain preliminary exercises, ours are not at all displeased, if only such things are done without entangling the consciences. This opinion is not only due to the fact that all unpleasant constraints conflict with the nature of such works, but also to the fact that neither Christ nor the apostles have anywhere laid down such commandments. This is also testified by St. Chrysostom, Hom. 48. on Matthew, when he says: "You see that a righteous life helps more than anything else. But I call this a righteous life, not the toil of fasting, nor the camp in sackcloth and ashes, but when one despises money in the way that is proper, when one burns with heartfelt love, feeds the hungry with one's bread, overcomes anger, does not covet vain honor, and does not let envy rule over him. For these are samples of the same (namely, the right fiefdom). For he does not say that his fasting is to be followed, although he could have presented his forty days (fasting), but: 'Learn from me, for I am meek and humble in heart'. On the contrary, he says: 'All that you are commanded to do, eat. Nor do we read that the ancient people (the Jews) were commanded in the Law to fast in any orderly and solemn manner except on one day. 1) For that which prophets and kings, according to the report of the holy Scriptures, commanded, was nothing proper, but was only instituted in its time, because either an imminent or a present need impelled it." Since, then, as St. Paul expressly says, the Scriptures instruct us in all good works, but know nothing of these fasts enforced by commandments: we do not see how the successors of the apostles had more power than they themselves, namely, to burden the Church with so great and dangerous a burden. Irenaeus at least testifies that fasting was kept in various and free ways in the church before, as we read in the History of the Church, Book 8, Cap. 1. In the same book Eusebius remembers that a

1) the Day of Atonement.

Apollonius, the first heretic of the church, also refuted the heretic Montani's doctrine with this reason, namely that he first imposed fasting laws. He even considered this indecent for those who confessed the sound doctrine of Christ. Therefore Chrysostom says in one place: "Fasting is an honorable thing, but no one must be forced." And elsewhere he exhorts those who cannot fast to avoid tasty and superfluous food, which is not much different from fasting, and a strong arrow to ward off Satan's fury. Moreover, experience proves, alas! too much, that such commandments of fasting are very harmful to godliness.

Just as it seemed quite certain that the rulers of the church had taken this power to order fasts in such a way that consciences would otherwise be guilty if they did not keep them, without the testimony of Scripture: so we have also allowed consciences to be loosed from such cords, but by Scripture, especially Paul's, who throws these elements (childish letters) of the world off the necks of Christians quite diligently. For what Paul says in Col. 2, "Let no one judge you about food and drink or the choice of holidays, new moons and Sabbaths," must of necessity apply to us. And again, "If ye be dead with Christ unto the elements of the world, why then let yourselves be kept by the commandments, as the living?"

For when St. Paul, whom Christ taught as well as anyone, asserts that we have been set at liberty by Christ from outward things, so that not a few creatures are permitted by him to trouble those who believe in Christ even with such customs and ceremonies as God himself has instituted, but in his time only wanted to be useful; indeed, he also clearly states that those who have fallen from grace and lost Christ, and Christ is of no use to them, have allowed themselves to be taken captive by such things: What ought we not now to think of such commandments, which not only have no scripture for themselves, but also no one righteous example, and which men have invented of themselves, and which consequently have been not only weak and scanty, but even harmful, not mere elements (temporal earthly things) or initial letters of holy discipline, but rather hindrances to true godliness for very many? And how much more unjust will it be that one should arrogate to himself over Christ's inheritance the power to press it with such servitude! And now how many places would we be deprived of Christ, if we were to submit to such laws! For who does not see that the

Is the honor of Christ, which we must live to the full, which He Himself purchased and redeemed with His blood, more obscured if we, without His command, entangle our conscience with such laws, which are inventions of men, than which have God as their author, whether they had to be kept only in their time? It is certainly less to live Jewishly than paganly; but it is paganly to accept laws to worship God about which God has not been asked, and which are mere human conceits. That is why Paul's word is especially applicable here instead of 1 Corinthians 7: "You were bought at a high price, therefore do not be servants of men."

Cap. 9.

From choice of dishes.

For the same reason, the choice of food on certain days was forbidden, because St. Paul calls it a doctrine of the devil when he writes to Timothy. And it is still not correct that some point this only to the Manichaeans, Encratites, Tatians and Marcionites, who forbade some kinds of food and marriage altogether. For the apostle here condemns those who forbid foods that God created to be eaten, 2c. which now also forbid only some foods for some days, they nevertheless say that one should abstain from foods that God created to be eaten, and thus come very close to the doctrine of the devils; which also appears from the reason that the apostle adds: "For everything that God has created," he says, "is good and nothing reprehensible, if it is received with thanksgiving." For he does not omit any time, even though he loved moderation, sobriety, special mortifications of the flesh and fasting more than anyone else. Of course, a Christian must be sober, but at all times; he must sometimes mortify and kill the flesh, so that his modest portion may be somewhat shortened. But to this belongs rather the food's bad constitution and measures, than any kind and species. Finally, Christians are to keep a fast now and then, but not to exclude certain foods, but all foods; and not only to abstain from them, but also from all the pleasures and caresses of this world. For what kind of fasting or abstinence is it, merely to change the way of life of pleasure? As also those are wont to do who are nowadays considered very spiritual, since Chrysostom considers it no fasting if one remains without food, and moreover until evening, if one does not, while fasting from food, also remain free from harmful things and diligently apply oneself to spiritual things.

Cap. 10.There is no need to seek merit in praying and fasting.

After this, our clergy also remember this in fasting and prayer, that people should be taught in general not to seek miraculous merit and justification by it. For by faith through grace we are not only saved but also justified. But of the works of the law, which certainly include fasting and prayer, Paul wrote in Galatians 5: "Christ is no longer of any use to us, but is vain; all you who are justified by the law have fallen from grace. For we wait for the hope of righteousness in spirit and faith."

One must pray, then, but to the end that we receive and take from God, not that we give Him something through it. One must fast so that we may pray more fully and keep the flesh in discipline, but not earn anything from God. This ultimate purpose and custom of prayer and fasting is given both in the Holy Scriptures and in the writings and examples of the Fathers. For the rest, our affairs are such that even if we pray and fast with the greatest devotion, even if we could accomplish everything that God has commanded us to do to the best of our ability, even if no human being has been able to do so, we must still confess that we are useless servants. What do we therefore want to dream of merit?

Cap. 11.That a single God must be invoked through Christ.

Another abuse has also been rejected, since some want to make friends of the Blessed Virgin Mary and other saints by praying and fasting, so that through their merits and intercession they will be freed from the ills of body and soul and provided with all kinds of good things. For our preachers teach that we should call upon the one Father in heaven through Christ, our one Savior, and ask for everything, who, as he himself has testified, will refuse us nothing that we ask of him in faith and in the name of Christ. Since Paul, 1 Timothy 2, praises this one man, Jesus Christ, as God's and man's mediator, and since no one can love us more or be more acceptable to the Father, ours gladly admonish that we should have enough of this one intercessor and reconciler with the Father. But the Holy Mother of God and the Virgin Mary and the others

All the saints command us to honor them with all diligence, and that this will only be done when we earnestly seek that in which they are especially pleased, namely innocence and godliness, of which they have left us such beautiful examples. For since the saints love God with all their heart, with all their soul, and with all their strength, nothing could be more dear to them than for us to love and imitate God warmly with them. For the pious do not attribute their own blessedness to their merit, nor do they ever desire to help us with it. They all said, while they were here in the world, with Paul: "What I now live in the flesh, I live in the faith of the Son of God, who loved me and gave Himself for me. I do not consider the grace of GOD to be reprehensible." If they now ascribe everything to the grace of God and the salvation of Jesus Christ, no greater favor will be done to them than if we also rely on the same kind of help.

Cap. 12.From the Monk's Stand.

For this very reason, that all our righteousness consists in faith in Jesus Christ, and therefore we have attained freedom from all outward things, the bonds of monasticism have been dissolved by our admission. For we saw that this freedom of Christians is very much saved and defended everywhere by Paulo, so that each one is certain for himself that all our salvation and righteousness is to be sought in Christ our Lord alone; likewise it is certain that all things of this life are to be used at all times, as for the benefit of the neighbor, thus for the glory of God. Therefore, he must freely leave himself and all that is his to the Holy Spirit of Christ, as the giver of true filiation and freedom, to rule, to guide, and to order, apply, and use both for the benefit of his neighbor and for the glory of God. If, then, we persevere in this freedom, we show ourselves to be servants of Christ; if we betray such to men and make ourselves subservient to their inventions, we are, so to speak, defecting from Christ to men, which is all the greater ungodliness, the more he has bought us so dearly, since he has saved us with his blood from the damnable service of Satan. And this is the reason why Paul, writing to the Galatians, curses so highly that they were so attached to the ceremonies of the law, which after all was divine, since, as we have shown above, it was much more to be tolerated and excused than to take upon themselves such [ceremonial] yokes, which men from their heads. For he writes, and rightly so, that whoever wears such ceremonial yokes rejects the grace of God and considers Christ's death to be nothing. And therefore, he says, he fears that he has worked on them in vain, and exhorts them to stand in freedom, so that Christ may redeem them, and not to crawl again under the yoke of servitude.

Now it is obvious that the monastic state is nothing else than a servitude of human statutes, and indeed such a one, which the said Paul has now condemned in the named places. For those who become monks give themselves over to such human inventions in the hope of merit. Therefore they do such a great sin when they turn away from 1) the freedom of Christ. Since both our body and spirit are of God for two reasons, namely, creation and redemption, Christians cannot be free to enter into such monastic bondage, any more than worldly servants are free 2) to accept other masters. Moreover, it cannot be denied that by such surrender and vow to live according to man's commandment, the necessity of transgressing the law of God is involved, as it always is, Matth. 15. For the law of God wants a Christian to serve the authorities, parents, relatives, and all others whom God has given to him as neighbors, and has given him to help them, to the best of his ability, regardless of the time, place, or manner in which they need such assistance. Likewise, that he adopt such a way of life that he may best serve his neighbor in his cause, and that he not choose the celibate state, for he has the gift, for the sake of the kingdom of heaven, that is, for the advancement of godliness and the glory of God, to circumcise himself and to renounce marriage. For there is God's commandment, made known through Paul, so that no vow can ever be overturned: "For the sake of fornication, let each man have his own wife, and each woman her own husband," for "not all grasp the word" that one should remain single for the sake of the kingdom of heaven, as Christ himself testifies, who certainly understood best and presented most faithfully both what man is able to bear and what the heavenly Father's will is.

Now it is clear that those who take monastic vows are thereby made to belong to a certain kind of people in such a way that they are not subject to the authorities.

They can neither be at the command or pleasure of their parents, nor of other people (except the head of the monastery), nor assist them with their goods, and least of all they can marry, even if they are in heat and thereby fall into many shameful vices. Since it is therefore clear that such monastic vows bring the man who is free in the bondage of Christ into the servitude or yoke, not only of men but also of the devil, and impose upon him a necessity to transgress the law of God, as happens with all human statutes in general, and thus clearly contravene God's commandment: we think it reasonable that they should be destroyed, since not only the written law but also the natural law prescribes that one should break the promise, which is contrary to good morals, not to mention religion.

We have therefore not been able to resist anyone who wants to exchange the monastic life, as an undoubted bondage of Satan, with the service of Christ. Just as we have not resisted others from the spiritual state who have married and chosen a way of life in which they can benefit their neighbor more, live more honorably, and remain with a clearer conscience than before. Finally, we do not exclude those who have remained with us in the preaching ministry from the right of marriage for reasons that have been reported, no matter how much chastity they have vowed, because even Paul, who taught true chastity excellently, gladly accepts a bishop who is a husband. For we have preferred this divine law to all human laws: "To avoid fornication, let every man have his own wife" 2c. Which law, because it has been rejected for so long, has torn down in the spiritual state all the abominable abominations and aversions, the most shameful fornication (to be reported with honor before your most sacred majesty, most gracious emperor), such that no kind of man is today in worse repute for it than the same.

Cap. 13.

Of the office, dignity and power of the clergy in the Church.

Of the office and dignity of the spiritual state, we teach: 1) That there is no authority in the church without correction. 2) Then, that no one in this position is to be regarded differently than Paul, Peter, Apollo and the like would have regarded themselves, 1 Corinthians 12, namely, as Christ's servants and stewards of the mysteries of God, of whom this must be especially demanded, that each one be found faithful.

1) "dazu von" put by us instead of "davon zu", which is probably a typographical error.

2) Slaves are meant.

These have the keys of the kingdom of heaven, to bind and loose. They have the power to forgive and retain sins, but in such a way that they are only servants of Christ, whose own power and right alone. For as he alone can renew and change hearts, so he alone can, by his own power, make the heavens out of men, and loose them from sins. Both of these things happen to us only when we receive a new mind through God's grace and have our citizenship in heaven.

But it is incumbent on the clergy to plant and water with the word, which in itself does nothing: "But it is God who gives prosperity. For of himself no one is able to think of such a thing, except of himself, but what one is able to do. This is from God, who makes those ministers of the new covenant whom he wants to persuade people rightly of Christ and make them rightly partakers of him, but not the dead letter, that is, the teaching that only resounds from without, but does not change the mind, but at the same time dispenses the life-giving spirit that renews the heart. And so they are only co-workers with God, 2 Cor. 3, open heaven rightly, and forgive sin. Therefore Christ, when he gave this power to the apostles, breathed on them and said, "Receive the Holy Spirit," adding, "Whose soever sins ye forgive, they are forgiven them; and whose soever sins they forgive," 2c. Therefore we believe that they are sent by God. For "how shall they preach, if they be not sent?" Rom. 10, that is, power and courage to preach the gospel and to feed Christ's flock, as well as the cooperating, that is, having received the heart-convicting spirit; and this makes quite capable and anointed ministers of the church, bishops, teachers and shepherds. The other virtues with which the people of this state must be adorned are told by St. Paul in 1 Tim. 3, Tit. 1.

Those who have been sent, anointed and adorned in this way, and who diligently care for God's flock and feed it with all fidelity and care, we consider them to be true bishops, priests and shepherds, worthy of twofold honor. But those who pursue other things also earn other respect and names.

However, no one's life should be so troubled that someone among the Christians should doubt and have misgivings about accepting what he would like to present from Moses or from Christ's chair, that is, from the Law and the Gospel. But if they preach strange things, the sheep must not hear such a voice,

John 10: But in worldly matters, because such power is ordained by God, he would contradict God's order who would not obey those who receive such power, in matters that do not go against God's commandments. It is therefore blasphemy when some blame our people for destroying church authority and jurisdiction. For the temporal power that such have has never been hindered by our people. But the spiritual power, by which they are to loosen consciences and faithfully feed them with the gospel of Christ, they have often begged or demanded, not to mention that they would have resisted it. But that we did not tolerate the teaching of some clergymen and appointed others in their place for our need, or kept those whom the bishops had deposed, this was the cause, because these proclaimed our shepherd's voice louder, but those of others theirs. For when it comes to the matter of the gospel and salvific doctrine, we must turn completely to the bishop of our souls, Jesus, and not at all listen to the voice of the strangers, if we believe otherwise in Christ. In this no one can suffer, if what Paul says is true: "All things are yours, whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, whether things present or things to come; for all things are yours, but you are Christ's, and Christ is God's," 1 Cor. 3. If Peter and Paul with the whole world are still ours, but we are not theirs, but Christ's, and that as he is the Father's, namely, that we live to him all that we are: so, if we need everything as ours, no one of the clergy can justly complain about us as if we did not obey him rightly, if we are only sure that we do God's will. This is what we are taught about the office, dignities and authority of the ministers of the church, which we have been moved to believe by the passages of Scripture that we have consulted, and their like.

Cap. 14.

Of human doctrines (statutes).

From the traditional teachings of the Fathers, and which even now the bishops and churches enjoin, our opinion is this.

They do not count among those human statutes that are condemned in Scripture as running contrary to God's law, e.g. those that bind the consciences from food and drink, times and external things, as forbidding marriage to those who need such for an honest life, and the like more. Deny, which agree with the Scriptures and! are ordered for the good discipline and benefit of men, even though they are not expressly written in the Scriptures, such, because they are nevertheless derived from the commandment of love, which sets up everything fine and praiseworthy, are rightly considered divine rather than human. Of the kind were those which Paul urges, 1 Cor. 11, that women should not pray in church with their heads bare, but men with their heads covered; that those who wanted to communicate should wait for one another; that no one in the congregation should speak with tongues (or many languages) without an interpreter; that the prophets should present their prophecy without disorder and have it judged by the attendants, 1 Cor. 14.

The church of today holds such things in high esteem, and arranges new ones according to opportunity and necessity. But he who rejects such things despises not men, but God, whose all useful law is even his own power. For what is rightly spoken or written is spoken and written by the gift of him who is truth itself, as St. Augustine well writes.

But there is often a dispute about which statute is useful or not, that is, which one promotes or hinders godliness. But he who does not look to his own interests, but devotes himself entirely to the common good, will soon see which is in accord with God's law or not. Since, furthermore, the Christians' cause is such that even injustice benefits them, a Christian will also be willing to obey unjust laws, if only they do not command evil, according to Christ's words: "If anyone forces you to go a mile, go with him. Thus, in truth, Christ must become everything to everyone, that he is willing to do and suffer everything for the benefit and service of men, if only it is not against God's commands. Hence it comes about that everyone obeys the civil laws, which do not run counter to godliness, the more willingly he is instructed in the faith of Christ.

Cap. 15.

From the church.

Now we must also report what we think of the church and the sacraments. Is the church of Christ, which is sometimes called the kingdom of heaven, a group of those who call themselves Christians and completely obey him, but with whom will be mixed until the end of the world those who are hypocrites under the faith of Christ, who therefore do not have it right.

The Savior taught this well in the parable of the weeds, Matth. 13, and of the net that was thrown into the sea and brought out both rotten and good fish, and of the king who called everyone to the wedding of his son, but then cast out the one who was not dressed for the wedding, Matth. 22. Likewise, when the church is called the bride of Christ, for which he gave himself to sanctify it, Eph. 1. for which He gave Himself to sanctify it, Eph. 1. Likewise, a house of God, a pillar and stronghold of truth, Mount Sion, the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, the congregation of the firstborn who are written in heaven, 1 Tim. 3. Heb. 12. This praise belongs only to those who righteously believe in Christ and thus truly belong among the children of God. Among these the Savior truly reigns, therefore His church is also called the congregation or company of the saints, as the word (church) is explained in the Apostles' Creed. The Holy Spirit rules them; Christ is never far from them, but sanctifies them so that he presents them to himself, as having neither spot nor wrinkle. Whoever does not want to hear this must be considered a heathen and a tax collector; this church, although that which actually makes it the church of Christ, namely faith in Christ, cannot be seen, may nevertheless be seen itself and recognized from its fruits. Among such fruits is first of all a joyful confession of the truth, a righteous love open to all, and a brave contempt of all things against Christ. All these things cannot be lacking where the gospel and the sacraments are purely practiced. Since the church is also God's kingdom, and therefore everything in it must be done properly and orderly, it has different offices of the clergy. For it is one body, consisting of different members, each with its own business. And these, if they do their office faithfully and work diligently in the words of doctrine, they truly present the church, so that whoever hears them is justly said to have heard the church. But what kind of spirit and gifts these must have, we have told above, when we gave our faith in the spiritual ministry of preaching, and thus gave an account of our faith in it. For those cannot take the place of the church who teach what is contrary to Christ's commandments; but this can happen, and often does happen, that even wicked men prophesy in the name of Jesus Christ, and bring forward the opinion of the church: but those who teach things quite different from what Christ taught, though they may be in the church, yet if they are tainted with error, and do not present the voice of the shepherd, the church, Christ's bride, cannot, why they must not be heard in his name, for Christ's sheep do not follow a strange voice. This is the doctrine of ours of the church, which is based on the passages quoted and others.

Cap. 16.

Of the Sacraments.

Because the church walks in the flesh, though not according to the flesh, it pleased the Lord to teach, remind and admonish it also by the outward word. And that this might be done the more conveniently, he willed that his own should also keep an outward company among themselves. Therefore also the holy signs, which we call sacraments, are given to them, among which the most distinguished are baptism and the Lord's Supper. These, we believe, were called sacraments by the ancients, not only because they are visible signs of invisible grace (as St. Augustine says), but also because through them, as it were, the profession of faith is made.

Cap. 17.

From baptism.

They therefore confess about baptism what the Scriptures say about it from time to time: namely, that by it we are buried in the death of Christ, that we are united into one body, that we put on Christ, that it is a bath of regeneration, washes away sins, and makes us blessed, Rom. 6, 1 Cor. 12, Gal. 3, Titus 3, Acts 21, 1 Petr. 3, 1 Petr. 3. 21. 1 Petr. 3.

But we understand all this in the measure in which St. Peter interpreted it when he speaks: "With whose example baptism coincides, and now also makes us blessed, not as a putting away of the filthiness of the flesh, but as a confession of a good conscience toward GOD." For "without faith it is impossible to please God." And we are made blessed by grace, but not by our works. But since baptism is a sacrament of the covenant which God makes with his own, promising to be God and avenger to them and their seed, and to have them for his people; likewise, it is a sign of the renewal of the Spirit, which takes place through Christ, ours teach that it is also to be administered to the children, just as they were formerly circumcised under Moses. But we are truly Abraham's children. Therefore the promise of God applies to us as well as to the ancients, when it was said, "I will be God to you and to your seed." Gal. 3.

Cap. 18.

From the Lord's Supper.

Of this most holy sacrament of the body and blood of Jesus Christ, ours teach everything that the evangelists, St. Paul and the holy fathers have left in writing in the most faithful manner, praising and inculcating it everywhere. And therefore they always praise this incomparable goodness of Christ towards His own with great diligence, that even today, as well as in the Last Supper, He truly gives His true body and His true blood as food and drink for souls to all who heartily join His disciples, at the repetition of this supper after its institution, by which they are nourished unto eternal life, to eat and to drink by the sacraments to give Himself in grace, that now He Himself may live and abide in them, and they in Him, and be raised up with Him to a new and eternal life at the last day, according to His, the eternal truth, words: "Take, eat, this is my body, and all of you drink from it, for this cup is my blood." 2c. But especially do our ministers diligently lead men's minds away from all quarreling, as well as from rash and vain brooding, so that what alone is profitable, and what has been chiefly looked to by Christ our Saviour, may be that, when we are fed with him, we live in him and through him, namely, a godly, holy, and therefore eternal and blessed life, and we all become One Bread, his Body, as we all become partakers of One Bread in the holy supper. In this way, the divine sacraments are distributed and received with great devotion and reverence in the most holy supper of Christ.

From this, which is truly so, your most holy majesty, most gracious emperor, recognizes how falsely our adversaries spout, as if ours changed the words of the testament and tore them apart with human glosses (interpretations), and nothing but pure bread and wine is distributed in our Lord's Supper, and on the other hand the true Lord's Supper of Christ is despised and rejected by us. For ours teach and exhort with all diligence that each one accept these words in bad faith, without all human conceit and false interpretation, and pay proper attention to their understanding, without any doubt, and receive the sacraments themselves with all devotion and holiness as a life-giving food for his soul and a grateful remembrance of such benefits. This is now done much more often and more sacredly than before. At the same time

But our clergy have always offered and still offer to give an account of their faith and doctrine with all modesty and truth in all matters which they believe and teach, both of these sacraments and of other things. And this not only to Your Imperial Majesty, but also to anyone who demands reason from them.

Cap. 19.

From the Mass.

And since Christ instituted his Lord's Supper, which afterwards began to be called Mass, so that the faithful might be fed with his body and blood, and thus praise his death, by which they were redeemed, and so not only give thanks for it themselves, but also praise the same to others: Our clergy have necessarily had to condemn the omission of such masses, and on the other hand, those who celebrate masses undertake to sacrifice Christ to the Father for the living and the dead, and make such a work out of the mass, by which God's grace and blessedness would almost alone be procured, otherwise people may believe and live as they wish. That is why the shameful and most ungodly huckstering of this sacred act has broken down and happened, so that today nothing is more profitable than the mass.

They have therefore rejected the silent masses, because the Lord commands this sacrament to his disciples as a whole (or together). Therefore also Paul 1 Cor. 11. commanded the Corinthians to wait for each other for the holy supper, and denied that they were keeping the Lord's supper, when each one went off to eat his own supper. That they also intend to offer the Lord's Supper as a sacrifice, ours have condemned because the Epistle to the Hebrews [Cap. 9, 27. 28.] clearly testifies that "as men die once, so Christ was sacrificed once, that he might take away many sins"; and could as little be sacrificed again as now continue to die. And "since therefore one sacrifice for sin has been made, he now sits always at the right hand of God, waiting for what is yet to come, that his enemies may be made the footstool of his feet. For with one sacrifice he hath perfected for ever all them that are justified," Heb. 10:11-14. But that they have made the mass a good work, whereby all things might be obtained of God: so have our brethren taught that it is contrary to all that the Scriptures everywhere say, that as we are justified by the Spirit of Christ and faith, and receive the grace of God, so we are justified by the Spirit of Christ and faith.

It is contrary to the fact that Christ commanded these sacraments to be taken in remembrance of him; likewise, St. Paul, "that the death of Christ be proclaimed until he comes.

But the fact that now, without some godly devotion, the mass is generally kept by many, merely to feed the belly: this is what our people have presented to God as so abominable and displeasing that, if the mass in itself contained nothing ungodly, it would nevertheless be just and according to God's command to be abolished, which can be seen from Isaiah Cap. 1 alone. For our God is a spirit and the truth, therefore He does not suffer that one serves Him other than in spirit and in truth. But how vexatious to the Lord was the hawking introduced here, they thought it easy to conclude, because buyers and sellers were chased out of the temple with such fury and vengeance, which he accepted against his custom, since they seemed to be doing their trade only for the promotion of the sacrifices, which were done according to the law.

Since the custom of the mass, as it is generally held, is in so many ways contrary to Scripture, and is also quite different from that which the holy fathers observed, it has been seriously condemned in our country from the pulpit, and thus made hateful by the word of God, that many have left it of their own free will, but others have abolished it by order of the authorities. Which we have undertaken for no other reason than because in all of Scripture the Spirit of God so rejects nothing and gives nothing so serious a reason to reject it as a 1) self-invented and false worship. Now anyone who asks only a little about religion knows what an unavoidable necessity is immediately incumbent upon the one who fears God, when he knows that God wants something. For everyone can easily see beforehand how many would take it if something were changed by us in the holy use of the Mass. And, of course, there was no one who would not have preferred to become offensive, not only to Your Imperial Majesty, but also to the most respected prince. Since, however, he was at the same time assured that by such a common custom of the Mass God would be so angered and His honor, for which one should also leave one's life, would be obscured, he had to be necessarily dismissed, lest, if one were to indulge in such a thing, one would also be guilty of the injured and diminished honor of God. And if one were to praise God above all

1) "one" of us put instead of: "his".

If he is to love and honor the pious, then the pious must suffer nothing less than what he detests and cannot suffer. But that this was the only reason why we changed something in these matters, therefore we refer to him as a witness, from whom no secrecy can be hidden.

Cap. 20.

From confession.

But because the confession of sins, which one intends to make out of a godly mind, cannot be made by anyone who is not driven to it by his repentance and true contrition, it cannot be forced by any commandment. That is why neither Christ nor the apostles themselves wanted to command it. For these reasons our ministers do indeed exhort to confess sins, and show the fruit of it, 1) if one secretly seeks counsel, comfort, teaching and admonition for himself from a Christian and prudent man; but with commandments they force no one. Rather, they say that such commandments are a hindrance to godliness. For such a regulation, to confess sins to the priest, has plunged innumerable souls into grave despair, and has other faults more in itself, that it should have been abolished long ago. And it would undoubtedly have been abolished long ago if the rulers of the churches had had the same zeal in the near future that St. Nestorius, bishop of Constantinople, had in the past, when he abolished auricular confession from his church because it was found that a noble woman, since she often came to church as if to do the works of penance, had often lain with the deacon. Such innumerable incidents have occurred from time to time.

In addition, the laws of the popes dictate that such a confessor and judge must be so holy, learned, wise, and compassionate that very few can find such a confessor, especially among those who are generally appointed to hear such confessions. Now the school teachers also hold that it is better to confess to a layman than to the priest, from whom one has no edification of godliness to expect. In short, confession that does not come from true repentance and newness about sin will do more harm than good. And since God alone can make us truly repent of sin and make us heartily sorry for having sinned, nothing salutary can be accomplished by commandments, which experience has so far shown more than too clearly.

1) namely, confession.

Cap. 21.

From the spiritual chants and prayers.

For this very reason, namely, not to be silent about God's insult, which could be done under the pretext of His service, and which is most repugnant to Him, our people have also condemned many things in the spiritual songs and prayers. For it is evident that they have departed entirely from the first institution of the fathers and its proper use. For everyone who has read the ancient Scriptures knows that it was customary for them to devoutly recite a few psalms with some chapter (or piece) of Scripture, and at the same time to interpret them, since now many psalms (or hymns) are sung, but without any understanding, and from the reading of Scripture only the beginning of such chapters (or pieces) is left. But innumerable things are mixed with one another, which are more conducive to superstition than to godliness, so our people 1) first detested the fact that in the holy prayers and hymns many things were added that are contrary to Scripture, since the saints are given what belongs to Christ alone, namely, that they are saved from sins and misfortune; that they not only ask for God's grace and all other good things, but give them. 2) Afterwards, that they have become such a large group that it is impossible to sing and recite them with devotion. Now this is nothing but a mockery of God, if one does something without understanding. 3) Finally, that meritorious works are made of them, and they are sold at a high price. Not to mention, 4) that everything is said and sung against the express commandment of the Holy Spirit in a language that not only the people do not understand, but also often not those who live from such songs and prayers.

Cap. 22.

From pictures and paintings.

But our people have also fought against the erected images (pillars) and paintings, especially because they have begun to honor and worship them obviously, and vain expenses are applied to them, which are due to the hungry, thirsty and naked Christ; and because even in such service and expense, which is nevertheless contrary to God's word, merit is still sought. Against such defenders of religion they have also cited the use of the ancient church, since nothing was so detestable as to see any painted or carved image in the church; which is sufficiently illustrated with the deed of Epiphani, bishop of Salamis in Cyprus, as he testifies about himself. For when he once saw Christ's or another saint's image (for he writes that he himself does not really know anymore) painted on a curtain of a church, he became so angry about it, because he saw a man's image hanging in the church against the commandment of the Scriptures and our faith and religion, that he immediately tore the curtain and ordered that one should cover a poor dead person in it. This letter, in which this man of God reports such things about himself, writing to John, bishop in Jerusalem, was translated into Latin by Jerome as orthodox, and he did not reprove this opinion of Epiphanius about images as erroneous in the least. From this one can sufficiently assume that neither St. Jerome, nor John, bishop in Jerusalem, had a different opinion about the images.

For the fact that it is generally said that the people are instructed and reminded by pictures and paintings will not be enough to make them, especially since the rabble worships them. The ancient people (the Jews) were much more ignorant, so that they had to be taught with many ceremonies; nevertheless, God did not consider that images served to teach and move the ignorant, but rather forbade them to be made. If one were to say that God has forbidden the making of such images that might be worshipped, it follows immediately that, because they have all long since begun to be worshipped, they must also be completely removed from the churches for the sake of the aversion. For in the church everything must be arranged for certain edification, let alone that one should suffer something that could certainly cause a fall and offense, but could have no benefit.

And what is stated: that they served as a reminder, St. Athanasius already rejected in his refutation of the pagans, who excused the idols with just the same pretext, thus: "You may say, how God is known through the images? Whether through the matter that is around them? or through the form (and shape) that is brought into matter? If through matter, then what need is there for form? Since God has already appeared before through all matter, before those come to it, and everything bears witness to His glory? But if the formation brought into it makes God more recognizable, what need is there of the painting and the other matter? Is not God then better known through the living creatures, whose form are the images? For surely God's glory would be known more if they were to be by sensible and unreasonable animals than by inanimate and immovable images. Therefore, if you engrave or prepare images to understand God by them, you do something quite unreasonable". So far Athanasius.

Lactantius also speaks 11b. 2. div. instit. much against such a futile pretext. For to him who can be reminded of God with benefit, besides the word of exhortation, the living and true works of God serve best for this purpose, rather than those vain images that men prepare. Since God has amply testified in so many passages of Scripture that this is His opinion of images, it will not do for us to seek benefit from them, from which God has commanded us to avoid danger, especially since we ourselves have experienced how much they hinder godliness. Our people admit that the use of images is free in itself, but even though it is free, a Christian must see what is pious and edifying, and have the images in the place and manner in which they will not offend anyone. For Paul would never eat and drink meat and wine if he saw that other people's salvation would be hindered in any way.

Cap. 23.

From the authorities.

Above we have testified that our churches place obedience, which one owes to the authorities, among the noblest good works, and teach that the more he is a righteous Christian and has more faith, the more he should endeavor to be subject to the common laws. Next, they teach that an authority is a more holy office than any that can befall man; hence it is that those who have such a public office are called gods in the Scriptures. For if they administer their office properly, both the doctrine and the life of the subjects are well, because God also governs our affairs in such a way that the welfare of the subjects depends in good part on those who have the rule. For this reason, no one is better able to govern than he who is most Christian and holy. Hence it is without doubt that the bishops and ecclesiastics before this were dragged along by godly emperors and kings to secular offices and external government. In this they have indeed acted very wisely, but it has nevertheless been provided in such a way that they cannot be capable of both offices and they must have lacked either the word in the church or the government in the common being.

End with short repetition.

It is this, most invincible, most blessed Emperor, in which our people, who are instructed only by the Scriptures, which are superior to all other long-established doctrines and human statutes, deviate a little from the common teaching of the clergy. We have, as much as can be done in brevity, presented this to Your Imperial Majesty, so that we can give an account of our faith to you, whom we honor and value next to God, as well as to show how necessary it is to think at times and seriously about ways and means how such an important matter may be recognized, considered and discussed, as it is only required by the worship of God, in whose cause one must always proceed with fear and trembling; Then it also befits Your Imperial Majesty, who is highly praised for her goodness and godliness at all times, and it itself brings that peace which Your Imperial Majesty seeks, namely, as a certain and firm peace, which without faith and religion is only a discord, and therefore cannot be attained otherwise than when the minds have first been properly informed of the truth.

However, we would perhaps not have needed to present so much to Your Imperial Majesty in this case, since the most noble Duke and Elector of Saxony, as well as others, have already thoroughly and extensively presented to Your Imperial Majesty 1) what is disputed in our holy religion today. However, since Your Imperial Majesty has demanded that all those who are involved in such trade should give their opinion, we have also considered it our duty to confess before Your Imperial Majesty what is taught in our country. Although so much is involved in this matter and connected with it, that what we have declared on both sides is still too little and much shorter than that a certain verdict in these disputes, so that not all, but only at least a good part of the Christians can be satisfied, can be reached for now, because there are so few who now agree with the truth.

Since this trade is so important, so diverse and manifold, that it cannot be decided with benefit unless many recognize and examine it, we most humbly entreat Your Imperial Majesty, and implore them for the sake of God and our Savior, whose honor they undoubtedly have before them.

The Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire seeks to have a common, free and rightly Christian concilium (or church meeting) called, which has seemed so necessary for the settlement of the church affairs of both Your Imperial Majesty and the other princes of the Holy Roman Empire, that almost in all imperial assemblies held after this religious discord, both Your Imperial Majesty's Commissars and the other princes of the empire have publicly testified that nothing salutary can be accomplished in any other way. Therefore, at the next Imperial Diet held at Speier, Your Imperial Majesty also expressed the hope that the Pope of Rome would not object to such a council being held in the future.

And if the opportunity for a general concilio should not arise in time, then let Your Imperial Majesty at least have a meeting of the teachers of every place and state in a single country (or empire), for which 2) all who have to be present may come freely and safely, all may be heard, and everything may be considered and judged by such men, of whom one is assured that they are God-fearing, and consequently seek to promote His honor above all else. For it is well known how seriously and diligently both emperors and bishops formerly acted in settling religious disputes, which are often not so important as those now raised in Germany; how they often did not consider it indecent or repugnant to take up and consider the same things anew and probably for the third time. And whoever considers the present state of things a little, will not doubt that it now needs much more earnestness, faithfulness, gentleness and skill to restore the Christian religion to its proper state than ever before. If there is truth with us (or we are right), which we most certainly believe, what trouble and time will it take for them also to recognize those whose consent or agreement at least is required to make an efficient and lasting peace? But if we are wrong, which we can never believe, it will again take great diligence and no less time to set so many thousands of people right. Which diligence and time Your Imperial Majesty will not regard as lost or indecent, since it is due to her to show us the very sense in whose place she rules over us, namely JEsu Christ, the Savior of us all. Who, since he came in the sense of seeking and

For if it (which we have indeed shown, and further always heartily were the case that they were not in the least concerned to desire to show), to make the praise of her goodness and instruct us, but only wanted to proceed briefly with orders, grace great. For we have arranged everything in this which we would by no means do if the matter remained in matter in such a way that we have made it sufficiently the hands of Your Imperial Majesty, then countless known to all righteous people how we will never let it occur thousands of people would find themselves in extremity to us to offend anyone, or to chase away our advantage distress, namely, in the certain opinion that God must be and our estate with other mischiefs. We have taken on heard first and foremost, and that the teachings they follow enough danger in this matter and have dared to incur are based on undoubted passages of the divine word, great costs, but we have not gained the least, except for which is why they are always frightened by the words of this, that we have been better instructed by the grace of our Savior: "Do not be afraid of those who kill the body" God, which He offers us in Christ, and thus have learned (Matth. 10. Luc. 12.). Likewise: "He who loses his life will to hope more confidently for the future (beloved God!). find it"; item: "He who does not hate his father and mother, But we value this so highly that we do not seem to have even his own life, cannot be my disciple"; item: "But suffered or done enough for it, because it is inestimable whoever will be ashamed of me before this perverse and and far superior to all that is in heaven and on earth. At wicked generation, I will also be ashamed of him before least we have not pursued the clergy's goods at all, but my Father and his angels", and the like. By these rather protected them ourselves at great risk and expense thundering voices many, awakened, would rather during the peasant uprising. The gospel of our Lord Jesus confidently suffer the hardest, and some would probably Christ, as much as he should love us, is the only thing that be silent for fear of death, but only until some occasion, penetrates us and has brought us to all that we have when in this trade before with commandment as doctrine, undertaken, as it is written, 1). Let then Your Imperial with force as indication of error would be dealt with them. Majesty rather follow the example of the 2) most powerful For what a firm assurance in matters of religion is capable and quite happy Emperor Con-

of, and how it not only makes one put his goods but also his life in the redoubt, one has, that I say nothing of old times, already seen enough in these ten years in many who rather endured not only banishment and misery, but also imprisonment, torture and death themselves, than that they abandoned the opinion they held to be true and let themselves be driven away from it. If there is any dispute about trifles (in temporal matters), little will be done.

1) "as you can see, have undertaken" is set by us instead of "seem to have undertaken" in the old edition.

2) "the" put by us instead of "the" in the old edition. Latin: xotisntssiiLoruiL.

The following are those who, first of all, with all the doctrine and gentleness that the most holy and faithful bishops had given them, and likewise with the appointment of proper councils and mature consideration of all things, wanted to act on the erring and try everything before they decreed something harsher against them; as those who had counselors who were not at all like such ancient and holy fathers, and therefore also had such an outcome that did not at all agree with that godliness. Your Imperial Majesty does not want to be turned away from this, because most of what is being disputed now was decided long ago in ancient times, 1) and especially at the Costnitz Concilio. And this primarily because she sees that the clergy do not keep a hair of countless, both holy and necessary conciliar agreements of former times, and everything has become so wild among them that there is no one of common sense left who does not cry out that a concilium should be held to restore religion and the sanctity of the clergy. But if what was decreed at Costnitz is so pleasing to them, how did it happen that in the meantime it could not be maintained in any way that Christian concilia were held every ten years, as was decided at that time? For in this way much of godliness and faith could have been regained or retained.

But who would deny that, as often as the disease sets in again, so often is the medicine to be used, and that those who have the truth right never refrain from teaching it to the pious, as well as defending it against the wicked, wherever it can be promised that some benefit may be gained by it? Since so many thousands of souls are so doubtful and distressed in the teachings of our religion, who would not believe that there is very rich fruit to be hoped for, that all those whom the Spirit of God drives should therefore be justified in putting all other things aside and disregarding all toil and labor, and to undertake and seek that which is certain with all their might, so that Christ's teachings, from which all righteousness and blessedness come, be duly investigated and cleansed of all errors, and be offered in its true natural form to all those who have a heartfelt desire for godliness and the right service of God, so that a holy and eternal peace, and a true calming of all things (in that the sheep of Christ, for whom he shed his blood, only unfortunately! have been too much disturbed and troubled) like-

Who will be brought and confirmed? which cannot be restored to them in any other way, as we have already said, than those who are sure that in other matters they will gladly yield and give way, but in the matter of godliness they must hold and remain so firm to the words of God that, if they had a thousand lives, they would rather lay them all on the slaughter and sacrifice them than give one jot or tittle of them, if they were assured that it was a piece of the divine commandment. Since one soul is worth more than the whole world, what should not be done for the salvation of so many thousands of souls?

Since there is so much hope for this, and those who are accused of error by your sacred imperial majesty ask nothing else than that they may be instructed, so that they may completely abandon themselves to the holy Scriptures, which are sufficient to refute all errors; and since Christ our Saviour so gloriously promises that wherever two or three are gathered together in his name, he will be in the midst of them, and that they shall obtain all things through him, concerning which they have been united in asking: We, most blessed Emperor, have not wanted to do this for any other reason than that Your Imperial Majesty, who has demanded that we also give our opinion as to how religion might be helped again, might see this, and that we might prove our most humble obedience. For we should live in the certain hope and confidence that Your Imperial Majesty has long since recognized and seen for Himself what a need drives to this, what a fruit, which thereby inspires hope, and how much this is suitable for Your Imperial Majesty's highly praised godliness and grace, that she let the men most endowed with learning and godliness come together and duly judge from the holy Scriptures what is to be held of every doctrine that is now being disputed, so that this may then be proclaimed and explained with all gentleness and fidelity by capable servants of Christ to all those who are believed to be in error.

It is to be feared, however, that there will be no lack of those who would endeavor to bring Your Imperial Majesty to a different mind; we have found it necessary to answer you, Most Gracious Emperor, in this way.

May Your Imperial Majesty, then, both the same and all the other things that we do not intend to change here, as the honor of JEsu Chxisti, our Simon wolferinus.

29. D. Martin Luther's two letters to M. Simon Wolferinus, pastor at St. Andreä in Eisleben, concerning the leftover bread and wine in Holy Communion.*)

Translated from Latin.

First letter.

July 4, 1543.

To the venerable man in the Lord, M. Simon Wolferinus, pastor at St. Andreä in Eisleben, his brother in the Lord and faithful fellow servant!

Grace and peace in the Lord. In addition to so many miseries of my old age, you, my dear Simon, and Mr. Friedrich, 2) pastor of St. Peter in my fatherland, have caused me distress. It is nothing that you can foresee.

2) D. Fridericus is, as reported by Seckendorf, Hist. Initt. III, p. 467, Friedrich is a robber. - De Wette, VI, 690 is said to be "Pastor zu St. Andreas in Eisleben", but Luther writes here that he is "Pastor zu St. Peter".

test, as if that one alone had been given a hearing in your absence. I have seen your disputations and letters, in which you revenge yourself in such a bitter way, as if he were the most damned of the papists, although you are both of one city and shepherds of one people, indeed to very great annoyance. Well then, if he has offended you in public, which he denies, and of which I do not judge, why have you not dealt with him either according to the law or according to love? but, inflamed with rage, you have avenged yourself and set yourself up as a judge with the most terrifying words, which any drunkard 3) would find more offensive.

3) Bacclius - Bacchant.

*) These two letters of Luther are found in Latin in Buddeus, x. 277 and x. 279; in the Jena edition, Dorn. IV, fol. 585 and fol. 585d; transcribed in 6o6. eUart. Ootli. 399; also in De Wette, vol. V, p. 572 and p. 577; the first letter according to the "Fortgesetzte Sammlung" 1732, p. 868, in I. Hachenbrg's "Nöthige Unterrichtung" u. s. w. (Burkhardt, p. 427.) German in the Leipzig edition, vol. XXI, p. 435 and p. 436, and in the Hall volume p. 461 and p. 462. We have retranslated according to De Wette.

than a preacher would stand against his fellow preacher. For he is neither a heretic nor an enemy of the doctrine whom you treat with such hostility. Or is there no one of understanding among us or among you to whom you could have reported your anger before you raged in such a way?

2 But to the matter. Not we have it from you, but you have it without doubt from us, that the sacraments are actions (actiones), not continuing holy things (stantes factiones). But what strange audacity is this of yours, that you do not avoid such an evil appearance, which you should know to be annoying, namely, that you mix what remains of wine and bread with the previous bread and wine? After what example do you do this? Surely you do not see how dangerous questions you will bring on the way, if you insist on your sense and claim that with the cessation of the action the sacrament also ceases. Perhaps you want it to be said of you that you are a Zwinglian, and I would like to believe that you suffer from Zwingli's nonsense, since you incite with your peculiar and boastful wisdom in such a proud and contemptuous manner. Was there no other way, so that the simple and the adversaries would not suspect that you are a despiser of the sacrament, than that you caused offence through evil appearances, by mixing what was left over from the sacrament and pouring it together with the previous wine? Why do you not follow the other churches? Why do you alone want to be considered the author of new and dangerous things? I write this so painfully that you may know that you have given me trouble and grieved my spirit. You yourself say that these are trifles, and you are so angry about trifles? Yes, they are very serious trifles. But you may not care who is angered, if only you come out victorious in these trifles. But the Lord, whom you resist, will resist you again.

3 Therefore I exhort you, since you know, or should know, how to walk in the church, that you should communicate with Mr. Frederick.

and that you are unanimously of the same opinion and speak the same language. For you may thus, as we do here, drink and eat up what is left of the sacrament with the communicants, so that there will be no need to raise these vexatious and dangerous questions of the cessation of the sacramental action, which you will choke on if you do not repent. For with this reason you will abolish the whole Sacrament, and have nothing to answer the slanderers, who will say that under the action the Sacrament ceases more than it is practiced. Finally we shall arrive at the monstrosities of the Cratylus, that we shall be compelled to have the Sacrament only in the actione, and not in the intermissione accidentium, and at last the time and the moment will become the cause of the Sacrament, and many other inconsistencies will follow. Therefore, conform yourself to more arid churches and do not start a war against them, lest you fall with disgrace. I will certainly oppose, as much as I can, your peculiarity and your offensive and annoying presumption, and will not allow my last hour to be burdened with your annoyances. Fare well in the Lord; in the Lord, I say, and restrain your desire for revenge and arrogance, especially against a brother who is not heretical, nor sets himself against our doctrine. Wednesday after Peter and Paul in the year 1543.

Martin Luther, Doctor.

I, Johann Bugenhagen from Pomerania, Doctor, subscribe to the opinion of our venerable father Luther.

Second letter.

July 20, 1543.

1. grace and peace. Dear Simon Wolferinus! Should I not be justly saddened and grieved to see that you, preachers of one city and of the people in one church, who are united in all doctrine, have clashed with one another in such a contentious spirit because of a matter that is not sufficiently clear to you, nor is it of such high importance to you?

Meaning, if it were clear? See for yourself your sentences, whether such horrible shouting rhymes with love and brotherly behavior. I see that the devil tempts you to make a beam out of a splinter, rather a great fire out of a spark. You could have settled this by a friendly conversation, since you did not have to argue against the fury of the papists, but with a comrade in office and in Christianity.

2 Admittedly, Mr. Philip has written correctly that there is no sacrament apart from the sacramental act, but you take the sacramental act too hastily and briefly. In this way you will bring about that you seem to have no sacrament at all. For if this hasty cutting off of the action should endure, it will follow that after the utterance of the words, which is the most excellent and principal action in the Sacrament, no one would receive the Body and Blood of Christ, because the action would have ceased. This is certainly not what Mr. Philip wants. And this explanation (definitio) of the action would generate innumerable conscientious doubts and endless questions, just as among the papists it was disputed whether during the first, middle or last syllables the Body and Blood of Christ were present. Therefore, one must not only look at this movement of the instantaneous or present action, but also at the duration of time (tempus), not in mathematical, but in physical extension, that is, one must give this action a period of time (mors), and indeed a period of time in right extension, as one says, öv [according to the width].

3 We will therefore declare (definiemus) the time or sacramental action in such a way that it begins with the beginning of the Holy Prayer of the Father and lasts until all have communicated, drunk the chalice, eaten the Hosts, and celebrated the Eucharist.

People have been dismissed, and one has departed from the altar. Thus, we will be safe and free from conscience concerns and aergernissen of endless questions. Mr. Philip explains the sacramental action with reference to external things (ad extra ----- outwardly), that is, against the enclosure and circumambulation of the Sacrament; he does not divide it into himself (intra se ipsam), nor does he explain it against himself. Therefore, if there is anything left over from the Sacrament, you will see to it that either some communicants or the priest himself and the preacher receive it, not that the deacon alone or only one other drinks the rest in the cup, but that he gives it to others who have also partaken of the body, so that you do not seem to share the Sacrament by an evil example, or to treat the sacramental act dishonorably. This is my opinion, and I know that it is also Philip's.

I further exhort you to harmony and peace, and that you forgive and reconcile among yourselves, as you have the commandment of the Lord, otherwise you will not be able to be servants of the church without danger and trouble, yes, without severe wrath of God. You could (if you were afraid to talk to each other in the beginning) make use of other and suitable persons who would be mediators among you. What I write to you, I want to be regarded as if I had also written it to Vigelius and Mr. Friedrich. May the Lord guide your hearts in the love and patience of Christ. Take this, which I have had to dictate, for the best, for I have not been able to write myself because I suffered from my head. Therefore, pray for me and rejoice my heart. This you will do when I receive the news that you are reconciled in the Lord; in him you are well. Given at Wittenberg, July 20, 1543.

Luther's Writings Against Other Enthusiasts.

I. Luther's Writings Against the

▲ ◌ •

30. D. Martin Luther's writing "against the antinomians", to D. Caspar Güttel, preacher at Eisleben.*) January 1539.

To the worthy and highly learned Mr. Caspar Güttel, doctor and preacher at Eisleben, my special good friend in Christ.

1. grace and peace in Christ. Dear Doctor! I am well aware that the disputations against the new spirits have long since come to you, who have dared to expel the law of God or the Ten Commandments from the church and to send them to the town hall. I would never have thought of soft spirits that it should occur to a man to be silent, but God warns us through such cases that we should be careful and not imagine the devil to be so far away from us as such safe, insolent spirits presume to be. Truly, with fear, humility and earnest prayer, God must be constantly invoked for help and protection, otherwise it will truly soon happen that the devil will raise a specter before our eyes, so that we will swear that it is the right holy one.

This is how the spirit itself warns us, not only the ancient heretics, but also the examples of our time, which have been and still are great and terrible.

Now I might well have forgotten everything that has hurt me in this, where I could have had peace of mind in the hope that I would have shown and protected myself sufficiently with such disputation; but Satan did not want to suffer that, he always wants to mix me in, as if things are not so bad between me and them. And if I had remained in death in Schmalkalden, I would have had to be called the patron of such spirits forever, because they refer to my books, and yet played all this behind me, without knowledge and against my will, and also did not look at me that they would have shown me a word or letter of it, or would have asked me about such a thing. So I am forced to take M. Johann Agricola to task (about what he learned in the disputation) more than once, and in front of our doctors, theologians told him everything that had to be cut, because he is such a game beginner and master, so that he had to grasp what he would have done to me and my spirit (which I also consider good).

*This writing appeared in a single edition at Wittenberg by Joseph Klug in 1539 under the title: "Wider die Antinomer. D. Mar. Luther." Further, in the same year in Nuremberg by Kunea and Hergotin. In the collections: in the Wittenberg (1553), vol. VI, p. 458; in the Jena (1568), vol. VII, p. 285d; in the Altenburg, vol. VII, p. 310; in the Leipzig, vol. XXI, p. 344; in the Erlangen, vol. 32, p. 1 and in De Wette, vol. V, p. 147. We give the text according to the Erlangen edition, which brings the first-mentioned original print, comparing the Wittenberg and Jena editions.

(3) So he humbly surrendered (as his words and actions showed) and promised to refrain from doing too much and to be like us. So I had to believe this and be satisfied. But as this is still interpreted, yes, also praised (as writings have come from), that D. Martinus and Magister Eisleben were on good terms with each other, I further urged him to let a public contradiction go out by printing, otherwise there would be no council in Eisleben and in the countries around to eradicate such poison. He also willingly surrendered and offered to do so. But because he was concerned that he would not be able to do it in such a way that it would be sufficiently respected, he confronted me with it, and also asked that I do it as I could; he would be well satisfied with it, which I accepted (and hereby want to have done), mostly so that after my death neither Magister Eisleben himself nor anyone else could pretend that I had done nothing to it, and let everything go on like this and be good.

(4) Namely, that he has recanted what Magister Johannes Eisleben has taught or written against the Law or the Ten Commandments, and with us (as we do here in Wittenberg), as well as in Augsburg before the Emperor, he will keep the Confessio and Apologia, and whether he would keep or teach otherwise hereafter, it shall be nothing and condemned. I would have praised him for humbling himself in this way, but since it is obvious that he has been one of my best and closest friends, I will save it for another, so that the matter will not be suspected as if I were not serious. If he remains in such humility, God can and will exalt him; if he rises above it, God can bring him down again.

5 Therefore I ask you, dear Doctor, not to leave such things written to you alone.

1) In the Wittenberg and in the Jena: it would.

but that you announce and show it to all where you can, especially to those who cannot read; for it is also for this reason that it is printed in the day, so that whoever will or can read it may read it, so that it is not written to you alone, because I cannot defend myself against Satan in any other way; he always wants to carry me out in other ways through writings, neither I am nor I hold.

(6) And I am very much surprised how I can be accused of rejecting the Law or the Ten Commandments, when there is so much, and not one, of my interpretation of the Ten Commandments, which are also preached and practiced daily in our churches; (I am silent about the Confession and Apologia) (2) and other books of ours; (3) in addition, two different ways are sung, about which they are also painted, printed, carved, even by the children early in the morning. They are spoken at noon and in the evening, so that I no longer know any way in which they are not practiced, without us (unfortunately!) not practicing them with action and life, nor painting them, as we are obliged to do, and I myself, how old and learned I am, speak them daily like a child from word to word. That if someone had understood something different from my writings, and yet saw and grasped that I was so vehement in my Catechismum, he should have spoken to me and said: "Dear Doctor Luther! How can you be so vehement about the Ten Commandments when your teaching is that they should be rejected? They should have done this, and not secretly dig behind me and wait for my death, then do what they want with me. Well, let them be forgiven who desist from it.

(7) Of course, I have taught, and still teach, that sinners should be provoked to repentance by the preaching or contemplation of the Passion of Christ, so that they may see how great the wrath of God is against sin, that there is no other remedy, except that the Son of God must die for it. Which teaching is not mine, but Saint Bernard's. What is Sanct Bernhard's? It is the sermon of all Christianity, of all prophets and apostles. But how does it follow from this that the law is therefore should do away with? I cannot find such a consequence in my Dialectica; I would also like to see and hear the master who could prove it.

(8) When Isaiah says Cap. 53:8: I have smitten him for the sins of my people, beloved, tell me, Christ's suffering is preached here, that he is smitten for our sins; but is the law thrown away by this? What then does "for my people's sin" mean? Does it not mean as much as because my people sinned against my law and did not keep my law? Or can anyone think that sin is something where there is no law? He that putteth away the law must put away the sins also. If he wants to leave sins behind, he must leave the law behind much more. For Rom. 5, 13: Where there is no law, there is no sin [Cap. 4, 15]; where there is no sin, Christ is nothing. For why does he die, if there is neither law nor sin, for which he must die? From this it can be seen that the devil does not mean to take away the law, but Christ, the fulfiller of the law (Matth. 5, 17.).

9 For he knows that Christ can be taken away quickly and easily, but the law is written in the heart, which cannot be taken away, as you can see in the Psalms of lamentation, where the dear saints cannot bear the wrath of God [Ps. 38, 143, 2c.], which can be nothing else than the sensitive preaching of the law in the conscience. And the devil also knows well that it is not possible to take away the law from the hearts, as St. Paul testifies Rom. 2, 14. 15. that the Gentiles, who did not receive the law through Moses and therefore have no law, are nevertheless their law themselves, as they must testify that the work of the law is written in their hearts 2c. But he goes about making the people secure, and teaches them to pay no attention to both law and sin, so that if they are suddenly overtaken with death or an evil conscience, having previously been accustomed to sweet security, they would sink to hell without all counsel, as having nothing else taught 1) in Christ but sweet security, so that such terror would be a sure sign that Christ (who must be sweetness itself) had rejected and forsaken them; this is what the devil seeks and wants.

(10) But it seems to me that such spirits are of the opinion that all those who listen to the sermon are true Christians who are without sin, when they are true sorrowful, miserable hearts that feel their sin and fear God, for which reason they are to be comforted; for such people can never make dear Jesus sweet enough, but they can do it much more, as I have experienced in many (I will keep my own mouth shut). But such spirits are not such Christians themselves, because they are so sure and of good cheer; just as little are their hearers, who are also sure and of good cheer. In one place, a beautiful little girl of the Inn, an excellent singer, sings thus: "He feeds the hungry, that they may rejoice; and he makes the rich to be poor; he brings low the high, and exalts the low; and his mercy is upon them that fear him." [If the Magnificat is otherwise, God must be hostile to the secure spirits who do not fear, just as such spirits must be who take away law and sin.

(11) Therefore I beseech you, my dear doctor, to continue as you have done hitherto in the pure doctrine, and to preach that sinners ought and ought to be provoked to repentance, not only by the sweet grace and suffering of Christ, that he died for us, but also by the terror of the law. For the fact that they pretend that one must preach repentance in one way only, namely that Christ suffered for us, otherwise Christianity would be led astray as to what the right and only way is, is nothing; but one should preach all kinds of ways, as God's providence, promise, punishment, help, and whatever one can, so that we may be brought to repentance, that is, to the knowledge of sins and the law with all the examples of Scripture, as all the prophets, apostles, and St. Paul have done. Paul, Rom. 2, 4: "Do you not know that God's goodness prompts you to repentance?"

12 But I suppose that I would have taught or said that the law should not be taught in the church, as all my writings do.

1) "Taught" here is as much as "learned".

show otherwise, and from the beginning always pushed the Catechismum: should one therefore cling to me so stiffly, and [not rather] 1) resist myself, if I have always taught much differently, and thus become disparaging of myself, as I have done in the Pope's teaching? For this I will and may boast with truth, that at the present time no pope is a pope with such conscience and earnestness as I have been. For what is papal now is not for the fear of God, as I had to be a poor wretch, but seeks another, as one can well see and they themselves know. I had to learn St. Peter's saying [2.²] Epist. 3, 18.]: Crescite in cognitione Domini. So I see no doctor, no concilium nor fathers, if I should distill their books, and make quintam essentiam out of it, that they could have done the crescite in the beginning, and crescite as much as perfectum esse. As a sign, St. Peter himself had to learn his own crescite from St. Paul, Gal. 2, 11, and St. Paul from Christ himself, who had to say to him: Sufficit tibi gratia mea etc. [2 Cor. 12, 9. [2 Cor. 12, 9.]

Dear God, can we not suffer that the Holy Church recognizes herself as a sinner, believes in forgiveness of sins, and asks for forgiveness of sins in the Lord's Prayer? But how does one know what sin is, where the law and conscience are not? [And where will we learn what Christ is, what he has done for us, if we are not to know what the law is (which he fulfills for us), or what sin is, for which he has done enough? And even if we are not allowed to preach the law for ourselves and tear it out of our hearts, which is impossible, we must preach it for Christ's sake (as is done and must be done), so that people may know what he has done and suffered for us. For who could know what Christ suffered for us and why Christ suffered for us, if no one should know what sin or law is? That is why the law must be preached, where one wants to preach Christ. Even if one does not want to call the word law, the conscience is nevertheless frightened by the law, when the sermon says that Christ had to fulfill the law for us so dear [Matth. 5, 17. Gal. 3, 13.], why then does one want to do away with it, which cannot be done away with, yes, by doing away it is strengthened all the more? For the law is more terrifying when I hear that Christ, the Son of God, had to bear it for me, neither if it were preached to me apart from Christ and without such great suffering on the part of the Son of God, but only with thieves. For in the Son of God I see, as in fact, the wrath of God, which the law shows me with words and small works.

14 Oh, I should have peace before the mines, it would be enough for the papists. Someone would almost like to say with Job [3, 3] and Jeremiah [20, 14]: "I wish that I had never been born"; so I would almost like to say: I wish that I had not come with my books; I would not ask anything about them, I would suffer that they would all already be destroyed, and such high spirits would sell their writings in all bookstores, as they would like, so that they would be satisfied with the beautiful honor. Again, I do not have to respect myself better than our dear Lord Jesus Christ, who also complains from time to time: "In vain have I labored, and my toil is wasted" [Is. 49,³) The devil is Lord in the world, and I myself could never believe that the devil should be Lord and God of the world [Jn. 14, 30. 2 Cor. 4, 4? until I now quite learned that it is also an article of faith: Princeps mundi, deus hujus saeculi. But (praise God!) it remains unbelieved among the children of men, and I myself also believe weakly; for each one likes his way well, and all hope that the devil is beyond the sea, and God is in our pocket.

(15) But for the sake of the pious who want to be saved, we must live, preach, write, do everything and suffer; otherwise the devils and false brothers will be attacked.

If we could see that it would be better not to have and yet teach wrath, which only the law must do. So they preached, written or done anything, but only to have died do nothing more than throw away these poor letters and been buried soon, for they pervert and blaspheme all "law"; but confirm the wrath of God, which is interpreted things and make a vain mischief out of them, as the devil and understood by these letters, without wanting to turn rides and leads them. It must be fought and suffered; we the neck of St. Paul and put the foremost at the back. cannot be better than the dear prophets and apostles who Shouldn't this be a high art, before which all the world also suffered [Matth. 5, 12]. would have to wonder? But that is enough for now, for I

(16) They conspire to invent a new method, that grace hope that because Magister Eisleben has converted and should be preached first, and then the revelation of wrath, recanted, the others who have it from him will also desist; so that the word "law" should not be heard or spoken. This God help them, amen.

is a fine cat's paw, pleases them splendidly well, and they 18. 1) From all this we see, and if we wanted to, we think they want to pull the whole Scripture in and out, and could well understand the histories from the beginning of the church, that it has always been like this, when God's thus become lux munāi. This is what St. Paul should and word has gone out, and his people have been read must give, Rom. 1. But do not see how St. Paul teaches together, the devil has become aware of the light, and just contrary to sense, first of all showing the wrath of God has blown against it from all angles, and has blown and from heaven, and making all the world sinners and guilty stormed with strong great winds, to extinguish such before God; then, when they have become sinners, he divine light. And whether one or two winds have been teaches them how to obtain grace and become righteous, controlled or resisted, he has always blown and stormed as the first three chapters show powerfully and clearly. against the light from one hole to the other, and there has And is this also a strange blindness and foolishness, that been no cessation nor end, nor will there be before the they think that revelation of wrath is something else, last day.

neither the law, which is not possible, because revelation (19) I think that I alone have suffered more than twenty of wrath is the law, where it is recognized and felt, as Paul tempests and storms blown by the devil. First of all, there says [Rom. 4:15]: Lex iram operatur operatur. Have they was the Pabstthum; yes, I think all the world should know not then finely hit it, that they do away with the law, and with how many storm winds, bulls and books the devil yet teach it, when they teach the revelation of wrath? But raged against me through them, how miserably they tore they turn the shoe, and teach us the law according to the me apart, devoured me and destroyed me, even though gospel, and wrath according to grace. But what shameful I breathed on them a little at times, but that did nothing, errors the devil means by this little cat's paw, I see quite a except that they became angrier and more furious, few of them, but I cannot deal with them this time; also blowing and spraying, to this day without ceasing. And because I hope it will stop, it is not necessary. since I was almost afraid of such spraying of the devil.

It has been a strange hope and presumption that they also want to bring something new and strange to light, so that people should say: I mean, this is a man, he is another Paul; do only those in Wittenberg have to know it all? Yes, certainly a head that seeks its own honor and is confident in its wisdom. For they want the law

1) The following, from here to the end, of this writing, is used for the spurious preface of D. Martin Luther, vor seinem Abschied gestellet", which first appeared in the 2nd volume of the Wittenberg edition and from there passed into all other editions, with the exception of the Jena edition. The alleged proof in the Erlangen edition, vol. 63, p. 407: "Jen. I, 1." is fictitious. In Walch, this section is in the old edition, vol. XIV, 475-480, §§ 1-13.

The devil breaks through another hole for me, through the coiner and the riot, so that he almost blows out the light for me. But when Christ also almost blocked the hole, he tore several panes out of my window through Carlstadt, roaring and hissing, so that I thought he wanted to lead away light, wax and night with each other. But God also helped his wretched lantern here, and kept it from going out. After that the Anabaptists came, 1) pushed open the door and windows (as they thought) to extinguish the light; they made everything dangerous, but did not accomplish their will.

20. Some have also raged against the old teachers, Pabst and Luther, as Servetus, 2) Campanus, and the like; The others, who did not publicly rage in print against me, which poisonous evil scripture and word I personally had to suffer, I will not tell now, but indicate so much that I also had to learn from my own experience (since I did not respect the histories), that the church for the sake of the dear word, yes, for the sake of the happy blessed light, cannot have rest, but must always wait for new and new storms of the devil, as it has happened from the beginning, as you may read in ecclesiastica and trihistoria, also in the holy fathers books.

(21) And if I were to live another hundred years, and had not only laid down the previous and present storms and tempests (by God's grace), but could also lay down all future ones in this way, I can well see that this would not give our descendants peace, because the devil lives and reigns; therefore I also ask for a merciful hour, and no longer desire the being. You, our descendants, also pray, and diligently drive God's word, keep the poor lantern of God, be warned and prepared, as they must wait for all the hour, when the devil may throw out a pane or window, tear open a door or roof, to extinguish the light; for he does not die before the last day. I and you must die, and if we are dead, he nevertheless remains the same as he always was, and cannot cease his storming.

(22) I see there from afar how he blows up his cheeks so violently that he immediately turns red, wants to blow and storm. But as our Lord Christ from the beginning (even in his own person) struck his chubby cheeks with his fist, so that they became like the devil's farts, even though they almost stank; so he will do now and always. For he cannot lie, since he says: "I am with you until the end of the world" [Matth. 28, 20], "and the gates of the cloisters shall not prevail against the church" [Matth. 16, 18], nevertheless we are also commanded to watch, and to keep the light as much as is in us. It is called vigilate; for the devil is called lev rugiens, who goes about and wants to devour, not only in the time of the apostles, when St. Peter spoke such things [1 Petr. 5, 8], but until the end of the world; then we may comply. May God help us, as He helped our forefathers, and will also help our descendants, to praise and honor His divine name forever. For it is not we who can preserve the church; nor was it our forefathers; nor will it be our descendants; but it was, is, and will be He who says, "I am with you to the end of the age," as Heb. 13:8 says, "Jesus Christ et hodie et in saecula," and Revelation 1:4: "He who was, he who is, he who will be." Yes, that is the name of the man, and no other man is called that, nor shall any be called that.

(23) For you and I were nothing a thousand years ago, when yet the church was preserved without us, and he that is called qui erat and hert [Heb. 13:8] must do it. Neither are we now in our lives; for the church is not preserved by us, because we cannot ward off the devil in the pope, mobs, and evil men, and because of this the church before our eyes, and we with it, would have to perish (as we experience daily), if there were not another man who would seemingly preserve both the church and us; that we might grasp it and feel it, if we did not want to believe it, and must let him do it who is called qui est, and hodie. Likewise, 1) we will do nothing to preserve the church when we are dead; but he will do it who is called: Qui venturus est and: iu saecula. And what we now say of ourselves in this matter, our ancestors also had to say of themselves, as the Psalms and Scriptures testify; and our descendants will also experience it in such a way that they will sing with us and the whole church the 124th Psalm: "If God were not with us this time, Israel shall say" 2c.

2) In the old editions: "Serveto". Michael Servetus (Lsrvsäs) was burned as a blasphemer in Geneva on October 27, 1533 (on Calvin's charge). Cf. Guericke, Church History (7th ed.) Vol. III, p. 697 ff.

(24) It is a pitiful thing that we have so many terrible examples before us of those who have allowed themselves to think that they must hold the church as if the church were founded on them, [who] have so shamefully perished in the end; and yet such cruel judgment of God cannot break nor humble nor defend our pride and iniquity. What has happened to the: Coiners in our time? (will be silent about the old and previous ones) who let himself think that the church could not be without him, that he had to carry and govern it; and recently

1) So the Wittenbergers and the Jenaers. Erlanger: but likewise.

The Anabaptists warned us terribly that we should remember how powerful and close to us the beautiful devil is and how dangerous our pretty thoughts are, that we should look into our hand first, according to Isaiah's advice [Cap. 44, 19], when we undertake something, whether it is God or idol, whether it is gold or glue. But it does not help, but we are safe, without fear and worry, the devil is far from us, and is not in us such flesh, which was in St. Paul, about which he complains, he can not fight him (as he would like to do), but would be caught [Rom. 7, 23.]. But we are the heroes, who* must not be afraid of our flesh and thoughts, but we are vain spirits, and have our flesh together with the devil completely captive, so that everything that occurs to us, or [we] may think, that is certainly and surely the Holy Spirit, how can it be lacking? That is why in the end it goes out so finely that horse and man break their necks. This time enough of such lamentations. May our dear Lord Christ be and remain our dear Lord Christ, praised forever and ever, amen.

31 D. Martin Luther's refutation of the "false and seductive" teaching of the antinomians against the law, written in 6 disputations.*)

The first disputation December 1537; the following January 12, 1538; the third and fourth (without date) 1538; the fifth September 13, 1538; the sixth September 10, 1540.

Translated from Latin.

Some "theses disseminated among brothers" (this was the title) have come into my hands, whose author is not known for sure (iincerto autore). So that I do not seem to approve them by my silence, I have wanted to publish them as such, which must be rejected, in order to give a testimony to all those to whom I could, that we absolutely abhor such monstrosities, which we want to make clear immediately afterwards by counter-disputations (God willing). 2)

2) In the original, the date "In 1538" is missing, which is found in the editions. Luther had these theses printed and published on December 1, 1537. Cf. Förstemann's "Neues Urkundenbuch," p. 313, No. 6.

*) The first five of these disputations are found in Latin in the Wittenberg Thesensammlungen of 1538 and 1558; the sixth alone in the 1558 edition, of which there is also an original print. (Cf. Förstemann's Neues Urkundenbuch, p. 344.) Then in the Wittenberg edition (1550), Dom. I, toi. 399k; in the Jena one (1579), Dorn. I, toi 516, and in the Erlanger, or>r>. var. urA, vol. IV, p. 420. German in the Wittenberg edition, vol. XII, p. 228; in the Jenaer (1568), vol. VII, p. 290; in the Altenburger, vol. VII, p. 314, and in the Leipziger, vol. XXI, p. 349. We have retranslated according to the Erlanger edition, comparing the Jenaer and the Wittenberger. The text, however, has been improved by us according to the variants given by Förstemann, Neues Urkundenbuch, p. 313, No. 6, from the original.

1) (Sentences of a certain antinomian [law striker].)

1) Repentance is to be taught not from the Ten Commandments or any law of Moses, but from the ungodly falling away from the Son (of God] 2) through the gospel.

2. for Christ speaks Luke 24:26, 46, 47:

1) This caption is missing in the original.

2) ex violatione ülii is not quite correctly rendered in the old translation as: "from the suffering and death of the Son of God". From the letter of Wendelin Faber, preacher at Seeburg, to O. Caspar Güttel, preacher at Eisleben, dated April 24 and 26, 1540 (Fürstemann, Neues Urkundenbuch, p. 332 ff. with the wrong date "April 20". Cf. Kawerau, p. 166), we can see what Agricola meant by these words. Agricola had, to prove his false doctrine, formed a syllogism from these three sentences: 1. repentance, knowledge of sin and fear of God must not be taught from the law, but from the Gospel, through the name of Christ. 2. 2) In the New Testament, it is not a question of whether someone has behaved ungodly in relation to the law (äs violations legm), but only whether he has behaved ungodly against the Son of God (äs violations ülii Osi). From this follows 3. that the law must not be preached in the church of Christ, but only the gospel. - The way to bring this doctrine to the people should be this: 1. God's grace and mercy in Christ should be preached to the people in the sweetest way possible. This is the major (propositio). Then the people are to be asked to examine themselves whether they also fully believe this in poverty, sickness, disgrace, fear of death and other misfortunes. This is the minor, the main thing, which is not followed by the gospel, but by the fact that Christ is a true Moses. "The minor is followed by: conclusio in hunc moaurü": 3. "Whoever now knows himself guilty, let him call upon GOtt" 2c. This is finally summarized thus: "This was the syllogism: I. The doctrine of Martm fLuthers is Eisleben's major. II. Martin's confession is Eisleben's minor. III. the prayer is the sonslusio." Because Agricola was all about his minor, his followers called themselves: Minorss, Minor isch or Minorrsten. From the above it is clear that the words sx violations ülii do not allow any other translation than the one we have given. In Agricola's syllogism above violatio ls'is contrasted with violatio ülii, therefore violntio must be translated in the same way in both cases, and both lssis and ülii must be oenitivu8 osijsstivns. Köstlm, Martin Luther, vol. II, p. 465, correctly states, "from the consciousness of how much we have sinned toward her sthe message of salvation from Christ] true repentance must then arise." Agricola himself in the "Summaries on the Evangelia" explains: "violationsm ülii, who for the sake of the kingdom of heaven does not willingly leave what he should leave, and does not do what he should do, crucifies Christ anew." Fürstemann, 1. s., p. 302. The same expression per violationsm ülii is also found in Luther's sermon, which he held soon after Agricola's theses became known on the fifth Sunday after Trinity (July 1) 1537. Walch, St. Louis Edition, vol. XI, 1328, § 42.

So Christ had to die and in this way enter into His glory, that repentance and forgiveness of sin might be preached in His name.

3 Christ also says in John (16:8) that the Spirit punishes the world for sin, not the law.

4) The same 3) teaches the last sermon of Christ: Go, preach the gospel to every creature [Marc. 16, 15].

5 Since St. Paul speaks Phil. 2, 5. 12.: "Let every man be of the same mind as Christ Jesus was, 2c. that ye obtain your salvation with fear and trembling", he has clearly ordered that repentance (which he calls fear and trembling) is to be taught from the memory of Christ and not from the law.

From the sermons of Paul and Barnabas it is absolutely clear that the law is not necessary for any part of justification. (Rom. 3, 20. ff. Apost. 13, 38. ff.)

7. any thing without which the Holy Spirit is given, and without which men are justified, need not be taught, neither the beginning, nor the means, nor the end of justification.

But now is the time before, and the Holy Ghost is given continually, and men are justified without the law, through the gospel of Christ only [Rom. 3:28].

(9) Therefore it is not necessary that the law of Moses be taught, neither the beginning, nor the means, nor the end of justification.

10 The major clause is certainly from the experience that Paul and Barnabas cite.

(11) In the same way, the lower part (minore) will be judged, because the Holy Spirit has fallen on the Gentiles in a visible form.

(12) What then do some, without the word, even against Christ's word, against the apostles' example, make the law the first and necessary part of the doctrine of justification?

13) So that the Christian doctrine may be preserved pure, 4) they must be resisted.

3) We have followed the reading of the Wittenberg and Jena editions: iäsm, instead of item in the Erlanger.

4) To this, Luther wrote in the original [to Weimar's] own hand in the margin: "da ist die gisst heraus." With these words Luther wants to say: By the fact that Agricola pretends that he must, in order to keep the Christian doctrine pure, resist those 2c., his poison comes to light, namely, that he blames me that my doctrine is false, impure and not suitable to teach, so that Agricola alone would be praised as the master of pure doctrine. Compare the writing No. 32 in this volume.

who teach that the gospel is to be preached only to those whose hearts have been previously frightened and crushed by the law.

(14) For those who speak the words of Christ in this clumsy manner, teaching that the law must be taught first and then the gospel, pervert the words of Christ, for they do not abide in the simple understanding of the words of Christ.

For as we must hold fast the simple understanding of these words, "This is my body," so we must also hold fast the simple mind of these words, "Go preach the gospel, and baptize them." 2c.

16 The law alone punishes sins, and that without the Holy Spirit; therefore it punishes to damnation.

(17) Now there is need of such a doctrine, which with great power not only condemns, but also at the same time saves; but such a doctrine is the gospel, which at the same time teaches repentance and forgiveness of sins.

18. for the gospel of Christ teaches the zorn of God from heaven and at the same time also the righteousness that is valid before God, Rom. 1, 17. for it is a sermon of repentance of the promise anaehānat, which the. Reason by nature does not understand, but by divine revelation.

The interpretations (Commentaria) of the newer ones agree very little with each other, because in some places they teach the way of justification purely, in others not purely. 1)

The few who are pure out of many [not pure] are these:

Luther says in the preface to the epistle to the Romans: "God's wrath from heaven is revealed through the gospel against all men because of their ungodly nature and unrighteousness.

2 Likewise, in the preface to the epistle of Jacob: "Will do with lawfulness that which the apostles do with charms of love", therefore this epistle is also rejected as not being of the apostle Jacob.

In the epistle to the Romans, Philip [Melanchthon] constantly urges that the main emphasis in the New Testament be placed on ungodly behavior against the Son of God, not on ungodly behavior against the Law.

Luther, in the Summaries on the Psalter, says about the Psalm [19] "The heavens tell the glory of God": 2) "And with this he raises the old law, which" 2c., and in the notes to it he compares the honor of the law with that of the gospel and carefully considers why the heavens tell God's glory. And among other things he says: "Because the teaching of the Law works rather the honor of men and dishonor to God, and in that by the works of the Law either the hopeful are measured, or those who despair of giving glory to God, the heavens tell such glory."

5 And Isa. 40: The law is to be the disciplinarian of the body, but those who seek righteousness through it make the law the disciplinarian of the conscience. But as far as heaven is from earth, so far shall we separate the law from the conscience. Likewise, the law is to be directed to the body and the outward members, that it may govern the outward works; this is the true and proper use of the law; but those who need the law for justification abuse it to their condemnation.

These are impure [in doctrine]:

1. in the Saxon visitation: because Christ commands us to preach repentance and forgiveness of sins in his name, the ten commandments must be taught.

2. likewise, to take upon himself from the cross: Therefore the gospel teaches that the law is given to humble us, that we may seek Christ 2c.

(3) In the explanation of the epistle to the Galatians, Luther says, "That the office of the law is to afflict and terrify the conscience, that it may the more easily know Christ. There are many such passages in the same interpretation, which we reject as erroneous, so that the doctrine may be kept pure.

Likewise, others [teach antinomials]: ³⁾

1. the law is not worthy to be called the word of God.

(2) If thou be a fornicator, a knave, an adulterer, or any other sinner, believing, thou art in the way of salvation.

3. if you are in the midst of sin to the utmost, and if you believe, you are "in the midst of blessedness. 4)

3) That the Latin of the original: Item alii must be understood in this way, shows the immediately following remark of Luther.

4) Regarding the second and third articles, Luther himself noted in the original: "These two he may deny, but I do not know. They are also

1) Luther's own marginal gloss in the original: "Ja, das verstehestu wol, du Narr."

2) The words "the glory of GOD" are missing in the original.

The ten commandments belong on the town hall, not on the sermon seat.

5. all who deal with Moses must go to the devil; to gallows with Moses.

(6) We are not to prepare men for the gospel by the preaching of the law; God must do it, His work be it.

7. in the gospel, one should not deal with the ungodly behavior (violatione) against the law, but with the ungodly behavior (violatione) against the Son [of God].

8. hearing the word and living by it is the consequence of the law.

Hearing the word and feeling it in the heart is the very essence (proprium) of the Gospel, of which in our 1) Methodus.

10 Peter 2) has not known Christian freedom;

11. his saying: Certam facientes vocationem vestram per bona opera [that is, do the more diligently to establish your calling and election by good works, is no good (non valet). [2 Pet. 1, 10.]

(12) As soon as you think that Christianity should be like this and like this, that it should be fine, honorable, chaste, holy people, you have already missed the Gospel. [Of it further in my comment about the 3) 6. chapter Lucä.

The first disputation of D. Martin Luther against certain antinomians.

Of repentance.

[Held in December 1537.] 4)

1. repentance is, according to all teachers' testimony, which is true, sorrow (dolor) over sin, combined with the intention to amend one's life.

This suffering is actually, and can be nothing else, than the feeling or sensation of the law in the heart or conscience.

not imposed on Eisleben, but on others, as his students, as the title indicates. All others are M. Grickels, as is proved from other [writings]." (In the original, this remark is in Latin.) Melancthon reports in the opinion of the Wittenberg theologians to the Elector of April 5, 1540 (Förstemann, Neues Urkundenbuch, p. 326) that "one from the city of Lüneburg wrote such a thing to him in many names."

1) nostra is missing in the Erlanger.

2) In the above mentioned letter of Wendelin Faber to Güttel, Förstemanns Neues Urkundenbuch, p. 333 d, it should read: "Petrus had still learned the Minorem non", instead of: "Paulus " 2c.

3) The bracketed words are in the old translations, but are missing in the Latin editions.

4) Köstlin, Martin Luther, Vol. II, p. 467.

3 For many hear the law, but because they do not feel the effect (sensum) or power of the law in their hearts, they remain without suffering and repentance.

The first part of repentance, namely suffering, is from the law alone; the other part, namely the good intention [to improve one's life], cannot be from the law.

(5) For the man who is terrified in the face of sin cannot put anything good before himself by his own efforts, because he cannot do so [even when] he is satisfied and secure [without challenge]:

(6) But when he is disgraced and overcome by the power of sin, he falls into despair and hatred against God, or goes to hell, as the Scripture says.

(7) Therefore the promise [of Christ] or the gospel must be added to the law, which satisfies and straightens the troubled conscience, so that man may make a resolution for good.

8 The atonement which the law alone works is a half atonement, or a beginning of atonement, or an atonement by synecdoche, for it has no good intention.

9. and if it remains so, Cain's, Saul's, Judah's repentance will come out of it and of all who doubt and despair of God's mercy, that is, of those who perish. [Gen. 4, 13. 1 Sam. 26, 21. Cap. 31, 4. Matth. 27, 4. f.]

10 The school theologians (sophistae) have taken the definition of repentance, that it is sorrow [for sin] and a good resolution [to amend one's life] 2c., from the ancient teachers and taught it after them,

11. but have not understood nor been able to teach the pieces of the definition, namely rene, sin, intent.

(12) Of repentance they have invented that it is an action produced by the power of free will, which hates sin as often as it wants or does not want.

13. while this repentance is a suffering or torture which the conscience is forced to suffer, willingly or unwillingly, when it is rightly struck or urged by the law.

(14) They have said that sin is a transgression that is contrary to the ordinances of men, but they have seldom said sin is a transgression.

The term "moral law" is understood to mean that which is contrary to the moral law.

(15) But of original sin after baptism they had such thoughts that it was not even sin, especially not against the first table.

16) Against this doctrine of chaffing (paleas¹ 1) comes the law, which (as Jeremiah 23:29 says) is God's hammer that shatters rocks, and resolves all men under sin.

17 A good resolution, they thought, would be a self-chosen thought to avoid sin from now on by human strength,

18. whereas, according to the Gospel, it is a movement in the heart, awakened by the Holy Spirit, to hate sin from now on, out of [God's] love; although sin in the flesh still fights hard against it.

19 And it is no wonder that they understood so little of it, because they did not use the Bible and therefore could not know what either the Law or the Gospel is,

20. but have been so drowned in human commandments and statutes that they have judged holy divine things only in dreams.

(21) Against such useless teachers of despair, the gospel began to teach that repentance need not be despair alone,

22. but that the repentant should also have a hope, and thus hate sin out of love for God, which is a truly good resolution.

(23) There are some who do not consider the reason for speaking this way or the thing being done, that it is contrary to the law of God.

(24) And they teach that it is harmful to remove the law of God from the church altogether, which is blasphemous and usurping God.

25, For all Scripture teaches that repentance is to be begun from the law, as the order of this thing itself and experience prove.

For thus says the Scripture: "Alas! that the wicked should be turned to hell, all (Gentiles) who forget God" (Ps. 9:18.).

Likewise [v. 21.], "Set over them, O Lord, a teacher, that they may know that they are men."

27. "Make their faces full of shame, that they, O LORD, may have to inquire after thy name" [Ps. 83:17.]; and [Ps. 9:17.], "The wicked is entangled in the work of his hands."

It is a matter of order that death and sin are in [human] nature rather than life and righteousness.

29. for we are not to be given over to sin or death, as righteous or living; but we, who are already sinners by nature and dead through Adam, must be justified and made alive through Christ.

30 Therefore the teaching of Adam must precede (that is, of sin and death), who is an image of the Christ to come [1 Cor. 15:47], of whom [Christ] is to be taught hereafter.

(31) Now sin and death must necessarily be denounced by the law, not by the word of grace and comfort.

This is also testified by experience: for Adam is punished beforehand as a transgressor of the law, and afterwards he is raised up by the promised seed of the woman 2c. [Gen. 3, 15.]

33. David also is first killed by the law, since Nathan said to him, "You are the man" 2c. After that he is preserved by the gospel, since Nathan says, "You will not die" 2c. [2 Sam. 12:7, 13.]

34. Paul is first struck down by the law, and hears, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" afterward he is made alive by the gospel, "Arise." 2c. [Acts 9:4, 6.]

35 And Christ Himself says, Marc. 1, 15: "Repent, and believe in the gospel: for the kingdom of God is at hand."

36 And again [Luc. 24, 46. f.]: "Christus had to suffer 2c. and have repentance and forgiveness of sins preached in his name."

So also the Spirit first punishes the world for sin [John 16:8], so that he can teach faith in Christ, that is, forgiveness of sins.

38. Paul in the Epistle to the Romans

1) Ueber psts vergliche Walch, St. Louiser Ausgabe, Bd, XVIII, 754, Anm.

This is the way he teaches, first that all men are sinners, then that they alone must be justified through Christ. [Rom. 3, 23. 28.]

(39) St. Lucas also testifies in the Acts of the Apostles that Paul taught both Jews and Gentiles that no one can be justified except through Christ alone. [Acts 13:38.]

The second disputation of D. Martin Luther against the antinomians.

From the law.

[Held on January 12, 1538.] 1)

1. the law is not only unnecessary for justification, but completely useless and utterly impossible.

(2) But those who think that they will be justified by the law, to them the law is a poison and a pestilence to righteousness.

(3) In speaking of justification, it is not possible to speak sufficiently against the inability of the law and against the exceedingly harmful reliance on the law.

4 For the law was not given to make righteous or alive, or to help anything to righteousness [Gal. 3:21].

(5) But to show sin, and to work wrath [Rom. 3:20, 4:15], that is, to make the conscience guilty.

6. death was not laid upon us that we should live by it, nor sin inherent in us that we should be innocent by it.

7 So also the law is not given that we should be justified by it, because it is not able to give either righteousness or life.

8. summa, as high as heaven is above the earth, so far shall the law be separated from justification.

(9) And nothing is to be taught, said, or remembered in the article of justification, but only the word of the grace shown to us in Christ.

(10) But it does not follow that the law is to be abrogated and taken away from the preaching of the church.

1) Kawerau, Agricola, p. 194.

(11) Yes, for this very reason it is all the more necessary to teach it and insist on it, because it is not only not necessary, but also impossible for justification.

(12) So that the arrogant man who relies on his strength may be taught that he cannot be justified by the law.

(13) For sin and death are to be denounced to man primarily for this reason, not because they are necessary for life and innocence,

14. but that man may know his unrighteousness and condemnation, and so be humbled.

When sin remains unrecognized, man is presumptuous of his imagined innocence, as can be seen in the pagans and subsequently in the Pelagians.

16. When death remains unrecognized, one becomes presumptuous and thinks that this life is the [right] life, and that there is no other life in the future.

17 Since only the law teaches both, it is sufficiently evident that the law is very necessary and useful.

(18) Whatever indicates sin, wrath or death, that exercises the ministry of the law, whether in the Old or New Testament.

(19) For the manifestation of sin is nothing else, nor can it be anything else, than the law, or the proper work and effect of the law.

20. law and indication of sin, or revelation of wrath, are such words, one of which can be used for the other (termini convertibiles); like [these words] man, and creature, which can laugh (risibilis²⁾), or reasonable creature.

(21) To abolish the law and yet retain the revelation of wrath is as much as if you were to deny that Peter was a man and yet claim that he was a creature that could laugh, or that he was a rational creature.

(22) It is just such wisdom to take away the law and yet teach that sin must be forgiven,

2) The ability to laugh is not inherent in any other creature than man.

While the Scripture of the Holy Spirit says that sin is dead without the law and that where there is no law, there is no transgression [Rom. 4:15].

(24) So that it is impossible for sin to be, or to be known without the law, either by that which is written, or by that which is given (insculpta) (into the heart). 1)

(25) It further follows that since there is no sin (after the law is abolished), there is no Christ to save from sin. For Christ himself says: "The healthy do not need a physician" [Matth. 9, 12].

Since Christ did not come to abolish the law, but to fulfill it (Matth. 5, 17.), He would have come in vain if there was no law to be fulfilled in us.

27. And because God's law requires our obedience to God, these lawbreakers also abrogate obedience to God.

28 From this it is evident that Satan teaches through these his instruments only with words of sin, repentance and Christ;

But in doing so, he takes away Christ, repentance, sin and all Scripture, as well as the author of Scripture, God Himself.

30. and think of the most damaging security, contempt of God, unpunished willfulness, and eternal impenitence more than Epicurus himself.

31 Their word testifies to this: the law punishes sin without the Holy Spirit, only to condemnation.

(32) Here it appears that they want to teach about such a sin that does not condemn, but perhaps even without Christ makes one blessed.

For if sin does not condemn, all that remains is that Christ did not redeem us from damnable sin, that is, from the wrath of God.

34 For sin that does not condemn is a better sin than righteousness and life itself.

35 For what is more blessed than to have sin that does not condemn, that is, which is not sin?

1) That this translation is correct can be seen from the last thesis of the third disputation.

Therefore, when the law is done, we are so redeemed from sin and blessed that we do not need Christ as our mediator. 2c.

But this is also wrong, that the law without the Holy Spirit punishes sin: Holy Spirit punishes sin, because the law is written with the finger of God (Ex. 31, 18.).

38. and all truth, where it is, is of the Holy Spirit; and to forbid the law is to forbid the truth of God.

39. to abolish the law for the sake of this office, that it punishes sin to condemnation, is a manifest frenzied nonsense.

40 For the power of sin is this, as St. Paul (1 Cor. 15, 56.) says that sin is the sting of death, and the law the power of sin.

41. Therefore let us eat and drink and sing among these teachers: Away with him (pereat) who provides for the other morning!

(42) For since the law, which is the power of sin, is abolished, consequently, since the power of sin is gone, death and hell are also destroyed,

43. not by the blood of the Son of God, who keeps and fulfills the law, but by denying that there is any law of God that must be fulfilled.

44) All their doctrine of sin, repentance, Christ and forgiveness of sin is vain filth and lies worthy of the devil 2). -

45 For as the law was before Christ, it certainly accused us; but under Christ it is satisfied by the forgiveness of sins, and now to be fulfilled henceforth by the Spirit:

46 Therefore, after Christ, it will remain fulfilled in the life to come, because then the creature will have become new (as the law required in the meantime).

47 Therefore the law will never be abolished for eternity, but will remain, either to be fulfilled in the damned, or to have been fulfilled in the blessed.

48 But these, Satan's disciples, have these thoughts, as it seems that the law lasted only for a time, and under Christ it ceased, like circumcision.

Of repentance.

[January (?) 1538.]

1. the repentance of the Papists, Turks, Jews and all unbelievers and hypocrites is absolutely the same in all things.

2. the same is that they have sorrow for one or some real sins, and are sufficient for them; after that they are safe because of the other sins or original sin.

3 But this repentance of theirs is piecemeal, and temporary, only because of some sins, and that during some [small] part of the life.

(4) Such must be the opinion of those who do not understand that the whole of human nature is horribly damaged and corrupted by original sin.

5) The repentance of believers in Christ is not only directed to actual sins, but is continuous throughout life, even unto death.

(6) For it behooves believers to abhor and hate the pestilence or sin of nature to its end.

7 For Christ says rightly to all His own, "Repent," [Matt. 4:17] for He wants the whole life of His own to be a repentance.

8. for sin in our flesh endures as long as we live, contending against the spirit that resists it [Rom. 7:23].

(9) Therefore all works after justification are nothing else than a constant repentance or a good resolution against sin.

(10) For there is nothing else to be done, but that the sin which was indicated by the law, "not forgiven in Christ, may be purged out.

(11) Just as it was the duty of the children of Israel, after they had conquered the land of Canaan, to drive out the Jebusites who dwelt within its borders [Deut. 7:1];

012 And how it cost no less labor to drive the rest of the Jebusites out of the borders than to fall into the land at first:

(13) Thus it is not much easier to expose the rest of sin by constant repentance than to become its enemy at first.

(14) Hence, the saints and the righteous (when God so ordains them through the Law) are often sorrowful in heart and lament over their sins;
